The trustees accepted office, and out of the residue vested in them they purchased the estate of Sauchrie for the price of £21,000, but made no further purchases.

They also expended £12,000 in the erection of a mansion-house at Doonside, in terms of the 5th purpose of the settlement.

The period of six years expired on 30th September 1889.

In January 1890 William Hamilton Dunlop, who would have been the heir in possession had the truster's directions as to the investment of the residue been carried into effect, presented a petition to the Court under the Entail Acts, and on 22d November 1890 the trustees were ordained to convey to him in fee-simple the whole estate vested in them.

Thereafter the Lord Advocate, as representing the Crown, in an action at his instance against Alexander Dunlop's trustees, was found entitled to legacy-duty on the clear residue of the personal estate of the truster, to which Mr Dunlop had thus become entitled, and the trustees were appointed to lodge an account of that estate—(see 19 R. 461.)

To the account of the trustees the pursuer stated two objections, (1) "to the deduction of £12,000 made on account of 'sum directed by the deceased's settlement to be expended in erection of mansion-house at Doonside.' . . . The sum of £12,000, in so far as it was derived from income of the testator's personal estate, is liable to legacy-duty, and ought not to form a deduction from residue.* . . . (2) To the deduction of £21,015 on account of 'price of estate of Sauchrie.' . . . The said sum was part of the personalty of the testator directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, and was not so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession.† . . . The real estate bought by the trustees has been conveyed absolutely to" Mr Dunlop.

* The Stamp-Duties, &c. Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 86), sec. 4, enacts,— "That every gift by any will . . . of any person which by virtue of any such will . . . shall be payable . . . or be satisfied out of the personal or moveable estate or effects of such person . . . shall be deemed a legacy within the true intent and meaning of the Legacy-Duties Acts, and shall be liable to these duties accordingly. . . ."

† The Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, section 19, enacts "that any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied: Provided, nevertheless, that in case before the same or some part thereof shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate

It appeared that the heritable subjects at Sauchrie and Doonside had been included in a succession-duty account passed in July 1890, before the decree in the entail proceedings was granted.

On 13th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary repelled the objections.*

by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase."

* "OPINION.—The previous judgment of the Court in this case related to personal estate of the late Alexander Dunlop, which the testator directed his trustees to invest in the purchase of land to be settled by deed of strict entail upon a series of heirs. Before this purpose had been carried into effect, and while the bulk of the personal estate remained uninvested in land and no entail had been executed, the person named as institute in the trust-deed, Mr W. H. Dunlop, carried through a disentail, and thereby became entitled absolutely to the clear residue of the heritable and personal estate of the deceased Alexander Dunlop. According to the view which I took, and which was affirmed by the Inner-House, the concluding proviso of section 19 of 36 Geo. III., c. 52, applied in terms to the only question then considered; and it was decided that legacy-duty was chargeable on the capital of the clear residue of the personal estate of Alexander Dunlop at the rate of 5 per cent.

"It then became necessary to ascertain the amount of the personal estate, and I accordingly ordered the defenders to lodge a residuary account, which they have done. The pursuer has lodged two objections. He objects to the deduction of (1) a sum of £12,000, being a sum directed by the deceased's settlement to be expended in erection of mansion-house at Doonside; and (2) a sum of £21,015, being the price of the estate of Sauchrie purchased by trustees on 11th November 1885, in virtue of the directions in the deceased's settlement. The pursuer maintains that both these sums are liable in legacy-duty as personal estate. I may mention at this point that it is admitted that the heritable subjects at Doonside and Sauchrie, on the improvement and purchase of which those sums were expended, were included in a succession-duty account delivered in June 1890, and passed in July 1890.

"These objections raise a question which was not directly involved or decided in the former discussion—one of those puzzles which the 19th section of 36 Geo. III. c. 52, is so prolific in producing. The leading object of that section was, for revenue purposes, to invert the rule of law that, quoad succession, money directed to be invested in the purchase of land is regarded as heritage or real estate. Otherwise, at the date of the Act 1796, money so bequeathed would have escaped duty. The leading provision of the 19th section is,—'That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate.' Then follows the exception,—'Unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate for so much thereof as shall have been so applied.'

"Before considering the application of that exception to the present question it is necessary to refer to Mr Alexander Dunlop's settlement in order to ascertain the precise nature of Mr W. H. Dunlop's rights when the succession opened to him. Mr Alexander Dunlop died on 30th September 1883. By the direction in his settlement (fifth purpose) the trustees were directed to retain and accumulate the rents, interests, and profits for six years after his decease, and the only interest which Mr W. H. Dunlop took during these six years was that the truster directed his trustees to pay '£800 sterling per annum during the said period of six years to William Hamilton Dunlop, solicitor, Ayr, the institute of the entails hereinafter mentioned, whom failing to the heir of entail for the time being who shall be entitled to succeed under the destination hereinafter expressed to the lands and others to be entailed as after directed.' The provisions of the sixth purpose of the trust-deed shew, in my opinion, that the expiry of the six years from the date of the truster's death is the punctum temporis upon which the present question depends. At that time, and not till then, right vested in the person who was then institute or other heir called either to demand that the estates purchased should be entailed as directed, or, if the trustees were not prepared at that time to carry out those directions, to call upon them to pay over to him the interest and proceeds of the residue, heritable and moveable. After stating that the trustees shall be entitled in their discretion to delay realisation and purchase, there is this declaration:—'Declaring, however, that although it is my wish and desire that my said trustees should realise the residue and reversion of my said estates, and purchase the said lands or estates during the said period of six years, I hereby declare that they shall be entitled to use their own discretion as to this, and if they consider it necessary they shall be entitled and are hereby empowered to delay the said realisation and also the said purchase or purchases till such time or times as may seem to them most convenient and suitable for such realisation and purchases: Declaring, however, that after the said period of six years have expired the institute or the heir of entail in possession, or entitled at the time to possess the lands and estates to be purchased as aforesaid under the destination hereinafter written, shall be entitled to demand and receive the interest and proceeds of the entire residue and reversion of my said estates, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, but under deduction always of such expenses and charges as may be incurred by my said trustees in the management and execution of the trust until the said lands or estates are purchased and entailed, and the whole purposes of the trust fulfilled.'

"The six years from the death of Alexander Dunlop ran out on 30th September 1889. Till then no right vested in any of the heirs called, and the rate of duty could not be fixed or the amount calculated. By that time the two sums in question had been expended in the improvement and purchase of land to be entailed under the truster's directions. The person entitled at that date was the institute named in the settlement, Mr W. H. Dunlop; but his right was not an absolute right to the corpus of the estate, it was merely a right as first of a series of heirs to enjoy the real estate, if purchased, as heir of entail in possession, or, pending the purchase of lands and execution of a deed of entail, to demand from the trustees the interest and proceeds of the entire residue and reversion of the truster's estates, heritable and moveable, under deduction of expenses and charges of management and execution of the trust.

"Mr W. H. Dunlop did not commence proceedings for the purpose of disentailing until January 1890, and the disentail was not carried through until the end of that year.

"Turning now to the 19th section of the Act 1796, I shall consider whether Mr W. H. Dunlop was in the position to which the exception, which I have quoted, applies. I think it is clear that, at the time when the right opened to him, it opened to him as the first of a series of persons by whom, according to the will, the land to be purchased was to be enjoyed in succession. If any of the money at that date was not invested in the purchase of land, duty fell to be calculated by way of annuity, and paid just as if the money had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate; and if, after the right opened, but before the money had been so applied, he acquired (as he did) absolute right to it, legacy-duty, under the express terms of the section, fell to be paid just as if from the first he had an absolute right to it. But it seems to me that the statute makes a marked distinction where money, directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate to be enjoyed by different peror interest being equally liable for duty with capital¹—and was within the definition of “legacy” given by sec. 4 of the 1845 Act,² which covered nearly every species of gift from the dead to the living. The erection of a mansion-house was not a purchase of real estate,³ and the provisions of sec. 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52,⁴ had no application.

Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

The sum of £21,000 was moveable estate expended on the purchase of real estate, and it had not been so left by the trustor as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, for Mr Dunlop had been found absolutely entitled to it. The 19th section was meant to be read in two parts, the sons in succession, has actually been so applied before right of succession opens to any of the series of heirs; or even, perhaps, when it is so applied when the heir entitled to be in possession for the time has not yet acquired an absolute right to the estate. This distinction runs through the whole section. Each person entitled in succession is to pay duty on the personal estate so destined ‘unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued,’—that is, before that person’s right emerged. The Act then proceeds to provide,—‘But no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied.’ The meaning of these provisions seems to be that if, during the lifetime of any of the persons entitled for the time to enjoy the estate in succession, land is purchased under the directions of the will, legacy-duty will not fall to be paid on the succession of the next heir. Further, though it is, perhaps, not necessary to decide this, it would seem that if the money is applied in the purchase of land before all the instalments due by the heir in possession or entitled to be in possession are paid, liability for future instalments of legacy-duty ceases. Again, while it is directed that if any person becomes entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession, he shall pay as if he had been originally absolutely entitled, that provision is expressly confined to the case of his acquiring an absolute right before the money has been actually applied in the purchase of land; and legacy-duty is only payable in respect of so much of the money as has not been then applied in the purchase of land. I, therefore, think that, looking to the language used in the statute, it must be held that Mr W. H. Dunlop’s case quoad the two sums in question falls within the exception or qualification in the 19th section. I do not think that any solid distinction can be taken between the case of the institute or first person called and subsequent heirs. The statute says,—‘Each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty,’ &c.

“The question is one of some subtlety, because it may be suggested that, from the expiry of the six years from the death of Mr Alexander Dunlop, Mr W. H. Dunlop had a potentiality of acquiring the estate in fee-simple, and actually did acquire it before it was conveyed to him; and that thus from the first the trustees held for him absolutely. But the money having been actually applied in the purchase of land before the succession opened to Mr W. H. Dunlop, I think the direct words of the 19th section are too strong to admit of this refinement, and that it would not be safe to rely on the analogy of other statutory enactments dealing with other cases, such as section 21 of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, on which the case of Lord Lilford v. The Attorney-General, L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. (H. of L.) App. 63, was decided. My opinion therefore is that the objections must be repelled; and even if the matter were more doubtful than I hold it to be, I should feel bound to give the defenders the benefit of the doubt.

“As I have already mentioned, succession-duty has already been paid, and I think that is all that the Crown is entitled to claim. The difference is stated to be about £1200.”

first—which covered the present case—being wholly unqualified by the later exception. That applied only to the second part, that, namely, introduced by the first “unless,” and dealing with the case of successive owners. That was the view of the Court in the former judgment.¹ It did not matter, therefore, whether the money had been actually applied in the purchase of land before Mr Dunlop's right emerged. It was not disputed that when he took he did so absolutely and not as first of a series of owners. It might be that he required the aid of the Entail Acts to work out his right, but with that the Crown was not concerned.

Argued for the defender ;—Both sums fell within the provisions of sec. 19 of the Act of Geo. III., and sec. 4 of the 1845 Act had no application. The direction to expend £12,000 in the erection of a mansion-house should not be separated from the larger direction to purchase land. It was merely an incident of the latter, and although the form of expression was different the practical result was the same, viz., the acquisition of heritable estate. *Sprot's case*² was therefore, strictly analogous. Accordingly the exception in the latter part of section 19 applied in terms to both sums. In any event, it applied to the sum of £21,000, for it was moveable estate applied in the purchase of real estate, and it had been actually expended in the purchase of land before the expiry of the six years, and before any person had acquired a right thereto, whether limited or absolute, and before therefore any duty had accrued, and when Mr Dunlop's right was ascertained the estate was exactly in the position described in the last exception. There was no warrant for breaking up the section into two parts as the pursuer proposed, so as to limit the last exception to the case of money so gifted as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This case relates to the liability of money directed to be invested in the purchase of land to payment of legacy-duty. The late Alexander Dunlop, having conveyed his personal estate to testamentary trustees, directed that the rents, interest, and profits of the residue of his estate should be accumulated for six years after his death, and that the residue increased by such accumulations should be applied in the purchase of lands to be entailed on a series of heirs. It may be here noticed that under the powers of the deed of trust the trustees might have purchased land for the purpose of being entailed within the period of six years following the truster's death, but it is only after the expiration of this period of six years that the heirs of the destination have a right to demand and receive the full income of the residue, which is thenceforth treated as entailed money, waiting investment. During this period of six years the right of the institute or heir is restricted to an annuity of £800 per annum.

Mr William Hamilton Dunlop, the institute of entail, in the exercise of his statutory powers, elected to disentail the estate ; and, under a previous reclaiming note, we held, affirming Lord Wellwood's judgment, that as Mr William Hamilton Dunlop had, by arrangement between him and his three minor children and their curators, become entitled absolutely to the clear residue of the personal estate of the deceased Alexander Dunlop, legacy-duty was chargeable on the capital thereof at the rate of five per cent.

It then became necessary to ascertain the amount of the personal estate. An account was given in for the Lord Ordinary's consideration. To this account No. 67.

 two objections were stated by the Lord Advocate as representing the Inland Revenue Department, which objections have been repelled by the Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor which is under review. I shall consider these objections in their order. Jan. 12, 1894.
 Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

1. In the residue account given in the defender proposes to make a deduction of the sum of £12,000 under the head,—“Sum directed by deceased's settlement to be expended in erection of mansion-house at Doonside.” The Lord Advocate objects to the deduction in so far as the sum expended is derived from the personal estate. The Lord Ordinary has allowed the deduction, but I am not quite sure on what ground. Apparently, in the argument in the Outer-House, this expenditure had been treated as equivalent to the expenditure of residue in the purchase of land, and therefore as raising a question under the 19th section of the Act 36 George III. cap. 52, which I shall have to consider with reference to the second objection.

Now, in a question of private right depending on the constructive conversion of money into land under the operation of a power, there is evidently a strong analogy between the cases of a power or direction to purchase land, and a power or direction to add to the value of the land by building on it. But I believe your Lordships are all of opinion that the operation of a taxing statute cannot be extended analogically, and that the expenditure of £12,000, or whatever may be the sum derived from personalty in the erection of a mansion-house at Doonside is not a case within the contemplation of the 19th section, which deals only with the case of a “purchase of real estate.”

I am free to say that I do not see any good reason why this sum of £12,000, or so much of it as was personalty, should not be treated as a part of the clear residue, and subject as such to legacy-duty under the general provisions of the Act 36 Geo. III. But any doubt that might be raised on this subject is removed by the 4th section of the Act 8 and 9 of the Queen. The terms of that section appear to me to be sufficiently comprehensive to include within the category of things which are subject to legacy-duty, a sum of money which is directed to be applied to the erection of a house or building, and the case of Parker, 4 H. & Nor. 666, is an authority in point.

2. I pass to the second objection, under which the Lord Advocate objects to the deduction of £21,015 on account of “Price of estate of Sauchrie, purchased by the trustees on 11th November 1885, from Alexander Mitchell in virtue of directions in deceased's settlement.” Now, the truster, Alexander Dunlop, died on 30th September 1883; this purchase was made about two years later; the six years of accumulation expired on 30th September 1889, and the proceedings for the purpose of disentailing the succession were only commenced in January 1890, and were carried through during that year. In these circumstances the defender says that this purchase falls within the general scope of the 19th section of 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, but that in this particular case no duty attaches.

The purpose of the 19th section is to regulate the payment of duty in respect of money to be applied in the purchase of real estate. It begins with general words imposing duty; then follows an exception or qualification, and to this again there is a subexception. 1st, It is enacted,—“That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate.” The qualification is,—“Unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate,"—that is, I presume, according to the provisions of the 12th section. I pause here to inquire what would have been the right of the Inland Revenue in relation to this sum of £21,000, supposing the lands of Sauchrie had not been purchased, and the capital sum was still unexpended but entailed. It was common ground that until the expiration of the six years ending 30th September 1889 no duty accrued. Until that date the institute of entail was not ascertained, no right to the enjoyment of the entailed money vested in anyone, and, as the Lord Ordinary points out, the rate of duty could not be fixed or the amount calculated. Immediately thereafter, the institute, Mr William Hamilton Dunlop, would, in the case supposed, be liable to pay duty on the value of his life interest according to the tables appended to the Act of Parliament, and if he died before a purchase was made (the money being still entailed) the next heir would pay legacy-duty on his life interest, and so on. I pass to the subexception of the 19th section which (like the chief exception) is introduced by the word "unless," i.e. "unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued, but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied."

Keeping in view that at this time, and for many years thereafter, land was altogether exempted from succession-duty, or death-duty of any kind, I think the meaning of this subexception is very plain. So soon as the money shall be de facto converted into land, it is to be exempt from future taxation. Until an investment is found the heirs in succession must pay duty as for a pecuniary legacy, but after an estate is purchased and the trust so far executed the legacy account closes, future heirs are heirs to landed property, and it is not intended that the estate in their hands should be subject to duty.

The peculiarity of the present case is that the estate was purchased before a right to its value vested in anyone. Before the purchase was made, it was not possible to find a person liable in duty as having a limited interest, and after the purchase was made then by the express words of the last exception no duty accrues.

It is certainly a curious result of the statutory provisions that this capital sum, although left by the testator in the form of money, escapes taxation altogether under the Legacy-Duty Act. But it can hardly be said that it escapes liability contrary to the policy of the Act, when it is observed that this is the result of the money being converted into land soon after the testator's death, and before the acquisition of a vested interest by an institute. We were informed that succession-duty under the Act of the present reign has been paid on this sum.

I ought not to conclude without taking notice of the argument founded on the proviso to the 19th section, which was the subject of consideration under the previous reclaiming note, under which any person who shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession is to pay duty as if absolutely entitled. Now, this proviso begins with these words,—“In case before the same, or some part thereof” (that is, of the money) “shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession,” &c.

Now, in the present case, the defender did not disentail before this money was applied in the purchase of land, and so did not in the language of the statute become entitled to an estate of inheritance before the money was so applied. Accordingly, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this proviso has no application to the subject of the second objection.

Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

If your Lordships agree with me, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor will be altered as regards the first objection, and the first objection to the account will be allowed in so far as the sum of £12,000 proposed to be deducted is derived from personal estate of the deceased Alexander Dunlop. As regards the second objection, I propose that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which repels this objection.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and I should not have thought it necessary to add anything were it not that observations I am reported to have made in the previous case were referred to in argument as supporting the view that Mr Dunlop's right from the moment it vested in him was an absolute right to the residue of this estate. The argument is that nothing following the words "unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession," is applicable to a legatee having from the first an absolute right. It is inaccurate to say that Mr Dunlop's right was absolute from the first. But he had from the first—that is from the time when his interest vested—a capacity to acquire such a right, and he did, in fact, acquire it, before any question of duty arose. What I said was intended to apply only to the circumstances of the case which we were then considering. The condition of the argument was that while the money was still unpaid and unapplied in the hands of the trustees, the institute had acquired right but in fee-simple. It appeared to me that liability for legacy-duty must be determined by reference to the interest which the legatee actually takes under a will, rather than by what the will ex figura verborum may purport to bequeath; and therefore that Mr Dunlop could not at the same moment claim immediate payment of the whole residue in his own right, and also maintain that the residue so to be paid to him absolutely had been given to be enjoyed by a series of heirs in succession so as to exempt him from legacy-duty. Whether that was right or wrong, it has no application to the present question.

The facts on which that question depends are clearly stated by the Lord Ordinary. The testator directed the residue of his estate to be applied in the purchase of land to be entailed on a series of heirs. Before any right had vested in the institute, the trustees, in the execution of their trust, had laid out £21,000 in the purchase of the lands of Sauchrie, to be entailed according to the directions of the testator. The institute, Mr Hamilton Dunlop, cannot demand payment of that portion of the residue in money, because no interest in the money had vested in him until after it had been converted into land in due performance of the trust. But when the right vested it was, as the Lord Ordinary points out, not an absolute right to the estate of Sauchrie, but only a right to demand a conveyance under the fetters of an entail, although by disentailing he has now right to demand a conveyance in fee-simple. The meaning of the enactment appears to me to be, first, that money left by will to be laid out in the purchase of land is to be chargeable with legacy-duty as personal estate, except when it is so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession; secondly, that in this excepted case each successive owner is to pay

No. 67. duty by way of annuity unless and until the money is actually laid out in the purchase of land, after which no duty would accrue under the Act of George III., although the land so purchased may be chargeable under the later statute. I think the money now in question falls within the exception, because when it was applied in the purchase of land it was subject to a trust for the benefit of a series of heirs in succession, and because it had been actually laid out before the duty accrued.

I entirely concur with Lord McLaren both upon that point and also upon the second point as to the money expended in building upon the estate of Doonside. I find it unnecessary to add anything.

Grant v. Henry.

Fishings—Trout-fishing—River navigable but non-tidal.—In a question between a riparian proprietor and a member of the public held (1) that a right in the public of being at or on the non-tidal portion of a river for the purposes of navigation does not entitle them to fish for trout therein, and (2) that such a right of fishing cannot be acquired by prescriptive use.

1ST DIVISION. MRS KINLOCH GRANT was proprietrix of the lands of Arndilly and Ld. Kyllachy. Aikenway in the counties of Banff and Elgin. The lands were bounded on the west by the River Spey, which at that part was not a tidal river.

In October 1892 Mrs Grant raised an action against John Henry, exciseman, Craigellachie, concluding for declarator (first) that she was entitled to prevent the defender entering on or passing along the bed or alveus of the Spey lying between the bank in her lands and the medium filum fluminis ex adverso of Arndilly and Aikenway, and from entering on or passing along the banks within her lands; (second) that she had the sole and exclusive right to fish for trout and all other kinds of fish from that part of the bed or alveus, and from the bank ex adverso of Arndilly, and similarly to fish for trout and all other kinds of fish, not being salmon, ex adverso of Aikenway; and (third) that the defender had no right to fish for trout or any other kind of fish from the alveus or bank on Mrs Grant's side of the river, and for interdict against him accordingly.

The pursuer stated that the defender had asserted a right to fish for trout in the river ex adverso of her lands, that he had no right in himself, and had not received authority from anyone entitled to give it to do so.

The defender stated;—"That the Spey is a public navigable river, and that any part of its alveus is inalienable by or from the Crown as trustees for the public. The members of the public have enjoyed its use as a public navigable river since beyond the memory of man. As such they have used it for centuries in the transport of the produce of the country, and for the passage of the inhabitants to the low country. For these and kindred purposes it has been navigated by rafts, boats, currachs, and other native craft from time immemorial. The public have exercised and enjoyed the right of fishing for trout and other fish not of the salmon kind in and use otherwise of the alveus of the said river ex adverso of the pursuer's said lands from time immemorial. They have also exercised and enjoyed the right of walking on its bed and along its banks. They have in particular enjoyed and exercised from time immemorial a right of way on the south bank of the said river ex adverso of the pursuer's lands, and from the said right of way they have, and the defender as a member of the public has, constantly obtained access to the alveus of the said river."  Grant v. Henry.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The public having from time immemorial enjoyed the right of fishing for trout and other fish not of the salmon kind in the alveus of the said river ex adverso of the said lands, the defender as a member of the public is entitled to exercise said right. (5) The Spey being a public navigable river, the pursuer has no exclusive rights therein, except the right of fishing for fish of the salmon kind.

On 16th February 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) declared and interdicted in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The defender in this case claims right, as one of the public, to fish for trout in the River Spey ex adverso of the pursuer's lands of Arndilly; and the present action has been brought to have it declared that he has no such right, and to have the defender interdicted from continuing to fish on the pursuer's water.

"The defender's claim is rested upon two grounds—(1) That the River Spey is at the place in question navigable,—that is to say, navigable for boats and rafts; and that being navigable, although not tidal, it is a public river, in which the public have the same rights as they have in the sea; (2) that assuming the river to be private in point of property, the right of trout-fishing may yet be acquired by the public by prescriptive use, in the same manner as a right of way.

"I have had a very full and careful argument on the important questions thus raised, and have been very willing to consider how far the law of Scotland leaves these questions open. In result, however, I cannot say that I have found room for any serious doubt on that subject.

"As to the first ground, it is probably true—at all events (what is enough at present) it is averred—that the River Spey, from about Kingussie downwards, is navigable, and has been long navigated by boats, currachs, rafts, and other native craft. On the other hand, it is admitted, and is notorious, that at the place in question the river is not tidal. In point of fact, as mentioned at the debate, the tide only flows for a very short distance above the mouth of the Spey at Garmouth.

"In these circumstances, it is necessary for the defender to contend, as he does contend, that mere navigability makes a river public—at least, that it does so when there has been in fact a usage of navigation for the prescriptive period. In other words, the defender contends, as he requires to contend, that it is immaterial whether the river is tidal or non-tidal at the part in question.

"It appears to me to be hopeless to maintain this contention in face of the authorities. It is settled in England, and has been so since the days of Sir Matthew Hale,¹ that fresh rivers, of what kind soever, do of common right belong to the owners of the soil adjacent. Both in England and in Ireland there have been repeated decisions to that effect,² decisions distinguishing between tidal and non-tidal waters, and negating the right of the public to fish in the latter. There have been similar decisions in America, where, looking to the character of American rivers, a different doctrine might perhaps have been looked for. And although in Scotland there may have been until lately an absence of direct authority, it cannot, I think, be said that the point has ever been regarded as doubtful. In any case, the opinions of the Judges in the recent case of Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr Ewing, and particularly the opinions of the Judges in the House of Lords (which cannot in any view be regarded as obiter), settled I think conclusively, that by the law of Scotland a right on the part of the public to navigate a fresh water river does not imply that the river is public. They settle, on the contrary, that the only public rivers are those which, being both navigable and tidal, are truly parts of the sea, and in which accordingly, as in the sea, the property of the solum is in the Crown and the right to fish in the public.

Henry.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The Spey at the part in question was a public navigable river, and the proprietor of the adjacent lands had therefore no right to exclude the public from the alveus. He might have had a right to prevent them from trespassing on his lands in order to get to the alveus, but that point did not arise here, for the right of navigation carried with it a right of access, and once at the alveus the public had a right to fish for trout, for these were res nullius. In Fergusson's case¹ the water was a private stream, and besides the public, in fishing from the road or right of way, had to cast their lines over private property. But a river if navigable, though not tidal, was a public river.² It had been expressly so decided in the case of the Spey.³

"As to the second ground of defence, viz., the alleged prescriptive use, it is also, I think, clear that the defence is foreclosed. It is not disputed that in an ordinary private stream it is impossible by any amount of possession to acquire the right of trout-fishing. Certain rights over private property may no doubt be so acquired. Known servitudes, including rights of way, may certainly be so; but, as Lord Cockburn puts it in the case of Fergusson v. Shirreff, 6 D. 1363—"It is certainly not true that by the law of Scotland anybody may do anything not criminal which he has been accustomed to do for forty years." The question always is, whether the right claimed falls within the category of known servitude. Accordingly, in the case of Fergusson v. Shirreff, which I have just quoted, it was expressly held that a right of trout-fishing in a private stream could not be acquired by forty years' possession, and the same thing was again decided in the case of Montgomery v. Watson, 23 D. 635, where the question was as to an alleged right of fishing in a fresh-water loch.

"But the defender argued that when once a stream is found to be subject to a right of navigation, it is no longer a private stream in the sense of those authorities. Such a stream is already, it is said, quodammodo public; and being so, there is no legal objection to the extension by usage of a public right, so as to add the right of fishing to the right of navigation. As to this, I can only say that I can find no authority and can see no principle for such a distinction. A right of way through an estate does not carry with it, or make it possible to acquire by usage, a jus spatiandi over the estate; and the principle is the same whether the subject is dry land or land covered by water. The question really is whether this river is public or private property. It must be one or the other. If it is public, there is of course an end to the question; but if it is private, as I hold it to be, the existence of one burden in the shape of a right of passage for rafts and boats, cannot, in my opinion, be a ground for admitting another burden—a burden unknown to the law as affecting private property.

"On the whole matter I see no ground for allowing a proof. I propose to find that the defender's statements are irrelevant, and to repel the defences, with expenses."

It was admitted that the public had an unrestricted right to fish in tidal rivers. That was because these were indisputably public rivers. It did not follow that because a river was non-tidal it was not public. The use had of it was the best proof of the rights in and to it, and the defender offered to establish that for the prescriptive period trout-fishing had been enjoyed by the public in the part of the Spey in question. The fallacy of the pursuer's argument was in the assumption that because the proprietor of the adjacent banks had a right of property in the alveus he must also necessarily have a co-extensive right of trout-fishing. But (1) trout-fishing was not limited ad medium filum, as the right of property was, but extended from bank to bank; and (2) the right of trout-fishing was not a prædial servitude requiring a dominant tenement,¹ but was a pertinent of the land which was capable of transmission or reservation as a separate estate.² The Crown might, therefore, in the case of a navigable river, reserve the right of trout-fishing, if not absolutely, at any rate jointly with the adjacent proprietors; and here if the defender proved that from time immemorial the public had enjoyed the right, that would establish that the Crown had made no grant of the trout-fishing to the adjacent proprietors. It was important to notice in this connection that the pursuer had not averred exclusive possession. Navigation might be the primary use had by the public, but that did not prevent the acquisition by them of subsidiary or other uses.

Argued for the pursuer;—The owner of lands on the banks of a river which was navigable, but not tidal, had a right of property in the alveus ad medium filum.³ The right of navigation gave the public no right of property of any kind, but was merely a right of way or passage over the water. It did not constitute the river a public river, and did not carry with it the right of trout-fishing.⁴ That was a privilege inherent in the right of property of the owner of the adjacent lands.⁵ In *Carmichael's case*⁶ no general question was raised as here with the public; and the dictum of Lord Braxfield in that case, that "the heritor ex adverso has the right of trout-fishing, and no one can do anything to interrupt it," was quoted with approval in Fergusson's case.⁷ That the mere right of access to a stream gave no right of trout-fishing therein, and that no such right could be acquired by prescriptive use, had been expressly decided.⁸

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuer brings this action to establish an exclusive right to fish for trout in the Spey ex adverso of her lands of Arndilly, and to have the defender interdicted from encroaching upon that right. The defence is that the public, or at all events the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, have right to fish for trout in the water in question, because they have free and unrestricted access to the water without trespassing on the pursuer's lands. The averments of fact on which this contention is based are that the Spey is a navigable river, that there is a public right of way along the bank of the river opposite to the pursuer's lands, and that the right to fish for trout has been exercised by the public for time immemorial. The argument upon these averments may be stated in the following propositions:—First, That inasmuch as trout in a river are not property, they may be lawfully captured by anyone having access to the water; secondly, that even if access will not of itself infer the right to fish, such a right may be acquired by continuous use and enjoyment for the period of prescription; and thirdly, that whatever may be the law with reference to private streams, there can be no exclusive right to fish for trout in navigable rivers.

The first and second of these propositions were rejected by the Court in Fergusson v. Shirreff, 6 D. 1363.

It was decided in that case, first, that the right of angling for trout in private streams is an accessory to the right of property in the adjoining lands; secondly, that there is no common right of fishing for trout residing in the public at large, or in such members of the community as may have access to the water by virtue of a right of passage along the banks; and thirdly, that the continuous use and practice of fishing in such a stream for forty years or more will not establish a right in the public or in the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, but must be ascribed to toleration by the proprietors. All the earlier authorities on which the defender relied were brought before the Court in that case, and are fully discussed in the opinions of the four very eminent Judges who agreed in the decision. It does not detract from the authority of the judgment that in some of these opinions the question whether a public right of trout-fishing might not be acquired by use was treated as a question of difficulty. The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—“I believe there has been a common belief of right where there has been possession. I have wished much to find that this right of amusement or enjoyment is a legal title on which prescription can be founded so as to protect the use. I must confess I have struggled so to find it.” And Lord Medwyn said that he had framed his opinion with a good deal of hesitation, and perhaps with some reluctance. But, notwithstanding these difficulties, both of these learned Judges, after deliberate consideration, became satisfied that there was no ground in law on which a right of fishing could be established by usage, either in the public at large or in a particular community. The opinions of Lord Moncreiff and Lord Cockburn were even more decided to the same effect. The authority of that decision has never since been called in question, and it is certainly binding upon this Court. The same law has been laid down in the later cases of Montgomery v. Watson, 23 D. 635, and Copland v. Maxwell, 9 Macph. (H. L.) p. 1. The former of these cases is not so directly in point, because it concerned the right of fishing in a loch, and it appeared from the titles produced that the complainer was proprietor of the whole loch and its solum. The Court, however, held that access to the loch conferred no right to fish, that the decision in Fergusson v. Shirreff was applicable, and that the doctrine there laid down could not be impugned. In Copland v. Maxwell the question was whether an agricultural tenant had a right to fish for trout in a pond on his farm, to which he had access as a necessary result of his tenancy. It was held, on the authority of Fergusson, that the mere right of access inferred no right of fishing, and therefore that an agricultural tenant could have no such right, since it was wholly independent of the agricultural enjoyment of the land, unless it had been communicated to him by the proprietor. The Lord Justice-Clerk said,—“The right of trout-fishing in private streams or lochs must be conceded to be one accessory to the right of property in the lands which surround them. If the right be incident to the property of the lands, as it is universally said to be, the tenant can only claim to exercise it on the assumption that it has been communicated to him by the landlord.” Lord Neaves, concurring generally with the Lord Justice-Clerk, says,—“A right of trout-fishing is an incident to the right of property. It is not a right open to the public, and exercisable by all who have access to the water. There is no property in trout in the burn, any more than in the running water.” Lord Westbury, quoting this dictum in the House of Lords, observes,—“This is for the purpose of distinguishing this case from the case of an ordinary fish-pond enclosed all round, where the fish may be said to be no longer feeding in a state of nature, and where the owner has unquestionably a property in them.” Lord Neaves goes on to say,—“But the right to fish is a privilege of the proprietor of the soil, and no stranger is entitled to take the trout, any more than he is entitled to ladle out the water.” The judgment was affirmed, and the opinions I have quoted were approved in the House of Lords.

Grant v.
Henry.

The only question, therefore, which appears to me to be open for consideration is, whether the doctrine which has been established with reference to private rivers and lochs is or is not applicable to the River Spey above the point where the tide ebbs and flows. It is said to be inapplicable because the Spey is a public navigable river. It is not pretended that the Spey is in fact navigable by vessels of burthen, but it must be assumed, for the purposes of this discussion, that it is navigable, and has in fact been navigated by “rafts, boats, currachs, and other native craft” from Kingussie to the sea. I do not see that if the river has been used by the public as a navigable river, it can make any difference to the question now under discussion whether it is navigable by one class of vessels or another. But assuming the right of navigation to be as extensive as the physical character of the river will permit, no tenable ground has been suggested for holding as matter of law that the right to use a fresh water river for purposes of navigation must necessarily carry with it the right to use it for any other purpose, and particularly for the purpose of fishing. The right to use a river of this kind for the purpose of navigation is assimilated by the Lord President in Orr Ewing v. Colquhoun's Trustees (4 R. 344) to a public right of way, and it is obvious that a right of way by means of a river where it is fitted for navigation is just as definite and specific a right as a right of way by land, and does not by its definition imply any other or more extensive uses than are necessary for purposes of passage. It necessarily implies a right of access to the river, but it is settled by the authorities already mentioned that a right of access does not infer a right to fish for trout. It is a right of access for one specific purpose only, which has nothing whatever to do with the use and enjoyment of the river for fishing. But it is said that the ultimate ground of judgment in Fergusson v. Shirreff was that the banks, the alveus, and even the water of a private stream are the private property of the riparian heritors, subject only in the case of each to the rights and interests of the others, and that there is no such right in the alveus or stream of a navigable river. To make good this argument the counsel for the reclaimer maintained that the law of Scotland recognises no distinction between inland and fresh water rivers and the estuary of a river where the tide ebbs and flows. No authority was cited for this proposition, and there is very high authority to the contrary. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it is unnecessary to go farther back than the case of Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr Ewing. In that case the doctrine of the law of Scotland is laid down with the greatest clearness and precision by the Lord President and Lord Deas. The Lord President says,—“The distinction between a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows, and a proper fresh water river is very important as regards legal principle, because where the tide ebbs and flows the alveus of the river is the property of the Crown for public purposes as well as the banks of the river. . . . Not so with a fresh water river. The alveus of a fresh water river is the property of the proprietors upon the banks, just as the alveus of a stream which is not navigable is the property of the proprietors upon the banks. But, notwithstanding of that distinction, which is a very clear one, there may be a public use of a fresh water river for the purposes of navigation.” His Lordship goes on to argue the legal character of the public use by the analogy I have already mentioned. His view therefore is that in such streams there is a right of property in the alveus, subject to the public right to navigate, just as there is a right of property in land over which the public has a right of way, subject to the public right of passage. Lord Deas states the same distinction between the two classes of public navigable rivers, and explains that operations which would be illegal in the tidal part of the river may be lawful in the non-tidal part, the difference being that “the Crown holds the solum of the tidal part of the river as trustee for the whole public, but in the remaining portion of the river the proprietors of the banks are the proprietors of the solum, and the right of navigation on the part of others requires use to found and support it.” The law so laid down is approved and confirmed by the opinions delivered in the House of Lords (4 R. (H. L.) 116), and especially by the opinion of Lord Blackburn, and indeed it formed the basis of the judgment by which the decision of this Court was reversed. In that case riparian proprietors on the River Leven had erected the piers of a bridge in the bed of the river. The Court held that although they were proprietors of the alveus they were not entitled so to build within the bed of the river, because the public having rights of navigation had an interest in the running water, and although the new bridge might not cause any present injury, it was impossible to foresee what effect the operations in such a river as the Leven, where there is no great abundance of water and the deep part of the channel is but narrow, might ultimately produce in times of flood or in various states of the river. The Court therefore held that the right of navigation gave the public using the river the same title and interest to interfere with the operations of a riparian proprietor as lower or opposite heritors might have in respect of their right of property according to the doctrine established in Bicket v. Morris. But the House of Lords held that the right of navigation inferred no proprietary right or interest, and that Bicket v. Morris was inapplicable; and Lord Blackburn in explaining his reasons for that conclusion lays down the law as to the property of the alveus just as clearly as it had been stated in this Court. His Lordship says, in the first place, that “the River Leven is an inland stream, and the tide does not flow up to the point where the piers are erected. And as is pointed out by the Lord President, the rights of the Crown as regard the soil of the alveus, and of the public to navigate, are not the same in such a river as they are in the sea, or in a tidal estuary"; and in defining the public right to navigate, he says that "the public who have acquired by user a right of way on land, or a right of navigation on an inland water, have no right of property. They have a right to pass as fully and freely and as safely as they have been wont to do." The question to be considered therefore, as his Lordship treated it, was whether the erections complained of, being erections on the defender's own land, although in alveo of a running stream, were a present interference with the public right of passage, or if not, whether it could be shewn that they would necessarily produce effects which would in future interfere with that right. The judgment appears to me to import that a riparian proprietor has just the same property in the alveus of a navigable river as if it had been a private stream, subject only to the public right of passage. It was suggested in argument that whatever might be the law as to alveus, there could be no such right of property in the water as if the stream were private. I think there is no substantial distinction in this respect between the river and the alveus. The only question in Colquhoun's case was whether the riparian owner's right of property enabled him to interfere with the running water. The law laid down, as I understand the decision, is that no difference in the legal character of the landowner's right is created by the public right of navigation. He has therefore a right not only to the ordinary uses of the water as it flows past him, but to any extraordinary uses he may be able to enjoy without interfering with the rights of other heritors above or below him, and without obstructing the navigation. He has therefore a right of use, which, although not unlimited, is indefinite, and is available against all the world; and whether that is in law a right of property or not, it is exactly the same right as a riparian owner has in the water of a running stream which is not navigable. It appears to me, then, that all the grounds on which Fergusson v. Shirreff was decided are directly applicable to the present case. The pursuers, as an accessory of their right of property, have a right to fish for trout ex adverso of their lands, and in respect of that right they are entitled to exclude others from fishing, notwithstanding that there may reside in such other persons a right to use the river for some other definite and specific purpose.

The same considerations appear to me to be conclusive against the defender's claim to establish a public right by proof of a prescriptive use and enjoyment. If this were an open question, I should have thought it one of difficulty. We know that there are rivers which are practically open, where not only the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, but persons coming from a distance, have been accustomed to fish for trout without let or hindrance from time immemorial; and one would have expected to find that a use and enjoyment so extensive and so continuous rested rather on public right than on the goodwill and good sense of private landowners. But that is just the difficulty which the Lord Justice-Clerk considered and overcame in Fergusson v. Shirreff. If the right to fish for trout is not an incident of the right of navigation, the navigable character of the river can afford no special title independent of possession to which the use can be ascribed. The relevancy of the averments of possession must therefore be determined on the same grounds as in Fergusson v. Shirreff. All the arguments which were addressed to us in support of the relevancy, including even those which were founded on what is said to be a public understanding and belief—topics which Lord Cockburn described as scarcely judicial—were fully LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the judgment proposed and in Lord Kinnear's opinion. If the question had not been settled by decisions I should have felt difficulty in affirming that a right of fishing for trout or fresh water fish is a right which the law would protect. Trout-fishing is not, like salmon-fishing, a species of property distinct from the property in the channel of the stream in which the fish are taken; it is a right inseparable from the property of the alveus, and is, as I think, more correctly described as an incident of the estate of a riparian proprietor than as a separate right.

In the ordinary case it would be impossible for a stranger to fish for trout against the will of the riparian proprietor without committing a trespass, and so the estate of the riparian proprietor in the channel of the stream and the adjacent banks carries with it a virtually exclusive right to the fishing. I need hardly say that there is no right of property in the trout which are found in a running stream, and which are free to migrate from one estate to another. It may be otherwise in the case of ponds and enclosed waters artificially stocked with fish. Now, in the not infrequent case of a road or right of way following the course of a stream I should not, apart from the decisions, be able to come to the conclusion that a member of the public using the public way and casting his rod across the stream for trout was committing a trespass or invading a right. But the cases cited by the Lord Ordinary certainly establish the proposition that trout-fishing is in itself a subject of legal protection, and that the right of the riparian proprietor to the exclusive privilege of fishing does not depend altogether on his right to prevent trespassers from coming upon his lands. Indeed, it is impossible to read the opinions of the learned Judges who took part in those decisions without seeing that in their view a right to be on the bank of a stream, e.g., in the exercise of a public right of way, is a strictly limited right, and that the defence that the fisherman was fishing from a standpoint where he had a right to be would not be a relevant answer to an application for interdict against fishing in private waters.

Now, if the point to which I have spoken be admitted or established it appears to me that the claim of the defender Henry as one of the public must fail. His case is that the Spey is a navigable stream, that the right of navigation includes the lesser rights of fording, wading, or walking along the bank of the stream; and he contends that being lawfully on the stream or on the bank adjacent thereto he may fish for trout without invading proprietary rights. But it is not disputed that the pursuer, Mrs Grant, is proprietrix of the channel of the Spey to the medium filum ex adverso of her lands as well as of the bank. She sues as a riparian proprietor. The circumstance that the public have a right of navigation in the Spey does not take away the rights of the riparian proprietors in relation to the stream, but only obliges the proprietors not to use their rights in such a way as to interfere with the uses of navigation. This point is made perfectly clear by the judgment of the House of Lords in Orr Ewing & Co. v. Colquhoun's Trustees, 4 R. (H. L.) 116. The defender was not fishing from a boat, but supposing he were, I think that a fisherman fishing from a boat could not defend himself against an interdict by pleading that the Spey is a navigable stream, and that he was entitled to have his boat on it. In principle the fisherman in the case supposed would be in no better position than the angler using the riverside way and fishing from it. There is no authority for holding that the servitude or use of navigation carries any such accessory rights with it as are contended for. Such expressions of judicial opinion as we have on this subject are to the effect that a right of navigation in the case of a non-tidal river is a species of public way or a right ejusdem generis. No. 68.

Grant v. Henry.

While, therefore, I am not prepared to say that trout-fishing is a heritable estate, or anything more than an incident of the use of property, I am satisfied that we could not sustain the defences in this case without going counter to the authorities which recognise the right of a riparian proprietor to preserve his fishings.

I shall not add anything on the distinction between tidal and non-tidal rivers, because in the case of tidal rivers it is evident that the Crown alone has the right to restrain the public from fishing if such rights exist at all. It is not likely that the Crown would seek to interfere with the right claimed by the public to fish in tidal waters, but the question is not before us, and its solution obviously involves considerations which have no bearing on the right claimed in the name of the public to fish in the navigable part of the Spey.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Mitchell v.
Grierson.

Process—Summons—Competency—Two pursuers claiming separate damages in one action—Reparation—Slander—Issue.—Held (1) that it is competent for two persons alleging injury by one calumnious statement to claim damages in one action provided the damages due to each are separately concluded for; and (2) that in such an action each pursuer must take a separate issue.

ALEXANDER MITCHELL, agent of the Union Bank at Lerwick, and Charles D. Laurenson, agent of the Commercial Bank there, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Lerwick against James Cullen Grierson, solicitor in that town, praying the Court "to ordain the defender to pay to the pursuer the said Alexander Mitchell the sum of £500 sterling, and to pay to the pursuer the said Charles Duncan Laurenson the like sum of £500 sterling, with expenses." 1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Caithness,
Orkney, and Zetland.

After stating that they were Justices of the Peace, they averred that at a public meeting in the town hall of Lerwick, on 21st June 1893, in the presence of several persons, whom they named, the defender used the following words:—(Cond. 3) " . . . The Licensing Court had always been very amusing to him. He had appeared before that Court both for and against licences; and they used to size up the bench and say, 'Oh yes! This will be a day for licences, or it will be a day when none will be granted'; or they would say, 'Oh! you are right enough, you are a customer at Mr So-and-so's bank, and he's on the bench,' or 'So-and-so has two clients on the bench, his licence is quite sure.'" "The words quoted are of and concerning the pursuer Alexander Mitchell, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represent him as a person of unjust and dishonourable character, who had been unfaithful to the public trust reposed in him as a Justice of the Peace for the county of Zetland, and who had, in his official capacity, acted corruptly, for his personal benefit and that of his customers, by granting licences to persons who were his customers, with the object of securing their business to his bank; and they are also of and concerning the pursuer Charles Duncan Laurenson . . . " (then followed a repetition of the same innuendo as in the case of Mitchell).

The defender admitted that the statement of his remarks was substantially correct, but denied that they were directed against the pursuers, or either of them.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant.

On 6th November 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) allowed a proof.

The defender appealed for jury trial.

At the hearing the defender was allowed to add a plea that the action was incompetent.

A separate issue, in identical terms, was proposed by each pursuer, viz.:—"Whether, on or about 21st June 1893, in the town-hall, Lerwick, and in presence and hearing of [certain specified persons], or one or more of them, the defender uttered the following words, or words of like import and effect [here followed the statement quoted supra from cond. 3]; and whether the said statement is, in whole or in part, of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as a person of unjust and dishonourable character, who had been unfaithful to the public trust reposed in him as a Justice of the Peace, and had in his official position acted corruptly for his personal benefit, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

The defender argued;—There must be community of interest between different pursuers to entitle them to combine their claims in one action.¹ There was no such community here, for the expression alleged to be slanderous had reference only to a single person. Indeed, there was a possible conflict of interest, for one pursuer might fail and the other succeed, and the success of the one might injure the chances of the other. In *Harkes' case*² the words complained of were plural words, and might have hit both the pursuers in that action. That decision however was regarded as having gone as far as it was possible to go in sustaining the competency of such an action,³ and should not be followed unless the circumstances were identical.

Argued for the pursuers;—The case was ruled by Harkes,⁴ which was not distinguishable. It was evident that though in form of expression the slander here was directed against one person it might be meant to apply to several, and the pursuers averred that it did. The defect in *Gibson's case*¹ was that only one lump sum of damages was concluded for.

LORD PRESIDENT.—At the previous hearing of this case the opinion was indicated that the plea to relevancy could not be sustained.

We pass now to the consideration of the new point of the incompetency, and no doubt, if matters were open, there is a good deal to be said as to the proper shape, and the most convenient shape, in which claims for injuries arising to two persons out of the same wrong may be tried, but I do not see how we could get over Harkes v. Mowat. In that case the words alleged to be slanderous were plural words. Two persons came forward together who said, "These words apply to us, or, at all events, to one or other of us," and the Court allowed an issue affirming either that both were hit by the slander or one only. Turning to the present case, we find that the alleged slander purports to be a reflection on one person, but it is a common figure of speech to use the singular instead of the plural when the intention really is to hold a plurality of persons up to censure, just as it is not uncommon to have words used in the plural which are intended to be interpreted in the singular, where the speaker is willing to wound but afraid to strike. Accordingly I think the course taken by the pursuers is competent, and we shall follow the decision in Harkes v. Mowat by giving each pursuer an issue applying the slander to himself. They come here affirming that the slander is common to both, but also that it applies to each.

As to the issue, I must say that I think the pursuers are ill-advised to put in the issues that the words complained of represent them to be "persons of unjust and dishonourable character," for that is an innuendo not reasonably involved in what is said of them, and it would put upon them an unnecessary onus. As regards the remaining words, it is proposed that they should be as follows,— "Whether the said statement is in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer," and "falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as a person who had been unfaithful to the trust reposed in him as a Justice of the Peace."

Now, I think that a charge of infidelity on the part of a Justice of the Peace to the public trust is slanderous. But, then, these are very vague and general words, and the pursuer has very properly stated on record the kind of infidelity with which he supposes himself to be charged. He says he is accused of having preferred the interests of the customers of his bank to those of the public. The words of the issue as now proposed are so wide that if they stood alone there might be a danger of the jury returning a verdict on too general grounds. We are bound to put to them, or at anyrate it is highly convenient that there should be kept before them, the question whether the speech ascribes to the pursuers the conduct specified on the record, viz., whether it represents that the pursuers when on the bench kept before them the interests of their customers, and served them rather than the public. Accordingly, I think the issues should run as follows:—"Whether on or about 21st June 1893, in the Town-Hall, Lerwick, and in the presence and hearing of . . . or one or more of them, the defender uttered the following words, or words of like import and effect,— 'The Licensing Court had always been very amusing to him. He had appeared before that Court both for and against licences; and they used to size up the bench and say,— "Oh yes; this will be a day for licences—or it will be a day when none will be granted"; or they would say,— "Oh; you are right enough. You are a customer at Mr So-and-So's bank, and he's on the bench"; or "So-and-So has two clients on the bench, his licence is quite sure"; and whether the said statement is, in whole or in part, of and concerning the pursuer, . . . and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as a person who had been unfaithful to the public trust reposed in him as a Justice of the Peace, and had in his official position acted corruptly for the personal benefit of the customers of his bank, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

LORD ADAM.—As regards the competency, I cannot distinguish this case from that of Harkes v. Mowat, and I agree with your Lordship as regards the issue.

Mitchell v.
Grierson.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think the question of competency was a very fair one for argument, for undoubtedly in actions founded on delict delicate questions may arise as to the competency of different pursuers who claim each for his own interest combining their claims in one action. If it had been shewn that the defender could sustain any prejudice by the combination that would probably have been a reason for dismissing the action unless one of the pursuers should agree to withdraw his instance.

But I agree that the defender will be put to no disadvantage in this case, and that Harkes v. Mowat is a direct authority in favour of the competency.

In that case certain limitations were laid down which I think are very accurately expressed by Lord Kinnear, who says in Smyth v. Muir,—"It has been held in Harkes v. Mowat, 24 D. 701, that where two persons have sustained injuries by one and the same wrong they may insist for damages in the same action, provided the summons contains conclusions applicable separately to each pursuer, and that each takes a separate issue."

I also agree that the issue ought to be altered, so as to make the innuendo agree with the statement on record.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that we could not without serious consideration go further than Harkes v. Mowat in sustaining an action at the instance of two pursuers combining together to recover damages for injuries arising out of the same wrong, but I think that case is an authority which we are bound to follow, and I think it undistinguishable from the present.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency and approved a separate issue for each pursuer, in the terms set forth in the Lord President's opinion.

Trust—Resignation of trustees—Implied power to resign in trust-deed—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97).—A trust-disposition and settlement, which conferred no express power on the trustees to resign, contained a clause, declaring that upon any of the trustees resigning office and accounting for their intromissions, the remaining trustees should be bound to discharge them of their office. Held that the trustees had power to resign under the deed, and a petition for authority to resign refused as unnecessary.

1ST DIVISION.

MATTHEW ANDREW MUIR, ironfounder, Glasgow, died on 13th January 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 26th April 1876, and relative codicils, under which J. C. Bunten and others were nominated trustees. The deed contained a clause in the following terms:—"Declaring that upon any of the trustees, executors, tutors, and curators herein named, or to be nominated or assumed as aforesaid, resigning the said offices of trustee, executor, tutor, or curator, and accounting for his or their intromissions with my trust-estate, my remaining trustees or trustee, or if there be no remaining trustee, then the beneficiaries under the trust hereby created, are hereby empowered and shall be bound to discharge the persons or persons so resigning of his or their office or offices."

resign the office of trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am satisfied that there is a power to resign here. The clause in question plainly implies that resignation is an act which may be done by any one of the trustees, for it declares that, upon any trustee resigning, the remaining trustees shall be bound to discharge him of his office.

In these circumstances, we are not called upon to exercise the jurisdiction given us by the Trusts Act, and accordingly I think we should refuse the latter part of the prayer of the petition on that express ground.

LORD ADAM.—It is not—on the construction of this deed—of the slightest consequence whether the trustees are to receive legacies or not. I think it is a necessary implication from the clause in the trust-deed and settlement which was read to us that the truster contemplated and intended that the trustees nominated by him should have power to resign.

LORD M'LAREN.—There is here a power or direction to the remaining trustees, or the beneficiaries if there be no remaining trustee, to discharge any trustee who shall resign his office. Now, the hypothesis of the power is that any trustee may resign, and therefore he is to be discharged. But as the truster could enable any trustee to resign, the clause is equivalent to a power to resign with a right on the part of the trustee to be discharged of his actings. It is not necessary, therefore, to invoke the aid of the special statutory provisions with reference to the resignation of trustees.

LORD KINNAR.—The testator has given the trustees an absolute and unqualified power to demand a discharge in respect of their having resigned office. It is difficult to imagine a clearer expression of power to resign than that, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to grant the power which is prayed for under the statute.

THE COURT refused the petition as unnecessary, having regard to the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement.

Jurisdiction—Provident Society—Dispute between society and member—Reference clause—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 45), sec. 14.—The rules of a provident society provided that in the event of any dispute between a member of the society, or any person claiming through a member, and the society, it must be referred to a committee of the society.

In an action against the society at the instance of the executor-dative of a member to recover a sum alleged to be due by the society to the deceased, the defenders averred that in consequence of an arrangement made by the next of kin of the deceased, the pursuer was not entitled to claim the sum in question as his representative. They founded on the rule above mentioned, and pleaded

No. 71. that the Court had no jurisdiction. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that, as the defenders denied the pursuer's right to represent the deceased member, the question raised was not a dispute within the meaning of the rule, and that the jurisdiction of the Court was not ousted.

Ultra vires—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 45), sec. 11 (6).—By sec. 11 (6) of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, it is provided that "if any member of a society entitled to an interest in the society . . . dies intestate and without having made any nomination . . . such interest shall be . . . payable, without letters of administration, to or among the persons who appear to a majority of the committee, upon such evidence as they may deem satisfactory, to be entitled by law to receive the same . . ." A member of a society having died without having made any nomination, the society, on the representation of certain of the deceased's next of kin that one of their number had a better claim to the deceased's interest than the others, and that they were all agreeable that he should receive payment of the whole, made payment accordingly. Thereafter a next of kin, who denied that he had been a party to the alleged arrangement, having been appointed executor-dative, sued the society in that capacity for the amount of the deceased's interest. Held that the society had acted ultra vires in paying to one only of the next of kin, he not being the person "entitled by law" to receive payment, and that the pursuer was entitled to decree.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

MRS MARGARET SYMINGTON died intestate on 24th June 1892, predeceased by her husband and survived by several children, all of whom were in majority. Part of her estate consisted of a sum standing at her credit in the books of the Galashiels Co-operative Store Company, Limited.

In May 1893 her son, Robert Symington, who had been confirmed executor-dative, raised an action against the society for £53, 10s. (including £1, 3s. of dividend), which he averred was the amount of her interest in the society.

The defenders admitted that a sum of £49 stood at the credit of the deceased in their books at the time of her death.

They stated that their society was a provident society, registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, as amended by the Provident Nomination, &c. Act, 1883, and that the deceased had made no nomination under these statutes.*

* The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 45), sec. 11, enacts,—“Registered societies shall be entitled to the following privileges :— . . . (6) If any member of a society entitled to an interest in the society not exceeding £50 dies intestate, and without having made any nomination under this Act which remains unrevoked at his death, such interest shall be transferable or payable without letters of administration to or among the persons who appear to a majority of the committee, upon such evidence as they may deem satisfactory, to be entitled by law to receive the same.

“(7) Whenever the committee, after the decease of any member, make any payment or transfer to any person who at the time appears to them to be entitled under this section, the payment or transfer shall be valid and effectual against any demand made upon the committee or the society by any other person.”

The Provident Nominations and Small Intestacies Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 47), enacts, sec. 3, “. . . subsection 6 of section 11 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 . . . shall be read as if in the said” section of the said Act “the words £100 were substituted for the words £50.”

Sec. 9,—“All payments made by directors under the powers aforesaid shall be valid with respect to any demand of any other person as next of kin of a deceased member or as his lawful representative, or person claiming to be such representative, against the society or savings bank or the directors, but such next of kin, representative, or claimant shall have remedy for recovery of such

They further stated,—(Stat. 2) “After Mrs Symington’s funeral a meeting of her family was held, at which the pursuer was present. The whole of the other children of the deceased were also present, with the exception of two, one of whom was in New Zealand. The deceased was a widow, and having died intestate, her said children were entitled, equally among them, to her moveable estate. At said meeting it was proposed and agreed to by all the members of the family present that the whole sum standing at the credit of and belonging to the deceased in the books of the said store should be paid to her youngest son George, for his own exclusive use and behoof, he having contributed more largely than the others to the support of his mother. This arrangement was expressly sanctioned by the pursuer. Thereafter the eldest son of the deceased and the said George Symington came to the store and explained to the secretary that an agreement had been made among the next of kin of the deceased whereby the said George Symington was to receive the money standing at his mother’s credit in the books of the store, and requested that it might be paid to him accordingly. The application was submitted to the committee, and as they were satisfied, from the statements made to them, that the said George Symington was entitled to receive the money, they sanctioned payment thereof to him. The money was accordingly paid to him. . . . The foresaid agreement was communicated to the two absent children, and was approved of and homologated by them. . . . The whole of the next of kin of the deceased, with the exception of the pursuer, have now no desire to disturb the family arrangement above narrated.”

They also stated;—“The present action was raised by the pursuer without any notice to the defenders, and he has taken no steps to refer the claim now made to the committee of the society, to a general meeting, or to arbiters as above provided.”*

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defences being irrelevant . . . should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction. (5) The sum at the credit of the deceased in the books of the said store having been properly paid by the defenders to the person who appeared to them to be entitled to receive it, and who was in point of fact so entitled, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 10th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced money so paid as aforesaid against the person or persons who shall have received the same.”

* The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 45), enacts, sec. 14,—“With respect to disputes concerning registered societies the following provisions shall have effect:—(1) Every dispute between a member or person claiming through a member, or under the rules of a registered society, and the society or an officer thereof, shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society if they contain any such direction, and the decision so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal, and shall not be removable into any Court of law or restrainable by injunction, and application for the enforcement thereof may be made to the County Court.”

By rule 28 of the rules of the defenders’ society it was provided that “in the event of any dispute between a member, or person claiming through a member, and the society, or an officer thereof, it shall be referred to a committee, from whom an appeal may be taken to a general meeting of the company. In the event of the dispute not being settled by the meeting, recourse shall be had to arbitration as follows:—Three neutral individuals shall be chosen by each party, whose names shall be written on pieces of paper and placed in a box or glass, and the three first drawn out by the complaining party, or by someone appointed by him, shall be the arbitrators to decide the matter in difference.”

the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the question at issue between the parties involves a dispute between the society and a person claiming through a member in the sense of the society's rules, and that in terms thereof the said dispute falls to be determined in manner provided by the said rules: Therefore sists process in hoc statu to enable the pursuer to take steps, if so advised, for the purpose of having the said dispute determined in terms of the rules, reserving to either party to move, on such determination being obtained, to have such decree pronounced as may be necessary for enforcing the same."*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—Jurisdiction.—The dispute was not a dispute between the society and a member or a person claiming through a member, but between the society and a stranger, for the defenders expressly denied the pursuer's right to represent the deceased member. The question first to be decided was whether that contention was well founded or not. The reference clause, accordingly, did not apply,

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case is the executor-dative of the late Mrs Symington. The defenders are a provident society, registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act of 1876. The object of the action is to recover a sum of £52, 10s., said to be standing at the credit of the deceased in the books of the society, she having been a member of the society at her death. The defence is that to the extent of £3, 10s., there was a counter-debit of the deceased in the books, and that as regards the balance of £49, it was paid away to certain relatives of the deceased, in conformity with certain powers vested in the committee of the society by the Industrial and Provident Societies Statutes. In short, the defence is that the society has been well discharged of all sums due to the deceased, so that the pursuer as her representative has no claim upon the society's funds.

"Such is, on the merits, the dispute between the parties, but what I have at present to decide is, whether that dispute falls to be determined in this Court, or falls to be referred to what is called arbitration in terms of a rule of the society duly made under the Act, and which rule is in the following terms: 'In the event of any dispute between a member, or person claiming through a member, and the society, or an officer thereof, it shall be referred to the committee, from whom an appeal may be taken to a general meeting of the company. In the event of the dispute not being settled by the meeting, recourse shall be had to arbitration as follows: Three neutral individuals shall be chosen by each party, whose names shall be written on pieces of paper and placed in a box or glass, and the three first drawn out by the complaining party, or by someone appointed by him, shall be the arbitrators to decide the matter in difference.'

"The defenders say that that rule excludes the jurisdiction of this Court. The pursuer, on the other hand, contends that the dispute in question is not a dispute falling under the rule. I have not been able to find any sufficient ground for holding that the rule is inapplicable. I think that the pursuer is, undoubtedly, a person claiming through a member, and that there is here a dispute between him and the society, that dispute being, whether the society has been well discharged of the sums due to a deceased member. That being so, I think the rule is in terms applicable, and I do not feel justified in passing it by, because the mode of settlement of the dispute provided is cumbrous and scarcely appropriate. I do not say the action is, necessarily, excluded. It may remain in Court for the purpose of enforcing the decision when the decision is obtained, but, in my opinion, I have no power to decide the dispute, and all I can do is to sist process, that the pursuer may betake himself to the remedy afforded by the rule. When he has got a decision, and requires to enforce it, he may come back and obtain decree in terms of the decision. That is the procedure which has been recognised in various decisions in this Court, and I, therefore, do not dismiss the action, but simply make a finding to the effect that the dispute falls under the clause in the rules, and sist process accordingly."

and the jurisdiction of the Court was not ousted.¹ Further, the committee having already decided the question which, according to the defenders, would fall to be referred, were disqualified from acting as arbiters.² On the merits.—The defenders on their own statement had acted ultra vires, for they had knowingly paid over the money to a person who was not the person “entitled by law” to receive it. The whole next of kin were not said to have been parties to the alleged agreement, and the majority could not bind a minority of their number.

Argued for the defenders;—Jurisdiction.—The pursuer's only title to sue was as executor of a deceased member, and therefore he was clearly “a person claiming through a member”; he was within the express definition of that term given in the interpretation clause of the 1876 Act.³ The jurisdiction of the Court, therefore, was ousted.⁴ Even when the aid of a Court of law had to be invoked, the Act, section 14 (5) directed that applications should be made not to the Supreme Court but to the Sheriff Court. The Lord Ordinary ought therefore to have assoilized the defenders or dismissed the action, and not merely sisted process. Though the matter might have been already before the committee, that did not disqualify them from acting as arbiters.⁵ On the merits.—The next of kin who had consented took upon themselves the burden of obtaining the consent of the others. The defenders were safeguarded by section 11, subsections 6 and 7. The persons on whose representation the money had been paid were all entitled in law to receive it, being next of kin, though they did not exhaust that class, and the defenders were warranted in acting as they did by the terms of section 11, which was meant to dispense with the necessity of a formal title to discharge.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mrs Symington was at the date of her death a member of the Galashiels Co-operative Store Company, Limited. There is no dispute as to her having been entitled at her death to the sums mentioned on record. The pursuer is her executor; he claims the money, and has brought this action to recover it. The answer made to this claim on its merits is that the society has already paid away the money to someone else, and that they were entitled to do so under section 11, subsection 6, of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876.

The defenders first plead that the dispute between them and the pursuer is one from which the jurisdiction of Courts of law is excluded, and the soundness of this plea is what we have to determine.

Now, the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, allows each society to set up a particular mode of determining disputes between the society and its members, and the decision arrived at in this manner is to exclude the jurisdiction of the Courts of law. According to the rules of this particular society the dispute would first be considered by a committee, on appeal by a general meeting of the society, and if the dispute is not settled by the meeting, then arbiters are appointed in a specified way, and they finally decide the dispute. The question, then, is whether the dispute between the pursuer and the defender is one to be settled in this way.

Now, the scheme of the statute and its words make it plain that the tribunal is a domestic tribunal for the settlement of questions within the society. Given a member (or a person claiming through a member) and the society as disputants, and they are not to go to a Court of law for the settlement of their relative rights. But then the contention of the society here is that the pursuer is not a member, and has no claim though a member; in short, they deny that they have any relation to him at all. Now, I do not see how they can, at one and the same time, assert him to be a stranger, and hale him into their domestic tribunal in order to establish this against him. The two cases of Prentice and Willis, cited for the pursuer, shew that the English Courts hold that the exclusion of the Courts does not apply where the substance of the question is whether the litigant opposed to the society has or has not the rights of a member. In my opinion this principle is sound, and applies to the present case.

Holding, then, that we are to judge of the dispute, I proceed to consider it.

Now, as I have said, there is no question as to the rights of the deceased member, and the only question is, who has now got them. The case of the defenders is rested solely on section 11, subsection 6, of the Act of 1876, and what they say they have done under it. That provision is plainly intended to save the expense of requiring strict legal evidence of propinquity or title in the case of small successions which could not well afford such expense. It in no way at all alters the legal succession, or allows the society to alter it, or authorises them to pick and choose among those known to them to be the legal successors of the deceased. If they find the legal representatives, or think they have found them, on such evidence as satisfies a majority of the committee, then they may pay to those persons without liability to pay over again in case of mistake. But, if they first find the legal representatives, and then do not pay to them, but only to some of them without authority of the rest, such a proceeding is, in my judgment, wholly unauthorised by the section.

Yet this is exactly what the defenders say that they did. They begin by saying that the committee knew that one of the next of kin of Mrs Symington was in New Zealand, and then they go on to say that those of the next of kin who were at home, save one who was absent, decided that one of themselves should get the whole, and on these media the committee paid over the whole to this person, four days after the death. In my opinion this cannot be brought under the section, and was quite illegal.

In the only dispute, therefore, between the parties, which we have heard of, my judgment goes for the pursuer. I do not observe any plea for the defenders which would remain standing, and apparently it may not be necessary to send the case to the Outer-House, as we could now give decree. But counsel will tell us.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship, and upon the same grounds. But I am also disposed to think that there are reasons for arriving at the same result, even assuming that the pursuer here is to be treated as a member of the society.

Now, in order to ascertain whether the question or dispute is one which ought to be determined in the manner provided by the society's rules, it is necessary to see what that alleged question or dispute is. Now the pursuer in this case, as Mrs Symington's executor, sues for payment of a sum of £53, 10s. alleged to have been due to her by this society. As regards at least £49 the defenders do not deny that they were due that sum to her but they seek to discharge themselves by saying that they paid away that sum to her son George. And they do not say that they paid this sum to him because they were satisfied that he represented her, or was otherwise entitled by law to discharge it, but because certain members of the family present at a family meeting agreed that it should be paid to him. What they say is that, whether that payment was rightly or wrongly made, it is protected from challenge by the provisions of the 6th and 7th subsections of section 11 of the Societies Act, and also by the amending Act of 1883, which raised the privilege as to members dying entitled to an interest in a society to £100. Of course the claim here being for £53, 10s. requires the assistance of the latter Act to bring it within the provisions of the former Act. Now, I think the construction of that Act is not a question for the determination of the society. The construction of the Act is for the Court, and if it should appear that the act of the society is not protected by this clause, then I think the result is that it is a payment merely gratuitous of the society, and it must be so treated in this case. Now, I agree with your Lordship in the construction of the 6th subsection of section 11 of the Act of 1876. It is clear then that the payment referred to must be made to persons appearing entitled by law to receive it. It is clear to me that the persons entitled by law to receive it are the legal representatives of the deceased. And, as your Lordship has pointed out the object of the Act is simply this, that the society, on evidence deemed satisfactory to them, may dispense with a formal title, or as it is called in the Act "letters of administration," or a similar title which would be necessary in this country.

That is the object of the Act, and it appears to me that it does not go beyond that. I think that becomes clearer if we look to the amending Act of 1883, which says this,—“All payments made by directors under the powers aforesaid shall be valid with respect to any demand of any other person, as next of kin of a deceased member, or as his lawful representative, or person claiming to be such representative, against the society,”—that is to say, if for such payments there has been a claim made by a person as next of kin or lawful representative, or person claiming to be such representative.

And it says if any “other” person comes forward claiming as next of kin, or as lawful representative, or as administrator-at-law, then such other person claiming the sum paid shall not be entitled to recover. The payments protected are payments made to parties entitled by law, or who the members of the society think, after satisfactory evidence has been produced to them, are persons entitled by law to receive the payment. Now, if that is the true construction of the Act, the claim of any other person claiming, not as being entitled by law, but in any other capacity, is not within the protecting clauses of the Act. Now, the payment here is not alleged to have been made to George Symington, because evidence was produced to the society that he was a person entitled by law to receive it; that is, to receive it as a representative of the deceased. What the defenders say is that they paid it to him because they were satisfied that he was entitled to it under a family agreement. But, as your Lordship has pointed out, it was never intended by the statute to make the society judges as to whether such an agreement was valid or invalid. The statute never contemplated making the society the judge of competing claims arising under private agreements. Now, if that be so, the question is, what is here the dispute that is proposed to be referred to settlement under the society's rules? There is no dispute as to the sum having been due to Mrs Symington. That is admitted upon record. Is it a dispute as to whether or not this is a valid claim? But, as I have pointed out, that question depends entirely on the construction of the statute, and therefore that is a matter which is to be decided not by the society but by the Court. On these grounds, I should be disposed, if necessary, to come to the conclusion that, assuming this pursuer to be a member of the society, yet nevertheless there is no dispute between him and the defenders which falls to be determined by the society.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. The executor of a deceased member of this society claims from the society the money due to the deceased. The only answer made by the defenders is that they have already paid away the money to someone else; that their Act of Parliament entitled them to make that payment; and that according to their own rules, passed in accordance with the Act, they are the final judges of the question whether they were right or wrong in so doing. Now, before we give effect to that argument, we must be satisfied that the Legislature intended to give the defenders this arbitrary power of judging in their own cause, and determining the extent of their own liabilities. I think, with your Lordships, that the clause on which they found has no application to a controversy of this kind, but that it is intended to provide a method for regulating internal disputes between members of this society as such, and the society or governing body of the society. But before that clause can be brought into operation, it must first be shewn that the controversy, to which it is proposed to apply it, is really a dispute between a member of the society as such and the society.

Now, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the first question in controversy in this case is, whether the pursuer has or has not the rights of a member of this society,—whether he is entitled to claim in the right of the deceased member or not. But that is not a question between the society and a member, but a question whether the person is or is not entitled to the rights of a member. I think the case of Prentice, to which your Lordship has referred, is directly in point; and concurring entirely, both with the reasoning of the learned Judges in that case and with the observations of your Lordship in the chair, I have no difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion.

Upon the merits of the question—on the construction of the 11th section of the Act of 1876—I also concur. I do not think that that Act was intended to give to this company a power to select among the representatives of the deceased person, and to pay to one of them to the exclusion of another. That is exactly what they say they have done, because they set out quite clearly that they knew that the deceased had died leaving various children, but that they, in consideration of the statement of certain members of the family that one of them had a better claim than the others to the money left by his mother, gave effect to that consideration, and conferred a benefit upon this favoured brother without the consent or knowledge of the pursuer. I think, in doing so, they were going entirely beyond their powers. They were bound to pay to persons having a legal right as representatives of the deceased member. They may in certain circumstances be protected against defects of title in the persons to whom they have paid in that character, but that does not entitle them to pay to one money which they knew belonged to another.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Cook, have you any reason to offer against our pronouncing decree on the footing of the judgment?

Cook.—No, I do not think I can offer any.

THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—

No. 72.
Jan. 16, 1894.
Buchan v.
North British
Railway Co.

Reparation—Slander—Bills posted up in stations by railway company setting forth convictions for offences against company.—A railway company is not liable in damages for slander by posting up in its stations bills announcing the names and addresses of persons who have been convicted of the offence of travelling without having previously paid the fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or of other offences against the company's acts and bye-laws, together with the date and nature of the offence and the result of the conviction.

IN September 1893 William Buchan, traveller, agent, and collector, 21 Arthur Street, Pilrig, Leith, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against the North British Railway Company for payment of £500.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "On the 13th August 1892 the Sheriff-substitute, within the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh, on the evidence solely of the defenders' servants, convicted the pursuer of having contravened the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96, and the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, sec. 5, subsec. 3 (a), by travelling on the North British Railway from Kirkcaldy to Haymarket without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, and fined him 5s. 6d. and costs, with the option of twenty days' imprisonment. Said conviction was bad in point of law, and was not warranted by the evidence; but the pursuer, in order to avoid the publicity of an appeal, at once paid the fine and expenses in the belief that the proceedings against him were then at an end. This prosecution was in reality instigated by the manager or agent of the defenders, and he supplied all the evidence upon which the conviction was obtained. The pursuer defended himself, and in the course of the trial proved in open Court the illegal, unwarrantable, and violent conduct of the defenders' servants in assaulting him and rifling his pockets, as before mentioned; and in consequence of this, and of his threat to raise an action against the defenders for said illegal conduct, the defenders' said manager or agent conceived malice and ill-will towards the pursuer, which he gratified in the oppressive proceedings after mentioned." (Cond. 4) "Towards the end of February and beginning of March 1893, about six months after said conviction, the defenders' agent or manager wrongfully and maliciously set about publishing such conviction against the pursuer in order to gratify his said feelings of malice and ill-will, and to ruin pursuer's business as a traveller, agent, and collector foreshaid. To accomplish this the defenders' said manager wrongfully and maliciously printed and

Name and Address.	Date and Nature of Offence.	Result of Conviction.
William Buchan, Canvasser and Collector, 21 Arthur Street, Pilrig, Edinburgh.	Travelling from Kirkcaldy Station to Haymarket Station without having previously paid the Fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof. 31st May 1892.	Fined Five Shillings and Sixpence, with Thirty-Four Shillings and Sixpence of costs, or twenty days' imprisonment. Sheriff Court, Edinburgh, 13th August 1892.

There then follows a list of the names of several offenders against the company's bye-laws; but the pursuer's name and address were maliciously placed at the top of said bill in order the more readily to arrest the attention of the public. . . .” (Cond. 5) “Said bill was posted up in all the principal stations on the defenders' railway system, . . . and remained and in some stations remains still posted up, and was and is still read by the public. Pursuer's name and address and the conviction against him were inserted in said bill under the pretence of a caution to the public; but in point of fact this insertion was made maliciously in order to rake up said conviction against the pursuer and injure him in the eyes of the public by representing that he had defrauded the defenders. The defenders have been repeatedly requested to stop the publication of said bill, but they maliciously decline to do so.” (Cond. 6) “In consequence of the publication of said bill throughout Scotland the pursuer has suffered great loss, injury, and damage in his business as a traveller, agent, and collector. . . . He has also suffered in his feelings and reputation in consequence of the persistent and malicious publication of the said conviction. . . .”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the wrongful and malicious publication of the bill condescended on is entitled to reparation.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and the action should be dismissed.

On 23d November the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) pronounced this interlocutor;—“Finds that the pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the libel; therefore sustains the defenders' first plea in law, dismisses the action, and decerns.”

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—No doubt the publication of proceedings in a Court of Justice was in the ordinary case privileged, if fair and accurate; but this was not the ordinary case. The object of the publication, which took place six months after the proceedings, was not to enable the public to see that justice was done, which was the ground on which such publications were held to be privileged, but, as the pursuer averred, to gratify the malice of the defenders against the pursuer, and to injure him in the eyes of the public. An accurate report of proceedings in a Court of Justice¹ was not privileged if published with malice.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case do not seem to me to be in the slightest degree in doubt. Both parties are agreed as to them. The pursuer was accused of an offence against the Railway Acts, and he was tried and convicted of that offence. All that the railway company have done is to announce shortly in a bill, put up in certain of their stations, the fact that the pursuer was convicted and fined for the offence. It certainly is according to the usual practice for railway companies all over the country to put up such notices in their stations. Here it is said that the pursuer is entitled to take objection to the railway company publishing facts which he does not deny, and he accuses the railway company of acting maliciously in doing so. But the case appears to me not to raise a question of privilege at all. This bill is just an announcement by the railway company of facts connected with its own business, namely, that they, in pursuance of a statutory bye-law, prosecuted the pursuer for a breach of it, and that he was convicted and fined. In these circumstances, I think it is out of the question that the pursuer should be allowed an issue at all as for publication of a libel, and I am of opinion that the action is irrelevant.

* The company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, as a company limited by shares, on 7th March 1889, for the purpose of carrying on the business of a temperance restaurant at 129 Princes Street, Edinburgh, with power, inter alia, to borrow money and to grant bonds and dispositions in security over its heritable property.

Its capital was £11,224 in shares of £1 each. Of these 9224 were A or preference shares, and 2000 were B or postponed shares. Of the A shares only 7910 were subscribed at the date of the petition. The B shares were wholly issued, having been allocated as part payment of the heritable property, plant, and goodwill of the business taken over by the company.

Section 17 of the articles of association provided that, "The said A or preference shares, so far as issued for the time, shall be entitled to a preferential cumulative dividend on the amount paid up thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, before any dividend is payable on the said sum of £2000 of B shares; but on the clear profit being sufficient, after providing to the satisfaction of the directors for depreciation and other contingencies, the said cumulative dividend, and a dividend at the same rate on the B or postponed shares, the whole of the said A and B shares shall be entitled to draw a dividend at the same rate, and the B shares shall in that event be entitled to participate rateably along with the A shares in the profits of the company; provided always that the directors shall be entitled to set aside a sum not exceeding £150 a-year out of the profits of the company, after paying the 5 per cent divi-

* The Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 9, enacts,—
"Any company limited by shares may, by special resolution, so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum of association, if authorised so to do by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution, as to reduce its capital; but no such resolution for reducing the capital of any Company shall come into operation until an order of the Court is registered by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, as is hereinafter mentioned."

Section 10 enacts,—
"The company shall, after the date of the passing of any special resolution for reducing its capital, add to its name, until such date as the Court may fix, the words 'and reduced' as the last words to its name, and those words shall, until such date, be deemed to be part of the name of the company within the meaning of the principal Act."

By section 11 of the said Act it is enacted that,— "A company which has passed a special resolution for reducing its capital may apply to the Court by petition for an order confirming the reduction; and on the hearing of the petition the Court, if satisfied that with respect to every creditor of the company who under the provisions of this Act is entitled to object to the reduction either his consent to the reduction has been obtained or his debt or claim has been discharged or has determined, or has been secured as hereinafter provided, may make an order confirming the reduction on such terms and subject to such conditions as it deems fit."

The Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 3, enacts,—
"The word 'capital,' as used in the Companies Act, 1867, shall include paid-up capital; and the power to reduce capital conferred by that Act shall include a power to cancel any lost capital, or any capital unrepresented by available assets, or to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company, and paid-up capital may be reduced either with or without extinguishing or reducing the liability (if any), remaining on the shares of the company, and to the extent to which such liability is not extinguished or reduced it shall be deemed to be preserved, notwithstanding anything contained in the Companies Act, 1867."

The following was the special resolution:—"That the capital of the company be reduced from £11,224, divided into 9224 'A' or preference shares of £1 each, and 2000 'B' or postponed shares of £1 each, to 9224 'A' or preference shares of £1 each; and that the said reduction be, with the consent of the holder of the said 2000 'B' or postponed shares, effected (1) by the cancelment, as being unrepresented by available assets, of 8s. per share of the said 2000 'B' or postponed shares; and (2) by paying off, as being in excess of the wants of the company, of 12s. per share of the said 2000 'B' or postponed shares."

The minute proposed to be registered was as follows:—"The capital of the West End Café Company, Limited, is £9224, divided into 9224 'A' or preference shares of £1 each. At the date of registration of this minute, 7910 of the said 9224 shares have been issued, and the sum of £1 is paid upon each of said 7910 shares."

The petitioner stated;—"The B shares are all held by Mr George Stewart. The company has been gradually making a business, which it is believed is now on the eve of being fairly profitable."

On 14th November the Court remitted to Mr William Traquair, junior, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital.

Mr Traquair reported, inter alia, as follows:—"From the balance-sheets of the company it appears that, in the four completed years of its working, the company has paid only an aggregate dividend of 7 per cent on the A shares as issued, thus leaving a balance of 13 per cent for those years still due to the holders of the A shares. It appears also that no reserve fund has been accumulated, although a considerable sum has each year been written off for depreciation.

"In these circumstances it appeared to the directors and certain of the shareholders that it would be desirable that the B shares should be acquired in the interests of the A shareholders. Negotiations were therefore entered into between the company and the sole holder of the said B shares, with the result that the (provisional) minute of agreement, No. 6 of process, was entered into. By this minute the holder of these shares agreed on certain conditions to give them up to the company for the sum of £1200. For carrying out this arrangement it was suggested that the capital of the company should be reduced in terms of the 9th section of the Act of 1867, as construed by the 3d section of the Act 1877. . . ."

"It will be observed by your Lordships that the special resolution for reduction of capital above quoted proposes to deal with only one class of shares, viz., the B or postponed shares, allocating to it both the loss and the so-called excess of capital. The allocation by a company of the whole excess of its capital to one class of shares seems to your reporter an unusual proceeding, especially where the effect of so doing is to pay the apparent full market value for such shares. Your reporter has been informed that the money required to repay the holder of the B shares the so-called excess of capital is to be obtained by borrowing on the security of the heritable property of the company. This loan, however, it is said, will bear a less rate of interest than the dividend which the holder of the B shares might be ultimately entitled to draw. But the 'A' shareholders appeared satisfied with the expediency of the step, and

No. 73. the holder of the B shares acquiesces in it. The creditors of the company are either heritably secured, or are trade creditors whose debts have been incurred since the date of the petition, and are paid monthly. It is therefore maintained by the petitioners that no one has any interest to object to the proposed reduction.

"Your reporter is of opinion that the proceedings have been regular. He further finds that there is no diminution of liability in respect of unpaid capital, or interference with the rights of creditors.

"Your reporter has not been able to find a case similar to the present, nor have the agents for the petitioners been able to refer him to any. If, however, your Lordships are satisfied that a loan such as is proposed can be held to constitute excess of capital in terms of the Act, and that the Act permits the payment of such excess of capital to one class of shareholders only, then it appears to your reporter that the prayer of the petition may be granted."

The reporter further reported that in his opinion the Court might altogether dispense with the addition of the words "and reduced."

AFTER hearing counsel on the petition and the report the Court pronounced an interlocutor approving the report, confirming the reduction of capital resolved on, and dispensing with the addition of the words "and reduced" to the company's name from and after 31st March next.

Company—Constitution—Alteration of Memorandum of Association—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 62), sec 1.—A company incorporated in 1866 under the Companies Act, 1862, presented a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, for confirmation of a special resolution of the company altering its memorandum of association by giving it power to acquire and pay for the business of any other company carrying on any business which the company might legally carry on; to sell the business or property of the company; and to amalgamate with any other company in the United Kingdom established for objects similar to its own. "That the provisions of the memorandum of association of the company, with respect to the objects of the company, be altered by adding the following to section 3, immediately before the words 'and the doing of all such other things,' &c., viz. :—

"(e) To buy or acquire the business, property, or undertaking of any other company or partnership carrying on any business which the company may legally carry on, and to pay for such business, property, or undertaking in cash or in shares, stock, debentures, or debenture stock of the company, or partly in each of such modes.

"(f) To sell, dispose of, or transfer the business, property, and undertaking of the company, or any branch or part thereof, in consideration of payment in cash, or in shares, or stock, or in debentures or debenture stock, or other securities of any other company, or partly in each of such modes of payment, or for such other consideration as may be deemed proper, and to distribute the price, howsoever paid, among the members in satisfaction of their interest in the assets of the company.

"(g) To amalgamate with any other company in the United Kingdom established for objects similar to any of those for which the company is established."

The petitioners averred;—"The said alteration is required to enable the company to carry out the first four purposes specified in section 1, subsection 5, of the said statute."

On 15th November 1893, the Court remitted to Mr Charles E. Loudon, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings and reasons for the alterations proposed of the memorandum of association.

Mr Loudon reported, inter alia, as follows:—

"Article (e) is a power usually inserted in modern memoranda of

* The Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 62), section 1, enacts,—“(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, may, by special resolution, alter the provisions of its memorandum of association or deed of settlement with respect to the objects of the company, so far as may be required for any of the purposes hereinafter specified, or alter the form of its constitution by substituting a memorandum and articles of association for a deed of settlement, either with or without any such alteration as aforesaid, with respect to the objects of the company; but in no case shall any such alteration take effect until confirmed on petition by the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company. . . .

"(5) The Court may confirm, either wholly or in part, any such alteration as aforesaid with respect to the objects of the company, if it appears that the alteration is required in order to enable the company—(a) to carry on its business more economically or more efficiently; or (b) to attain its main purpose by new or improved means; or (c) to enlarge or change the local area of its operations; or (d) to carry on some business or businesses which, under existing circumstances, may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or (e) to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association or deed of settlement."

association, and is one which might be of great advantage to the company, while the absence of it might seriously hamper the company in the successful conduct of its business.

"Article (f) Although a similar power is usually inserted in modern memoranda of association, and although it might be of great benefit, yet the alteration undoubtedly confers very wide powers upon the directors, and I am not satisfied that it is required by the company in terms of the Act. But even admitting that the alteration is entirely for the advantage of the company, yet I am of opinion that it does not fall within section 1, subsection 5, and is therefore incompetent.

"Article (g) is also a general power usually inserted in modern memoranda of association, and the petitioners have explained to me that although at present amalgamation is usually carried out by way of sale or of purchase, and the liquidation of one of the two amalgamating companies, yet the power to amalgamate is found to be helpful in the preliminary negotiations incident to such a step.

"With regard to articles (e) and (g), I am doubtful whether alterations conferring powers of a general kind are such as were contemplated by the statute, and I venture respectfully to submit the question for your Lordships' consideration. Apart from this question, the reasons for the alterations appear to me to be satisfactory."

THE COURT refused to confirm the proposed alterations contained in articles (e), (f), and (g), expressing opinions that the Act did not contemplate that such general powers should be conferred before the necessity for using them arose, but that the Court would consider any special transaction which the company might wish to carry out under such articles.

MISS KATHERINE A. MACPHERSON, First Party.—Mackay—Macphail.
PATRICK SELLAR (Miss Jane Macpherson's Curator Bonis), Second Party.
—Dundas—M'Clure.

Succession—Trust—Precatory bequests—Bequest to A "for the benefit of herself and of B."—Held that under a bequest "to A for the benefit of herself and of her sister B," each sister had a vested beneficial right in fee to one-half of the bequest, but that A was bound to retain B's share during their joint lives as trustee for her.

MISS ROBINA YOUNG died in Edinburgh on 13th March 1893, leaving a holograph will dated 30th June 1872.

The will contained the following provision,—“Also I give and bequeath to Katherine Alexandrina Macpherson, for the benefit of herself and of her sister Jane Macpherson, both daughters of the aforesaid Agnes Young or Macpherson, all the cash moneys, securities for money, books, wardrobe, and all the rest, remainder, and residue of my estate which I may be possessed of at the time of my decease.”

A third party was nominated trustee and executor under the will.

Miss Jane Macpherson, mentioned in the will, had been all her life weak mentally, and incapable of doing anything to earn a livelihood, and was entirely dependent on those with whom she resided for ordinary personal comfort. These facts were known to Miss Young. After the date of the will, but before Miss Young's death, Mr Sellar was appointed by the Court curator bonis to Miss Jane Macpherson.

Doubts having arisen as to the effect of the bequest to Katherine and Jane Macpherson, a special case was presented to the Court in which the above facts were stated, and to which Miss Katherine Macpherson was the first party, and Mr Sellar as curator bonis to Miss Jane Macpherson the second party.

No. 75.

Jan. 17, 1894.
Macpherson v.
Macpherson's
Curator Bonis.

The following questions were, inter alia, submitted to the Court:—“(1) Whether under the foressaid bequest in the will of Miss Robina Young, the subjects and residue of her estate thereby bequeathed belong absolutely to Miss Katherine Alexandrina Macpherson, she having the discretion of applying them in so far as she may find to be necessary for behoof of her sister without any interference on the part of third parties? or (2) Whether Miss Katherine Alexandrina Macpherson and Miss Jane Macpherson are each entitled to one-half of the said bequest absolutely, Miss Jane Macpherson's half being retained by her sister Miss Katherine Alexandrina Macpherson during their joint lives, as trustee for her, and to be administered by her for Miss Jane's behoof?”

The first party maintained that, by the foressaid bequest to her “for the benefit of herself and her sister Jane Macpherson,” the subjects and residue bequeathed were given absolutely to her, she having the discretion of applying them, in so far as she might find to be necessary, on behalf of her sister, and that she was entitled to dispose of the whole or any part thereof, either inter vivos or by will or other mortis causa deed, even in the event of her sister surviving her, it being left to her discretion to make after her death, as well as during her life, such provision as she might think expedient for her sister. The bequest was precatory, and no trust was created in her.

Counsel for the second party were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there is no doubt as to the rights of these two ladies. They are equal, giving them an equal interest in the funds in question.

In expression, and setting aside the fact of one of them being, as we were told, of weak mind, there is nothing but parity in the rights of the two. The bequest is for the benefit of Katherine and of her sister Jane, both daughters of Mrs Macpherson. The truster chose one rather than the other as trustee, but she is careful to equalise the rights of the trustee with those of the other beneficiary. Now, when we turn to the statement of facts, which is said to displace the natural meaning to be given to the words used, we find an excellent reason for Katherine being chosen as administrator, but it does not go beyond that.

I am of opinion that the beneficiary rights are equal, and that the second question, although somewhat peculiarly expressed, contains a substantially correct statement of the rights of parties, and should accordingly be answered in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question raised is whether the gift imports an absolute gift to Katherine, or whether it is a trust in her for the benefit of herself and her sister. It was suggested, as the result of recent decisions in England, that the Court should construe the expression used very critically, and that if its meaning is of a doubtful character should not construe it as importing a trust. I do not think it is necessary in this case to consider very carefully the law of England, which I have always supposed to be in this matter the same as that of Scotland, but I would point out that our law requires no special or technical words in order to constitute a trust. If there is an appointment of a beneficiary, and if some person is charged with the administration of the funds beneficially destined, we have the essentials of a trust. If there is a clear indication

No. 75. of a trust to be constituted it is immaterial whether the words "in trust for," or "for the benefit of," or "for behoof of," or other similar words be used. Of all expressions other than "in trust for" I should have thought the words "for the benefit of" A the clearest, because it is equivalent to a declaration that A is a beneficiary in the estate given to B. In this case no distinction is drawn between the extent of the interest to be taken by the two nieces. Katherine, it is true, was not constituted an executor; another executor is named at the end of the will. That executor would cease to act when the estate was realised. The testator did not continue him as trustee probably because she did not expect to leave a large fortune. No trust therefore was constituted in the normal way, but as Jane was unable to attend to business or to administer her share, an informal trust was constituted in the person of Katherine to administer it for her.

Jan. 17, 1894.
Macpherson v.
Macpherson's
Curator Bonis.

It is impossible to maintain that there was not here a qualified gift, and the result is that Katherine holds as trustee for herself and her sister.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. If this bequest is read without reference to the special circumstances of this case it is clear that the beneficial interest given by the testator to Katherine and Jane was exactly the same, and given in the same words. There is nothing to suggest a distinction between the two. It is a bequest to Katherine for herself and her sister. There is prima facie no apparent reason why the bequest should be paid to Katherine rather than to Jane. But when we turn to the statement of facts we find circumstances requiring us to put a somewhat different complexion upon the matter. We are there told that Jane is rather weakminded, and dependent on others for ordinary personal comfort, although no curator bonis had, when this will was made, been appointed to her. There is thus a distinct averment that one of the legatees is not a proper person to administer money, but it is not said that her mental condition makes her incapable of the enjoyment of money. We have then an intelligible reason for Katherine being chosen as trustee, but not for any other difference being made between the sisters.

Counsel for the first party having brought to the notice of the Court the precise terms of the second question, the first party maintained that the effect of the will was to give a joint bequest to the two sisters, and that on the death of one sister the fund passed to the survivor. The second party maintained that the fund was bequeathed to her and her sister equally, and vested in them at the date of the death of the testatrix.¹

LORD M'LAREN.—We have now been invited to consider whether the second question, in the precise terms in which it is put, should be answered in the affirmative, because that implies separate interests in the two sisters to the extent of one-half each. It has been suggested that this is a joint bequest, and that a joint character must continue to be attached to it.

I think it is clear that to give effect to this contention would be to give an illegitimate extension to the distinction between joint and several gifts. It is settled that a bequest to persons as a class—e.g., to the children of A—is a joint bequest whether the children be named or not, and that nothing lapses by the predecease of one of the class, the legacy being divided among the survivors.

An exception is admitted in the case where the testator has used such expressions as "equally and proportionally" among them. But when the legacy vests its joint character necessarily disappears, because it is then the right of each legatee to receive in money his proportional share of the subject of the gift. There are peculiarities in the case of joint liferents depending on the principle that each termly payment vests separately, but for the purposes of the present case these need not be considered.

Macpherson v.
Macpherson's
Curator Bonis.

This was a gift which vested at the death of the testator, and was then divisible between Katherine and Jane. There was no doubt a continuing trust, but for administrative purposes only, and that on account of Jane's health. It would be unfair to Katherine to hold that she was unable to dispose of her share in her lifetime unless she survived Jane, and she is as much interested to have her share separated as the curator of her sister.

I am of opinion, after further consideration, that the second question as it stands should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative.

Macdonald v.
Rupprecht.

Reparation—Slander—Master and Servant.—The head cook in a hotel raised an action of damages against her master, alleging that, being in a violent temper with her for asking for additional assistants in the kitchen, he had called out to her in a loud voice several times in a public part of the hotel, and in presence of several of her fellow-servants, "You are drunk and must go at once"; and further averring that these statements were false, malicious, and without probable cause, were injurious to the character of the pursuer, and hurtful to her feelings, and were made by the defender without taking the trouble to ascertain whether they were true or not and "simply to browbeat" the pursuer.

Held (rev. the judgment of Lord Kincairney, who had allowed an issue of malice), diss. Lord Rutherford Clark, that the action was irrelevant.

ON 20th September 1893 Jessie Macdonald, 6 New Broughton, Edinburgh, raised an action against J. Fritz Rupprecht, proprietor of the North British Station Hotel, Glasgow, concluding for £170 as damages for slander.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The pursuer averred that on 31st July 1893 she was engaged by the defender as head cook in his hotel, that one of the conditions of the engagement was that she should have the same staff of assistants as the defender employed at the time of her engagement, and that, notwithstanding her repeated complaints, the defender failed to comply with this condition. The pursuer then averred,—(Cond. 4) "On the evening of Thursday, 10th August, in or near the said North British Station Hotel, the pursuer again requested the defender to procure further assistance, and stated that otherwise she feared she would require to give up her situation. Thereupon the defender got into a violent temper, and ordered pursuer to leave the house at once. He further then and there repeatedly accused her, in the presence and hearing of Mary M'Mahon, Jessie M'Lean, Catherine Fisher, and Margaret M'Nab, now or lately in the defender's service, her fellow-servants, of being drunk, and in consequence unfit for her work. The defender several times cried out in a loud voice to pursuer, in a public part of the hotel, 'You are drunk, and must go at once,' or used words of like import and effect, meaning that the pursuer was guilty of the debasing practice of drunkenness, and that she was, on account of being drunk, unfit to perform her duties in the said hotel. . . . " (Cond. 5) "The said statements made by the defender concerning the pursuer are false, malicious, and calumnious, and without probable cause, and are injurious to the pursuer in her feelings, character, and reputation. In particular, they are calculated to be and are injurious to the character and position of the pursuer in the practice of her vocation, and to cause her loss, injury, and damage, besides wounding her feelings. The defender made the said slanderous accusation recklessly, and without taking any trouble to ascertain whether or not it was true, and well knowing that there was no foundation for it. He was angry with the pursuer for asking for further assistance, and he simply made this accusation to browbeat her."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having uttered the statements condescended on, and the same being false, malicious, and calumnious, and without probable cause, to pursuer's loss, injury, and damage, he is liable in damages to the pursuer therefor.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 14th November the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved the following issue:—"Whether, on or about 10th August 1893, in or near the North British Station Hotel, George Square, Glasgow, and in presence and hearing of Mary M'Mahon, &c., now or lately the defender's servants, or one or other of them, the defender did falsely and calumniously and maliciously say of and concerning the pursuer, 'You are drunk,' or used words of like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of pursuer. Damages £170?"

The defender reclaimed, and the pursuer gave notice of motion to vary the issue by deleting the words "and maliciously."

Argued for the defender;—The action was irrelevant. The words attributed to the defender were, according to the pursuer's own shewing, used in rixa merely, and so were not actionable.¹ She averred that the defender used them simply to browbeat her. To say of a person that he was drunk was not necessarily actionable; it was a question of circumstances.² Here the circumstances averred by the pursuer did not disclose an actionable accusation of drunkenness. Even if the words were actionable they were privileged, as having been used by a master to his servant, and no specific allegation of malice being set forth, an issue ought not to be allowed.

Argued for the pursuer;—To accuse a person in presence of others of being drunk was actionable, and was not privileged, unless the accusation was made in the exercise of a duty.³ Here the defender no doubt stood in the relation of master to the pursuer, and as such might in certain circumstances have had the duty of stating that she was drunk, and when such a statement was made in the exercise of the duty malice was not to be presumed, but must be averred and proved. The case averred here, however, was that the defender, in a state of violent ill-temper against the pursuer, and in order to browbeat her, several times accused her of drunkenness in the presence of several of her fellow-servants. That was not a case of a statement made in the exercise of a duty.¹ The issue ought therefore to be varied as proposed by the pursuer.

Macdonald v.
Rupprecht.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action by a cook against her employer for damages for defamation. It appears from the pursuer's statements on record that some sort of row arose between her and the defender; that they both lost their temper, and that upon that occasion he said to her,—"You are drunk, and must go at once." The pursuer bases her action upon the use of the words "You are drunk," but she has added the explanation—a very candid one—that the defender made the accusation "You are drunk" without taking the trouble to ascertain whether or not it was true, that he was angry with the pursuer for asking for further assistance in the kitchen, and simply made the accusation to browbeat her. The question is, whether that is a relevant averment to support an action of damages for defamation. I am of opinion that it is not. If a cook gets into a squabble with her master in the kitchen, and they both lose their temper, and the master, in order to browbeat the servant, says to her "You are drunk," I do not think that that constitutes a case of language which is actionable as being defamatory. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to dismiss the action as irrelevant.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Looking at the averments made by the pursuer on record, I think that this is certainly a remarkable case, but notwithstanding these averments, I personally would be inclined to allow the pursuer an issue.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the pursuer's case is irrelevant. The words used by the defender of which the pursuer complains were uttered by him according to the pursuer's averment while he was in a violent temper, and were uttered not for the purpose of making an accusation against the pursuer, but simply "to browbeat her." The animus injuriandi, therefore, which lies at the root of such cases as the present is negatived by the pursuer's own averment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to be of opinion with the majority of your Lordships.

THE COURT dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Thereafter the parties having failed to come to an agreement as to the adjustment of rates and liabilities necessitated by the transference, the Commissioners issued an award under section 50 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1889, by which they ordained the parish of Galashiels "to assume responsibility for and relieve" the parish of Melrose of advances made or to be made in respect of paupers who had prior to the transference acquired a settlement in the transferred area; and on the other hand ordained the parish of Melrose to make certain annual payments to the parish of Galashiels. Held that the award was within the powers of the Commissioners, and was not inconsistent with the previous decision of the Court.

1st Division.
Ld. Wellwood.

(See Inspector of Galashiels v. Inspector of Melrose, May 12, 1892, 19 R. 758.)

By order dated 13th December 1890, the Boundary Commissioners, acting under the Local Government Act, 1889, ordered that so much of the parish of Melrose as was situated in Selkirkshire should cease to form part of that parish, and should form part of the parish of Galashiels. The order came into force in June 1891.

On 12th May 1892 (19 R. 758), in an action between the Inspectors of Poor for the two parishes, the Court decided that that transfer had no effect on the liability of the original parish for the maintenance of paupers who had prior to its date acquired a settlement in the transferred area, either by birth or by residence.

The two parishes having failed to make an agreement as to the adjustment of rates necessitated by the transference in terms of section 50 of the Local Government Act, 1889,* proceedings were taken under subsection (2) of that section.

On 10th November 1892 the Boundary Commissioners (claims having been submitted for both parties) issued the following award:—" (First) We ordain the second parties [the Parochial Board of Galashiels] as from 11th June 1891 to assume responsibility for and relieve the first parties [the Parochial Board of Melrose] of all advances made since that date, or to be made in respect of paupers whose claim is derived from (a) birth prior to 11th June 1891 within the area transferred from the

Inspector of
Galashiels v.
Inspector of Melrose.

On 30th December 1892 the Inspector of Galashiels raised an action against the Inspector of Melrose and the Boundary Commissioners, concluding for reduction of the award of 10th November 1892.

He averred ;—(Cond. 7) "The said award was ultra vires of the Commissioners, in so far as it bears to impose upon Galashiels the burdens set forth in the first branch thereof. The Commissioners in pronouncing that part of the award were not adjusting liabilities affected by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, or by the said Order, but were transferring from Melrose to Galashiels liabilities which were not affected at all by the Act or Order."

The defender, the Inspector of Melrose, averred ;—"It is explained that the defender has been informed by the Commissioners that the view of the law established by the decision of the Court, referred to in cond. 2, had all along been adopted by them as the sound construction of the effect of the statute, and has been kept before them in the different readjustments made by them in respect of the property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses connected with the transfer of areas. It is further explained that in every case of the kind which has come before them, of which there have been a great many throughout all parts of the country, the Commissioners have adopted the same course as in the present, viz., to direct that the parish to which the area has been transferred shall in future relieve the parish from which the area has been transferred of all expenses and liabilities connected with the transferred area. This rule has commended itself to the Commissioners in the exercise of the duty confided to them by the statute as just and convenient, and the orders they have made with respect to money payments have been governed by a consideration of the equities arising from the application of this principle. The Commissioners explained to the parties that in their view it is expedient and reasonable that from the dates of their Orders each readjusted area should bear the burdens existing in respect of past or future birth or residence within it, or any part of it as readjusted, and that the authority which collects and administers the rates from any district should be chargeable with the pauperism of that district. On the other hand, to obviate hardship which might arise from a sudden increase of burden consequent on the change, the Commissioners have in many cases, as in the present, made an Order for a certain payment for a limited number of years from one readjusted area to the other, to which an immediate burden greater than the immediate increase of revenue has been transferred."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said award or decree-arbitral being ultra vires of the Commissioners so far as regards the first branch thereof, the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The defender, the Inspector of Melrose, pleaded;—The said award or decree-arbitral being within the statutory powers of the Commissioners, the defender ought to be assolizied, with expenses.

On 13th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the debate, together with the process, assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—By Order, dated 13th December 1890, the Boundary Commissioners, acting under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, determined and ordered that, subject to the provisions of the Act, so much of the parish of Melrose as was situated in the county of Selkirk should cease to be part of that parish, and should form part of the parish of Galashiels. This Order was confirmed by Act of Parliament, and came into force on 11th June 1891.

"Thereafter a question arose and was litigated between the parish of Galashiels and the parish of Melrose as to the effect of this Order upon the liability of the parish of Melrose for the maintenance of paupers who, by birth or residence in the part of the parish which had been so transferred, had their settlement in the parish of Melrose at the date of the transfer. It was decided by the First Division of the Court, 12th May 1892, 19 R. 758, that the transfer by the Boundary Commissioners did not affect the liability of Melrose for parochial settlements acquired prior to the date of the transfer. [His Lordship then quoted the section, note p. 392.]

"Questions have arisen between the two parishes, inter alia, as to the adjustment of liabilities and income and expenses in connection with the administration of the poor-law, as affected by the Order of the Boundary Commissioners. They failed to agree in adjusting their differences, and accordingly under subsection 2 of section 50 the adjustment fell to be made and determined by the Boundary Commissioners. The Commissioners, on 4th August 1892, issued a provisional award, and after considering representations by the Parochial Board of Galashiels, on 10th November 1892 issued the award which is now sought to be reduced, the operative part of which is as follows:—[His Lordship quoted the award ut supra.] The pursuers, the Parochial Board of Galashiels, seek reduction on the ground that the first branch of the award was ultra vires of the Commissioners, the reason stated being shortly this,—that it was contrary to, and inconsistent with, the express decision of the Court to which I have referred. At first sight the award seems startling, because it ordains the Parish of Galashiels to do what the Court declared that legally it was not bound to do. But when the provisions of the 50th section are examined, I think it will be seen that there is no real inconsistency between the award and the judgment. The judgment is a binding decision as to the legal rights of the parties. The award is intended to operate as an equitable adjustment on the assumption of Melrose's liability being as declared by the Court. Under subdivision (1) the two parishes might, if they had chosen, have agreed, inter alia, to transfer liabilities binding upon one or other of them by law, with or without conditions or payment by either party in respect of such transference. There was thus nothing to prevent the parishes from agreeing that the liability resting upon Melrose, in respect of parochial settlements acquired before the date of transfer should be taken over by Galashiels, with or without payment of some equivalent by

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The first branch of the award was ultra vires of the Commissioners. The theory on which the previous case between these parishes¹ was decided was that the liability on Melrose to support the pauper in question after the area in which she resided was transferred to Galashiels, was a liability which was not “affected” by the Local Government Act, 1889. It was only when a liability was “affected” by that Act that section 50 came into force. The question of liability had been settled by the Court, and therefore was not one which the parties could have settled by agreement, still less could they be forced to settle it by arbitration. The award was inconsistent with the decision arrived at by the Court, and was on that ground ultra vires.

Argued for the respondents ;—The decision of the Court merely settled the legal liability of Melrose to maintain the pauper in question. After Melrose. They did not succeed in adjusting their differences, and accordingly it fell to the Commissioners, acting as an arbiter, to decide whether the parishes were bound, with a view to an equitable adjustment, to do what they might have done had they been able to agree. The matter truly submitted to the Commissioners was whether, in adjusting liabilities, income, and expenses which had been affected by the transfer, it was right and proper that Galashiels should take over the liability in question, and if so, on what terms and conditions. Now, such an agreement or reference was not inconsistent with legal liability resting at the outset with Melrose. On the contrary, that was a condition of the reference, and an element in favour of Galashiels to be considered in the adjustment.

“The following passage from the opinion of the Lord President in the case of Galashiels v. Melrose, 19 R. 762, shews that that judgment was not intended to preclude financial adjustment between the parties :—‘It is obvious that such changes might require financial adjustment between the two parishes or other areas, the one of which was losing and the other acquiring the land in question. The portion of land to be disjoined might be so mixed up with the rest of the parish as regards common assets and common liabilities that simply to disjoin might leave a very unjust balance between the parish gaining and the parish losing ; and it requires very slight stretch of imagination to picture cases in which such pecuniary adjustments would be required. The two parishes concerned, therefore, are authorised to make these adjustments for themselves, if they can, and failing them, the Commissioners have power, after they have made an order as to the boundaries, to follow that up by another order effecting such an adjustment as appears appropriate in each case. All that is a comparatively simple proceeding in point of principle, for it relates entirely to the settlement of details, and it does not involve that the parties or the Commissioners are authorised to determine what are the rights of the two parishes apart from such adjustment.’

“If it had appeared on the face of the proceedings that the Commissioners ordained Galashiels to accept liability without counterpart or consideration, the award might have been held to be ultra vires. But ex facie of the award it appears that what the Commissioners presumably consider a fair counterpart or equivalent is to be given by Melrose.

“Now, by statute the award of the Commissioners is given all the finality of a decree-arbitral pronounced by an arbiter under the Lands Clauses Act ; and it can only be impugned on the recognised grounds on which such decrees-arbitral are subject to review. The Commissioners may or may not have made such an adjustment or given Galashiels such compensation as the Court tota re perspecta might have awarded ; but I take it that it is not the province or within the power of the Court to interfere with the Commissioners’ determination on that ground.

that decision was pronounced it was still open to parties to consider the question of a readjustment of rates, on the ground that owing to the transference the rates pressed too heavily on the parish from which the transference was made. The award arrived at an equitable decision of that question, and did not touch in the least the question of the liability of Melrose. The parish of Galashiels was given an equivalent for the payment they had to make, in the second and third branches of the award. Such an equitable arrangement was quite within the powers of the Commissioners.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right. What was decided in the previous case was merely that the liability to relieve Mrs Hay, the pauper there in question, remained on the parish in which she had acquired a settlement by residence, though the part of the parish in which she resided was transferred to another parish by the Boundary Commissioners. The parishes concerned in that case were the same as those in the present, and all that was decided there was which of the parishes was liable.

Here the parties failed to agree between themselves with regard to the adjustment of rates which had been deranged by the rectification of the boundaries. The Commissioners, before whom the matter came, saw that the burden of relieving paupers within the transferred area pinched the parish of Melrose, and accordingly, instead of fixing that so much of the liability should be borne for the future by the new parish they quite properly ordained the new parish to relieve the old parish of the burden of maintaining the paupers, and gave the new parish an equivalent for the burden put upon them.

The award is simply an equitable adjustment of the rates, and does not touch the question of liability which was settled by our former judgment. I think that the decision of the Commissioners was quite within their powers, and the case seems to me to present no difficulty. I am therefore of opinion that we must adhere.

Ross v.
M'Farlane.

WILLIAM DALLAS ROSS, Pursuer (Respondent).—Murray—Salvesen—Crabb Watt.

JOHN M'FARLANE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—C. J. Guthrie.

Master and Servant—Assignment of contract of service by master—Newspaper.—In 1888 M'Farlane, the proprietor of a daily newspaper, appointed Ross to be manager of the paper by letter as follows :—"I hereby accept your offer to serve me as general manager of" the paper "for two years." In 1890 the engagement was renewed by letter, addressed to Ross and signed by both parties, in these terms,—“We have to day arranged your reappointment as general manager of” the paper for five years.

In 1892 M'Farlane sold the paper to Martin, the contracts with the newspaper staff being assigned to Martin, who undertook to relieve M'Farlane of his future liabilities thereunder.

Martin offered to employ Ross as manager on the same terms as before, but Ross being afraid that by accepting this offer he might liberate M'Farlane from his liability under the former contract, declined to accept it without M'Farlane's written consent. In reply to Ross' application for this, M'Farlane wrote, Jan. 19, 1894. Ross v. M'Farlane.
—"You are at liberty to make any bargain you like with Martin without my consent." M'Farlane withheld his written consent until after Martin had withdrawn his offer and had declined to take Ross as manager.

In an action of damages for breach of contract by Ross against M'Farlane, the defender pleaded that the pursuer having been offered employment on the same terms with Martin, was entitled to nominal damages only.

Held that the pursuer was entitled to substantial damages, per the Lord Justice-Clerk, on the ground that the defender being in breach of his contract with the pursuer, and not having given the written consent required by the pursuer, was not entitled to plead the offer of employment with Martin in mitigation of damages; per Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Trayner, on the ground that whether the defender was in breach of contract or not, he was bound to have given the pursuer the consent required; diss. Lord Young, on the ground that there had been no breach of contract by the defender.

Opinions (per Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Trayner) that the defender by assigning the business to Martin, and so disabling himself from fulfilling the contract with the pursuer, had committed a breach of contract.

ON 24th November 1892 William Dallas Ross, newspaper manager, 2d DIVISION. Lord Low.
Edinburgh, brought an action against John M'Farlane, formerly proprietor of the Scottish Leader newspaper, Edinburgh, concluding for £2500 as damages for breach of a contract of employment between the pursuer and the defender under which the pursuer was to be general manager of the Scottish Leader, then the property of the defender, for a period of five years from 1st January 1890.

The circumstances out of which the action arose, as disclosed by a proof, were as follows:—

The original contract between the pursuer and the defender was concluded by the following letter sent by the defender to the pursuer on 17th May 1888:—"I hereby accept your offer to serve me as general manager of the Scottish Leader for two years, at the annual salary of Four hundred pounds, paid monthly."

Before the termination of the period of this contract, the parties entered into a further agreement (being that founded on by the pursuer), which was embodied in the following letter, addressed by the defender to the pursuer, and signed by both parties:—"My dear Sir,—We have to-day arranged your reappointment as general manager of the Scottish Leader on the following terms:—For a period of five years.—that your salary for the first year (1890) be Eight hundred pounds sterling, for the second year Nine hundred pounds, and for the third and subsequent years One thousand pounds, with a bonus of two and a-half per cent on the ascertained net profits of the newspaper after the third year.—Yours faithfully."

On 20th August 1892 the defender sold the Scottish Leader to Mr Thomas Carlaw Martin, formerly assistant editor and latterly editor of the paper, the contract between the defender and Martin, inter alia, conveying to Martin "the whole contracts between the said first party [the defender] and others connected with or relating to the said newspaper, including those with the editorial, literary, commercial, or mercantile staffs," Martin becoming bound to relieve the defender of all liabilities, arising under such contracts in respect of services rendered after the date of the transfer.

At first the pursuer appeared to have been willing to continue as manager of the paper just as if no transfer had taken place, and his name for some weeks appeared on the paper as its receiver of cash ; but ultimately, for the reasons explained by the Lord Ordinary (infra, p. 401), he reconsidered his position, and on 1st September sent the following letter to Mr Robson, S.S.C., the defender's agent :—" As I must look to Mr M'Farlane to implement the agreement with me, or otherwise provide me with satisfactory guarantees that it will be implemented, I have to ask you for a copy of the agreement under which the new proprietors have undertaken Mr M'Farlane's obligations so that I may consult an agent, and put the matter on a satisfactory basis."

Mr Robson replied on the same day as follows :—" I cannot give you a copy of Mr M'Farlane's agreement with Mr Martin, nor, in my opinion, are you entitled to ask for it. It relates to many things besides your engagement. Your letter appears to be written under the idea that by his arrangement with Mr Martin you may be barred from any claim on Mr M'Farlane under your engagement with him. I need hardly say that he cannot be liberated from any liability incumbent on him to you under your engagement without your assent, and he has not asked you to give this. With this explanation, I may add that Mr Martin takes over all the engagements with members of the staff, including your own, so that your position remains just as it has hitherto been."

On 9th September the pursuer sent a letter to the defender in which, after saying that Mr Robson had refused to give him a copy of the agreement, and that Mr Martin had interfered in certain matters which had hitherto fallen under his charge as manager, he asked this question : " I wish to know from you whether I am to continue as hitherto, and as your manager to discharge my duties under the agreement, or whether, on the other hand, I am to cease to do so ? Of course I look to you to fulfil your agreement with me. It would be a serious matter for me—apart altogether from the direct pecuniary consideration—if my agreement was not fulfilled."

The defender replied on the same day, prior to which date he had received a copy of Mr Robson's letter to the pursuer of 1st September. In his reply to the pursuer he complained of the pursuer's discourtesy in communicating with his solicitor without his knowledge, and then went on to remind the pursuer that he had said that if the defender had to stop the newspaper he would never think of enforcing his engagement, and that if the paper was transferred to a company he would not object to his engagement running on with the company ; and that when the arrangements with Mr Martin were completed the pursuer had entered most heartily into the matter, and had worked night and day at the transfer. The conclusion at which the defender arrived was this :—" I name these things, and could name much more, to shew that you never once objected to a single arrangement prior to the transfer, and you entered most heartily into matters after the transfer, and homologated the arrangement made with Mr Martin that had relation to 'taking over engagements with members of the staff.' Mr Martin has undoubtedly taken my place, as I told you on the day of the transfer."

On 12th September the pursuer sent another letter to the defender, in which he disputed the accuracy of the defender's narrative of events, and said,—" The position is that I have an agreement with you in writing under which I have certain rights and certain duties. I am not free to alter that or make any agreement with anyone else without having a written arrangement with you to that effect,"—and then summed up the position of matters thus :—" My position is that I adhere to my agreement unless and until a new arrangement is made definitely in writing between you, Mr Martin, and me, and I fear that matters are drifting into difficulty because you and Mr Martin do not approach the point in a business-like way." No. 78.

To this the defender replied on the 13th, in the following terms :—" I ^{Jan. 19, 1894.} explained to you on the day of the transfer all that it was necessary for ^{Ross v.} you to know—(First) that Mr Martin would take my position; and ^{M'Farlane.} (Second) that he took over all the engagements with members of the staff, including yours, so that, as you yourself expressed it, your engagement will just run on."

On the 15th September the pursuer again wrote to the defender as follows,—“ You are not entitled to hand over my engagement to any other without my consent any more than I would be to substitute a new manager for myself without yours, and I hope, for the sake of all concerned, that, without any more delay, you will address yourself to this view of the matter, and obviate difficulties resulting from your breach of my agreement.”

To this the defender replied on the 23d,—“ Mr Martin has taken over your agreement along with that of others, and stands to you in the same relationship which I did. You are therefore quite at liberty to make any agreement with him you like without my consent.”

This letter closed the correspondence between the pursuer and the defender.

Meanwhile a correspondence had been going on between Mr Prosser, S.S.C., the pursuer's agent, and Mr Falconer, W.S., Mr Martin's agent. The position taken up by Mr Prosser in that correspondence was that the pursuer would enter into no agreement with Mr Martin alone, but only into an agreement with Mr Martin and the defender in conjunction; and Mr Prosser seemed further to be under the impression that the pursuer, under his contract with the defender, was entitled to remain manager of the paper although he made no agreement with Mr Martin.

Mr Falconer's position was that Mr Martin had become liable for all the obligations incumbent on the defender under the agreement, in so far as they had not been implemented, and was willing to continue the pursuer in his employment as manager; but that he had no concern with the pursuer's claims against the defender, although he had no wish to prejudice such claims.

On 30th September Mr Prosser wrote to Mr Falconer,—“ Mr Ross is not in Mr Martin's employment, and no question of continuation arises. Hitherto I have been under the impression that we were corresponding because my client was willing to consider any reasonable proposal whereby he should convenience Mr M'Farlane and Mr Martin; but this does not appear to be your view, and Mr Ross, consequently, will adhere to his existing agreement.”

This letter was taken by Mr Falconer as a declinature on the part of the pursuer to accept the employment offered to him by Mr Martin; and accordingly he wrote to Mr Prosser to that effect on the 1st October, and intimated that the pursuer's connection with the Scottish Leader must cease.

The negotiations between the pursuer and Mr Martin having thus been broken off, Mr Prosser put himself into communication with Mr Robson. Mr Prosser furnished Mr Robson with a copy of the correspondence which he had had with Mr Falconer, and on the 4th of October he wrote to Mr Robson a letter in which he said,—“ Mr Ross looks to Mr M'Farlane for implement of his agreement, being willing to implement his part of it. I do not understand the treatment which parties are attempting to impose on Mr Ross, unless it be with the intention of getting him into a difficulty between two persons, who ought together to communicate with him regarding any change, but seem not inclined to do so."

On the 5th of October Mr Robson replied, and after referring at some length to the correspondence between Mr Prosser and Mr Falconer and to his own letter to the pursuer of the 1st September, he said,—“I now state expressly on behalf of Mr M'Farlane that Mr Ross, by carrying out his existing agreement to act as general manager of the Scottish Leader under Mr Martin as coming in place of Mr M'Farlane, and by taking his instructions and payment of his salary from Mr Martin, shall not prejudice any claims he may have against Mr M'Farlane under the agreement. I think that this should be satisfactory."

This letter, which was regarded as satisfactory by Mr Prosser, was communicated to Mr Falconer with an intimation that the pursuer would continue to discharge his duties as general manager of the Scottish Leader; but Mr Falconer replied that the negotiations between Mr Martin and the pursuer were finally closed on the 1st October, and could not be reopened; and accordingly the pursuer's connection with the Scottish Leader came to an end.

After his connection with the Scottish Leader ceased, the pursuer was for a long time unable to obtain employment, but about six weeks prior to the commencement of the proof (8th June 1893) he obtained a situation with the Linotype Company in London at a salary of £300 a-year. He subsequently obtained employment as manager of the newspaper Black and White. This engagement was for three months, with a power of renewal, and at a salary at the rate of £400 a-year.

The defender deponed that if in the correspondence between himself and the pursuer he had been asked to give the assurance contained in Mr Robson's letter of the 5th October, he would at once have given it.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered loss and damage to the amount condescended on through the defender's breach of contract, is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No relevant case. (2) The pursuer is barred by his actings from maintaining the present action, and from recovering damages for breach of contract. (3) The pursuer having declined to continue his services as manager of the Scottish Leader in terms of his obligation under said contract, is barred from maintaining the present action. (4) The material averments of pursuer being unfounded in fact and in law, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 20th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds it proved that the defender, by his actings, has committed a breach of the contract of service entered into between him and the pursuer set forth in the record, and is liable in damages to the pursuer for the loss and damage suffered by the pursuer in consequence of said breach of contract; assesses the damages at the sum of £800, and decerns against the defender therefor.”*

* “OPINION.— . . . The questions to be determined appear to me to be (first) whether the defender has broken his contract with the pursuer? and (secondly) if that question be answered in the affirmative, what is the amount of the damages, if any, in which the defender is liable?

“The defender contends that there was no breach of contract. The agreement which was current when the defender sold the newspaper to Mr Martin is . . . in the form of a letter addressed by the defender to the pursuer, and is signed by both of these parties. The letter runs thus,—‘We have to-day arranged your reappointment as general manager of the Scottish Leader on the following terms.’ It was argued for the defender that that was not a contract of personal service but a contract that for the period of five years—which was the term specified—the pursuer should hold the position of general manager of the Scottish Leader. The sale of the newspaper by the defender, therefore (it was argued), did not involve a breach of contract, unless the result was to deprive the pursuer of the position of manager. The pursuer, however, was not thereby deprived of the position of manager, because Mr Martin was willing, and offered, to continue the pursuer as manager of the paper upon the same terms as those contained in the agreement. The pursuer refused that offer, and accordingly he alone was to blame for the contract not being implemented.

“That view of the agreement is plausible, but I am of opinion that it is not sound. The agreement is for ‘reappointment’ of the pursuer as manager. I think, therefore, that it is necessary to go back and see what was the nature of the position to which the pursuer was ‘reappointed.’ The pursuer, at the time when the agreement under consideration was made, held office under a letter addressed to him by the defender on 17th May 1888. That letter is in the following terms :—‘I hereby accept your offer to serve me as general manager of the Scottish Leader for two years at the annual salary of four hundred pounds.’

“That was clearly a contract of service, and I do not think that there is anything to suggest that, when the pursuer was ‘reappointed’ in 1890, there was any intention to alter the character of the employment.

“Further, the position of manager of a newspaper seems to me to be necessarily a position of service. He manages for the proprietor, and must be under the proprietor’s control, and subject to his orders. And it also seems to me to be an employment which involves delectus personæ. The office of manager of a daily newspaper is an onerous and responsible one, and, in order that the manager may perform his duties with credit and efficiency, it is necessary that he and his employer should work well together.

“I am therefore of opinion that the contract between the pursuer and the defender was a contract of personal service ; that the defender was not entitled to assign the pursuer’s services to anyone to whom he might sell the newspaper ; and that the sale of the newspaper by the defender, by which he disabled himself from performing the contract, was technically a breach of the contract. I think that it follows, from what I have said, that the pursuer was not bound, whatever the circumstances might be, to accept the office of manager of the newspaper, under anyone to whom the defender might sell it, on pain of forfeiting all claim against the defender. At the same time, I am of opinion that, the newspaper having been sold, the pursuer could not refuse an offer on the part of the purchaser to continue him in the same position, and with the same emoluments, as formerly, and, at the same time, claim damages for breach of contract from the defender, unless he could shew that he had sufficient and reasonable grounds for refusing the offer.

“Such being my view of the nature of the contract, and of the rules of law applicable to the case, it is necessary to consider what are the facts. . . .

“The pursuer at first appears to have been willing to go on acting as manager, just as if no transfer of the newspaper had taken place. Upon thinking over the matter, however, and consulting a friend, he seems to have come to the conclusion that the position of matters necessitated care upon his part. He knew that Mr Martin had not himself the means required to carry on the newspaper, and he did not know for what period of time the assistance which Mr Martin had obtained would enable him to carry it on. The pursuer therefore had not, under Mr Martin, the same security that his salary would be paid during the period of his engagement as he had when the defender was proprietor of the newspaper. Further, the pursuer had been told that Mr Martin had taken over all the defender’s engagements with his employees, and he feared that if he accepted employment with Mr Martin without having his claim against the defender for any loss which he might sustain clearly acknowledged, he might ties, he was not prepared to maintain that the defender was not in breach of his contract with the pursuer, but argued ;—The breach of contract was a technical breach of contract merely, which did not entitle the pursuer to more than nominal damages. A servant who had been dismissed by his lose any claim which he had against the latter in the event of the newspaper being stopped, or his salary not being paid.

"I do not think that the pursuer's fears were unfounded. He had no security that Mr Martin would be able to continue the newspaper and pay his salary during the term of his engagement, and if he had acquiesced in the assignation of his services to Mr Martin, without taking care to have his claims against the defender reserved, he might have found it difficult to maintain, in the event of the newspaper being stopped, or his salary not paid, that he had not released the defender."

[His Lordship then examined the correspondence between the pursuer and the defender, and concluded]—"In the correspondence I think that they both fell into errors. The pursuer never put specifically to the defender the two questions to which it was important that he should have an answer, viz. (first) whether the defender accepted Mr Robson's view of his liability; and (secondly) whether there were any undisclosed proprietors with whom the pursuer would have to deal as well as with Mr Martin. The defender, on the other hand, wrote in a way calculated, in my opinion, to lead the pursuer to believe that he maintained that the pursuer had agreed to continue in his employment with Mr Martin instead of with the defender, and had thereby freed the defender."

[After setting forth the correspondence between Mr Falconer and Mr Prosser]—"The position taken up by Mr Falconer seems to me to be unimpeachable, but I have considerable difficulty in understanding Mr Prosser's views. . . . Mr Prosser wrote as if the pursuer could still insist upon specific implement of his contract with the defender, and was still entitled, notwithstanding the sale, to continue to manage the newspaper. Such a view, I apprehend, was altogether erroneous. The defender was entitled to sell the newspaper (although he thereby made himself liable to a claim of damages on the part of the pursuer for breach of contract), and the newspaper having been sold, the pursuer could have no possible right to force himself into the office, and to manage the newspaper, without the consent of Mr Martin, to whom it had been transferred. . . .

"I have now referred to all the evidence which appears to me to be material in this case, and the questions to be determined upon that evidence appear to me to be (1) whether the pursuer has established his claim to damages; and (2) if so, at what amount ought the damages to be assessed.

"The argument for the defender is, that the pursuer had the offer open to him of the same employment, upon the same terms, with Mr Martin, as he had previously had with the defender, and that as he chose not to accept that offer, any loss which he has thereby sustained is due to himself and not to the defender.

"I think that it is settled law in the case of breach of contract of service, that if a servant has an offer of employment of the same kind, and with the same remuneration as under the contract which has been broken, which a reasonable man would accept, he cannot reject the offer and claim damages for loss on account of breach of contract.

"Now I think that the offer which the pursuer had from Mr Martin was one which it was reasonable that he should accept. At the same time the circumstances were very peculiar, and it seems to me that the pursuer was not to blame for seeking to have his right of recourse against the defender clearly defined and recognised before finally accepting service with Mr Martin. The pursuer knew that Mr Martin had taken over all the defender's obligations to his employees, and if he had accepted Mr Martin's offer without having his claims against the defender reserved, he might, in the event of the stoppage of the Scottish Leader, have found that he had lost his right to make any claim against the defender, and this was an important consideration, because unless Mr Martin succeeded in making the newspaper pay better than the defender had been able to do, the employer was not entitled to remain idle and claim as damages his full salary for the remainder of the stipulated period of service. He was bound to seek other employment. Here, the moment the breach of contract was committed, the pursuer was offered employment which was in all respects identical with that which he had lost, save only that Mr Martin was the employer instead of the defender. The pursuer was bound to accept that employment, if he desired to preserve his recourse against the defender. It was said that under Mr Martin's employment he would not have had the same security for payment of his salary for the remainder of the stipulated period as he had with the defender. Assuming that to be so, it did not entitle the pursuer to decline employment with Mr Martin, since the defender had never repudiated his liability to make good any ultimate loss which the pursuer might suffer. Mr Robson's letter of 1st September was quite distinct to the effect that that liability remained, and if the defender had been asked to give a similar assurance he would have given it. But he had never been asked to give it. The pursuer had lost his place on the newspaper in consequence of the untenable position which he had taken up in his negotiations with Mr Martin—that he would not enter into Mr Martin's employment, except on a contract to which the defender was a party. Having thus lost his place through his own fault, he was not entitled to damages from the defender.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The defender having conceded that he was in breach of his contract with the pursuer, the discussion was narrowed to the question of the amount of damages. But although the discussion thus proceeded on the concession of the defender, that concession was in accordance with the authorities. The rule was, although there was no direct decision to the effect, that an employer, if he transferred his business to another, and so disabled himself from fulfilling his contract with his servant, was in breach of his contract.¹ The case of the chances were that it might be given up long before the expiry of the pursuer's engagement.

"But the pursuer obtained the assurance, which it was important for him to have, from Mr Robson, on the 1st of September; and if he had asked the same assurance from the defender, I do not doubt that he would have got it. I therefore think that the pursuer was himself very much to blame for what occurred.

"I am, however, of opinion that the defender was to blame, in that the natural inference from his letters was that he did not take the same view of his liability as Mr Robson did, but held that the pursuer had agreed to relieve him and to take service with Mr Martin as coming in his place.

"The defender thus not only disabled himself from fulfilling his contract, but, by his subsequent conduct, misled the pursuer, and is to a certain extent responsible for the pursuer's loss of the situation.

"The result appears to me to be that the defender, having broken his contract, having by his letters induced the pursuer to believe that he repudiated liability, and having thereby prejudiced the pursuer in his negotiations with Mr Martin, is liable in damages; while, upon the other hand, the pursuer, by taking up an untenable position in his correspondence with the defender and with Mr Martin, materially contributed to the discontinuance of his employment as manager of the Leader and is, therefore, not entitled to the full amount of damages which he could have claimed if there had been no fault on his part. In other words, I think that damages are due, but that the amount of damages is a jury question, to be determined in view of the whole circumstances of the case; so dealing with it, I assess the damages at the sum of £800."

employer's death or bankruptcy was different.¹ It was said, however, that the pursuer could claim only nominal damages, as he had been offered an employment in all respects as good as that which he had lost. In general, a servant would not be entitled to decline such an offer and claim damages. But the employment here offered was not an entirely new employment. It was an employment under the original contract, which had been assigned to Mr Martin by the defender; but assignation implied delegation.² If, therefore, the pursuer had accepted Mr Martin's service, without having a clear stipulation from the defender that the defender's liability under the original contract remained, in the event of the pursuer's position with Mr Martin proving in any respect inferior to that which it would have been with the defender, the pursuer would have lost his right of recourse against the defender. It was not now disputed that the defender could not relieve himself from liability for such eventual loss, except with the consent, express or implied, of the pursuer; but the defender himself, in his correspondence with the pursuer, took up the position that his liability to the pursuer had terminated absolutely when he assigned the contract to Mr Martin. It was said that Mr Robson's letter to the pursuer of 1st September contained an admission of the defender's liability. Assuming that it did so, it was merely Mr Robson's expression of his own opinion, and did not bind the defender; if the defender, who had the letter before him, intended to adopt it, he ought to have intimated that to the pursuer. Not having done so, he must be held to have repudiated it. The defender having thus, in his negotiations with the pursuer, taken an erroneous view of his liability to the pursuer, the pursuer was not bound to accept the offer of employment with Mr Martin; and the defender consequently was liable in substantial damages for his admitted breach of contract.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer was in 1888 engaged by the defender, who was then proprietor of the Scottish Leader newspaper, to act as manager of that journal. The agreement was in writing, and was in these words,—“I hereby accept your offer to serve me as general manager of the Scottish Leader for two years, at the annual salary of £400.” The pursuer thus plainly entered into a contract to serve the defender as his manager of the newspaper owned by him. The engagement was renewed for a subsequent term of five years on 1st January 1890, on somewhat different terms as to emolument which it is unnecessary at this stage to enter into, but the actual appointment is thus expressed,—“We have to-day arranged your reappointment as general manager of the Scottish Leader on the following terms,” and it is signed both by the pursuer and defender. It was therefore a renewal of the contract of service by the pursuer to the defender. The nature of the employment was in no way altered. The pursuer was personally to serve the defender in the position agreed upon. I concur, therefore, with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there was no obligation on the pursuer to continue in the office of manager of the Scottish Leader if the defender should cease to be connected with it, and so necessarily make it impossible for the agreed-on service to be rendered. defender by selling the newspaper made it impossible for him to implement his part of the contract. That is clear, and indeed was conceded by the defender's counsel.

Ross v.
M'Farlane.

On 20th August 1892 the defender informed the pursuer that he had sold the Scottish Leader to Mr Martin, a gentleman who had been sub-editor of the newspaper for some time previously, but the pursuer was only informed of this in general terms, and the particulars of the arrangement between the defender and Martin were not disclosed to him. The pursuer and Martin then conferred as to the former remaining on the staff of the paper, and this the pursuer was willing to do. But after consulting a friend he proceeded to take steps to have his position in the matter made definite, feeling probably that under his agreement with the defender his financial position was safe, but that if he was dependent on Mr Martin only, or on undisclosed proprietors behind him, and let go his hold of the defender, he might suffer financially later on if the newspaper should fail. He was therefore not prepared to agree to any arrangement which should simply transfer his services to Mr Martin, without the position being made definite that he did so with the defender still bound, so that what he might fail to get by doing work under Mr Martin during the unexpired part of the term of his agreement he could exact from his original employer. He was afraid that he might be held to have given up all claims upon the defender if he engaged under Martin without the defender's distinct consent. [His Lordship then referred to the letters between the pursuer and the defender, and continued]—I think they make it plain—

1. That the pursuer was willing to work on the Scottish Leader after it was sold by the defender, and so relieve the defender to the extent to which he might be remunerated by the new proprietors, provided he was made secure in writing that he did not lose the benefit of his agreement with the defender if his new work failed to yield him the same emolument absolutely or partially.

2. That the pursuer made it plain to the defender that without written agreement he would hold to his rights under the agreement already existing.

3. That the defender intentionally declined to notice the pursuer's stipulations, and endeavoured to make out that Martin had taken over the pursuer, and suggested to the pursuer to make any bargain he liked with Martin.

4. That he intentionally declined to say anything which would admit that he was still bound by his contract, or to give a consent to a new arrangement so as to protect the pursuer from an after repudiation on the allegation of an alteration in the pursuer's legal position should occasion arise for the pursuer demanding that the defender should make good any loss which might follow the change.

5. That the defender so acted in the hope and belief that the pursuer would be persuaded to act without consent or guarantee, and that he might thus escape from his liability.

Matters so remained during a protracted correspondence between the pursuer's agent and Mr Martin's agent, but when at last the former believed that what his client insisted upon was to be admitted by the defender, Martin declined to allow the pursuer to enter the premises of the newspaper, or to do any duty in connection with it. To that the pursuer had to submit, for he was not under any contract with Mr Martin, and could not claim anything against him.

In these circumstances I concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that there was here breach of agreement. Indeed, as I before stated, it was practi-

No. 78. cally admitted at the debate that there was a technical breach of agreement. The pursuer was engaged by the defender for a term. The defender has not fulfilled the engagement. But the defender's counsel, Mr Comrie Thomson, argued that for that non-fulfilment the damages should only be nominal. I am unable to see how that should be so. The pursuer was of course not entitled to sit idle and make no effort to obtain suitable employment. He must fairly and reasonably exert himself to earn his living, and can only come against the defender for the loss he sustains from inability to secure a position as good as that which was agreed upon with the defender. The Lord Ordinary thinks that he has not been in default in this, and I am of the same opinion. He has obtained a situation bringing him a substantial salary in his own line of life, although not such a high salary as he was entitled to by the agreement in question. But taking that into full consideration, the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that his loss has amounted to £800. I see no reason to hold that his Lordship's verdict on the damages is in any way excessive, and indeed the amount was not seriously impugned by the defender if it should be held that the pursuer was entitled to more than nominal damages.

I would therefore move your Lordships to adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action of damages for breach of contract, the contract being one in writing between the proprietor of a newspaper and the pursuer that the latter should act as manager of the newspaper for a period of five years, and it is very necessary to have regard to the nature of that contract. It is not a mercantile contract, but a contract between the proprietor of a paper—who might be a lady living in London or Paris or anywhere else—and a gentleman to act as manager for a period of five years. Within the five years the proprietor of the paper, who contracted with the pursuer, found it expedient to sell the paper, and he sold it accordingly to Mr Martin who had been editor of it, but with an agreement between him and Martin that the latter should take over the staff and fulfil all M'Farlane's obligations to all the members of the staff, including the pursuer, the manager. It seems to be thought by the pursuer—and this is indeed the foundation of the action—that by selling the paper to Martin, although with a stipulation that the buyer should take over the staff of the paper, a breach of contract with the pursuer was committed. I am clearly of opinion that that was no breach of contract. It was no part of the contract with the pursuer, expressed or implied, that Mr M'Farlane should continue to be the proprietor of the paper for five years, and that he should not sell it. He might have ceased to be proprietor of the paper by death. He did not contract to live for five years. If he had died and the paper passed to his heirs, would there have been any breach of contract there? I am of opinion that there would not, and that there was just as little in the present case. The defender acted with perfect propriety in arranging with the new proprietor that he should take over the pursuer as manager under the contract with him. I have said nothing hitherto to imply anything to the effect that Mr M'Farlane did not remain bound to see that the contract with the pursuer was implemented. My opinion is that the contract would be completely performed by a new proprietor just as much as it would be performed by the old proprietor continuing the pursuer in the position of manager and requiring him to perform no duties except those which fell within the true meaning and import of the contract, and paying him his salary according to its terms. I am of opinion upon the evidence that Mr Martin did take over the pursuer as manager of the paper, and did agree to satisfy the whole of his rights under the contract. There is nothing in the evidence to shew that the pursuer was ever required to do anything which was not within his duty as manager under the terms of the contract, or further, that the payments due to him under the contract for his services were ever withheld to the extent of a sixpence. I cannot therefore hold that there was here any breach of contract.

I do not care very much to refer to the letters, which I think are quite unnecessarily numerous, and some of them unnecessarily long, and not expressed with that distinctness which in a business correspondence would have been desirable, but I am satisfied upon the evidence that the pursuer's real grievance was being put under Mr Martin as his master. He preferred Mr M'Farlane. That was what touched and irritated him, but I can give no effect to that irritation. I think it sufficiently proved that the untenable nature of the position of objecting to being put under a new proprietor occurred very strongly to the pursuer, because he said in his evidence that he was willing to act as manager under Mr Martin, but that he desired only an assurance that he would be paid. Mr M'Farlane said—and I believe him thoroughly—that if that assurance had been asked he would have given it, but his position was that he was under obligation to see the contract fulfilled, and he did not require to express his obligation in writing to make it effectual against him. His agent expressed it in writing, but it would have been as binding had he not done so. Mr M'Farlane was under that obligation, and if the pursuer had gone on to perform his duties under Mr Martin—not being asked, as he never was asked, to do anything that was not incumbent upon him, and being paid his salary—there would have been no necessity for any recourse against Mr M'Farlane. I am therefore of opinion that the defender should be assolizied.

LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK.—The counsel for the defender conceded that in selling the newspaper the defender had broken his contract, and that the only question before the Court was a question of damages. I am not disposed to examine a position which was assumed after full deliberation. But so far as I can judge they are right in their view of the law. When the defender by the sale disabled himself from fulfilling his contract, he was I think in breach of it.

But the point is not of much importance. The defender in any view was responsible for the due fulfilment of the contract. He arranged with Mr Martin that the pursuer should be continued as manager under him. If he consented that the pursuer should assume that position without prejudice to his rights under the existing contract, it might be that there would be no breach of contract, or if the sale was a breach, the damages might be merely nominal.

It cannot be doubted that the pursuer had a material interest to see that the defender was not discharged. Mr Martin had no means. He bought the newspaper with borrowed money. Nor so far as we can see had the pursuer any guarantee from the success of the undertaking. It seems to have been disastrous to all concerned.

As I understood the argument, the case was presented by both parties on this issue, Did the defender give or withhold the necessary consent? The defender was bound to give it if he was to plead that the arrangement with Mr Martin was a due fulfilment of his contract, or that the pursuer's claim was reduced to nominal damages. For it was essential that the pursuer's claims against the defender should be preserved, and if he entered into the employment of Mr Martin without the defender's consent the defender would have been liberated. At least there would have been a risk of that result, and the pursuer was not bound to run any risk. Nor do I think that I am stating any proposition which the defender disputes. He professes that he was all along ready to give the requisite consent, and that in fact he gave it.

From the first the pursuer took up a distinct position. He would not enter into a contract with Mr Martin without the consent of the defender. On the other hand he was willing to become the manager for Mr Martin if that consent was given. He may have been annoyed that he should be placed under one who had been formerly his subordinate, and who proposed to conduct the newspaper in a manner of which he did not approve. But he did not betray his feelings. Mr Martin himself says that up to the time when the pursuer left the office "the relations between me and the pursuer were entirely harmonious and cordial."

Mr Martin on his part was desirous that the pursuer should continue to act as manager, but on the condition that he entered into his employment. In his letter of 16th September Mr Falconer, as Mr Martin's agent, asked for a definite reply to the question "whether Mr Ross is or is not willing to carry out the agreement with Mr Martin." In a question with Mr Martin the pursuer could expect nothing more. He could not be continued in his office on any other footing than as the servant of the owner of the newspaper. He refused the offer because he could not obtain the defender's consent. He was definitely dismissed by Mr Falconer's letter of 1st October, inasmuch as he had declined "the employment offered to him by Mr Martin on the footing expressed in my letters." The pursuer could do nothing but submit. He had no contract with Mr Martin.

If the defender desired to fulfil his agreement with the pursuer, or to escape with nominal damages on the theory that he was in breach of it, he was, as I have said, bound to give his consent to the pursuer's acceptance of Mr Martin's offer. I go further. I think that he was bound to make it perfectly clear that he was not in any way relieved of his contract; for it was by his act that the position of the pursuer was altered. He was, I think, bound to give the pursuer a full assurance that he would not be injured nor incur risk of injury thereby. Nor can I imagine why anyone who was willing to fulfil his agreement should have any hesitation in giving such an assurance. The strange thing in this case is that the defender maintains that he was always willing to give his consent, and yet that the negotiations between the pursuer and Mr Martin proved abortive for the want of it. I think that the defender was not willing to give his consent, and that it was the refusal of that consent which caused the dismissal of the pursuer. To my mind this is quite clear from the correspondence between the pursuer and defender. [His Lordship then referred to the correspondence.]

The defender is asked for his consent. His answer is that the pursuer may make the agreement without it. The pursuer did not require or desire any such information. I can put no other construction on his letter than that the defender refused to give his consent. I have stated what I conceive to have been his duty in this respect. I am satisfied that his duty was not discharged. He gave the pursuer no assurance that he would not suffer prejudice by entering into an agreement with Mr Martin without his consent, and his conduct forces on my mind the belief that he was trying to induce the pursuer to transact with Mr Martin on that footing, with a clear perception of the benefit which would thence arise to himself.

No. 78.

Ross v.
M'Farlane.

But it is said by the defender that a full consent was given by the letter of Mr Robson dated 1st September 1892. I do not think so, nor did the defender. If he had been of that mind he would have had no hesitation in giving his consent when the pursuer asked for it. He would be doing nothing more than repeating an act of which he had previously approved. But Mr Robson does not deal with the subject. He merely points out three things (1st) that the defender could not be liberated from the agreement without the pursuer's consent; (2d) that such a consent had not been asked; and (3d) that Mr Martin had taken over all the engagements with the staff. He says nothing about the defender's consent nor of the necessity of that consent to preserve the rights of the pursuer. Probably he was under no duty to enter on any such matter. I cannot, however, read his letter as meaning that the pursuer might contract with Mr Martin without forfeiting his claims against the defender. But the just construction of the letter is really a matter of no moment, for the defender refused to act up to the interpretation which he now puts upon it.

A copy of the letter had been forwarded to the defender. He says,—“Your reply is admirable.” It seems to me a very ordinary letter unless it had a meaning which is not apparent on the surface. I think that the defender believed that it might throw the pursuer off his guard and lead him to accept, without the defender's consent, the employment which Mr Martin was likely to offer.

After the pursuer's dismissal by Mr Martin, Mr Robson wrote a letter to Mr Prosser, the agent for the pursuer, on 5th October. It is a remarkable letter, and I think it right to quote from it—[His Lordship read the passage quoted supra, p. 400].

How Mr Robson thought that he had expressed in the first letter what he expresses in the second I cannot comprehend. But his letter had no practical effect, for Mr Martin refused to recede from the position which he took up on the 1st October, and the pursuer's dismissal remained a fact. It is not, however, without importance. If it expresses the true sentiments of the defender, they were strangely concealed. The defender did not act in conformity with them. He was repeatedly asked to give his consent and as often he refused or failed to give it. I am surprised to think that the defender, who wrote the letter of 23d September (see page 399), can pretend that Mr Robson's letter is an accurate expression of what he was willing to do. I am persuaded that it did not become an accurate expression until he knew that the pursuer had been definitely dismissed.

I am of opinion that the defender has not implemented his agreement. If the sale was not a breach, he was bound to enable the pursuer to enter Mr Martin's employment without sacrificing or prejudicing his rights under the agreement. In no other way could he implement his contract. If the sale amounted to a breach, he was equally bound to follow the same course if he was to escape with nominal damages.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark.

THE COURT adhered.

Jan. 28, 1894.
Horsley v. J. &
A. D. Grimond.

J. & A. D. GRIMOND, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—Dickson.

Ship—Bill of lading—Discrepancy between quantity stated in bill of lading and quantity delivered—Proof—Onus.—Where the quantity of goods delivered by a vessel at the port of discharge is less than that stated in the bill of lading the onus of proving that the quantity referred to in the bill of lading was not in fact shipped lies upon the owner of the vessel.

Circumstances in which it was held that a shipowner had not discharged this onus.

Observed (per Lord McLaren) that where goods intended for shipment are measured by weight, pecuniary claims against the shipowner will not necessarily arise upon a slight discrepancy between the weight stated in the bill of lading, and that ascertained at delivery.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-farshire.

MESSRS GEORGE HORSLEY AND MATTHEW HENRY HORSLEY, owners of the steamship "Hesper," belonging to the port of West Hartlepool, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, against Messrs J. & A. D. Grimond, manufacturers, Dundee, for payment of £162, 4s. 11d. as the balance of freight on consignments of jute brought from Calcutta to Dundee.

The defenders produced the bills of lading, which were for 500 bales and 910 bales respectively, and stated that of the 910 bales the pursuers had only delivered 898. They accordingly claimed deduction from the freight sued for of £32, 6s. 6d. as the value of the twelve bales of jute not delivered. The defenders founded on the following clause in the charter-party:—"If quality marks are used on jute they are to be the same size as the leading marks, and contiguous thereto, and if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted by the mate, bills of lading in conformity therewith shall be signed by the captain, and the steamer shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods."

The bills of lading specified the markings on the 910 bales.

The pursuers averred that 898 bales only were shipped.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said vessel having performed the said voyage, and delivered to the defenders respectively all the bales of jute shipped by or consigned to them as aforesaid, and delivered on board at Calcutta, pursuers are entitled, by the terms of the bills of lading, to payment of the freight thereof, with interest and expenses as craved for. (4) If the said twelve bales were not shipped at Calcutta, the pursuers are not responsible therefor.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being responsible, in terms of the charter-party and bills of lading, for the correct delivery of the goods, in conformity with the bills of lading, their answer to the defenders' counter claim for twelve bales short delivered is irrelevant and ought to be repelled. (2) The pursuers having short delivered twelve bales of the quantity consigned to the defenders, and received on board the pursuers' vessel, the defenders are entitled to deduction of the value thereof from the balance of freight claimed from them under one and the same contract.

Proof was led. The pursuers examined the captain of the vessel, George Smith, and the first and the second mates, and from their evidence the following facts appeared:—The cargo was brought alongside the vessel at Calcutta in lighters, and was taken from them on board by means of steam winches. The first mate in the fore part, and the second mate in the after part of the vessel directed the loading, and saw that the tally-clerks employed by the stevedores kept a check on every bale of No. 79. jute as it was put on board.

These witnesses also deponed that every one of the bales shipped at Calcutta was landed at Dundee; that no attempt was discovered on the part of the bargemen to deceive the tally-clerks; that no bales could have been stolen from the ship; and that the twelve bales alleged to have been undelivered could not have been shipped at Calcutta.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Horsley v. J. &
A. D. Grimond.

It appeared, however, that on 14th October, during her voyage home, the "Hesper" had stranded in the Gulf of Suez, and remained aground till the 17th. In order to lighten her and get her off 150 bales of the cargo were transferred from the ship into lighters, where they remained about six or seven hours on a moonlight night. The witnesses deponed that they were carefully counted when they were removed from the ship, and as carefully counted when they were moved back into the ship, the officers being satisfied that they were all put on board again. There was evidence to shew that no watchman was placed on board the lighters while the bales were there.

The evidence as to the number of these bales was not quite consistent. In the log-book made out by the first mate they were entered as "about" 150 bales. While, too, the first and second mates deponed that they were taken on board again in the Bay of Suez, the captain deponed that this took place in the Gulf of Suez. The log-book was also shewn to be not quite reliable, for while the complete cargo was stated there to amount to 17,056 bales, the amounts stated therein day by day to have been received on board came when added up to 18,598 bales. The captain further deponed that the "shortage must have been either through a mistake in tallying, or owing to the bales being broken up through rotting in the course of the voyage."

On 31st July 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders, J. & A. D. Grimond, are, under bills of lading held by them, entitled to delivery from the pursuers, of 1410 bales of jute, and that they have obtained delivery of no more than 1398 bales: Finds that the pursuers are bound either to deliver the twelve bales still undelivered or to establish a valid excuse for their failure to deliver them, or to give the defenders compensation for their value: Finds that the pursuers have failed entirely to establish any valid excuse for non-delivery of said twelve bales, and that therefore they are liable in damages for the value thereof: Assesses the damages at £32, 6s. 6d."

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The onus lay upon the defenders to shew that the bales of jute were actually shipped, for it was not within the scope of a captain's mandate to bind the owners for goods of which he had not obtained delivery, neither could he bind them by representations in a bill of lading that all the cargo mentioned in it had been shipped when it was not.¹ The only evidence tendered by them was the bills of lading. The pursuers, however, had proved conclusively by the best evidence obtainable, viz., that of the ship's officers, that they had used the most careful and anxious methods of checking the cargo, and were satisfied that all the cargo shipped was delivered at the port of discharge. In view of their evidence, it was inconceivable that twelve bales

No. 79. of jute weighing three tons could have been made away with on the voyage. The master must have signed the bill of lading, believing, as in the case of M'Lean & Hope v. Munck [supra, note 1, p. 411], that the short cargo was duly shipped on board. The only incident which could be said to have broken the continuity of the journey from Calcutta was the stranding of the vessel in the Gulf of Suez, but the pursuers had shewn that the 150 bales temporarily removed from the vessel were replaced on board.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Horsley v. J. &
A.D. Grimond.

Argued for the defenders ;—While the receipt granted by a master in a bill of lading was not conclusive evidence against the owners that the goods mentioned in it were actually received on board, it was sufficient evidence of the truth of its contents to throw upon them the onus of shewing that a less quantity of goods than that stated in the document was actually received for carriage.¹ Now the pursuers had completely failed to discharge that onus. They had proved that the bill of lading was only made out by the captain after most careful and anxious precautions to ascertain the precise quantity of cargo actually shipped. It could not even be said that the bales remained in statu quo during the transit from Calcutta to Dundee, and there was nothing to shew that some of the bales temporarily removed during the Suez incident might not have gone amissing. Lastly, even though the pursuers had desired to maintain that the loss of the twelve bales fell under the exception of barratry contained in the charter-party, they would have had to prove affirmatively that the loss fell under that exception by shewing by whom the theft had been committed.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The merchant here has to establish that the ship took on board 910 bales of his jute, and he proceeds to do so by producing the bill of lading, which acknowledges the amount which he now claims. From that point onwards,—after production of the bill of lading, and it being proved to be signed and delivered by the master,—it falls on the ship to shew that that is not an accurate statement of the amount, and that a less amount was truly that which was received on board. The question therefore is simply as to what was taken on board. Once it is ascertained what was taken on board, then the liability of the shipowner is undoubtedly to make that amount forthcoming, because it is no answer for him to say that the goods have disappeared during the voyage, that being merely a confession of his legal liability to make good the deficiency.

Now, the onus in the question of what was taken on board at Calcutta being on the ship, what evidence have we got to make out that 898 and not 910 was the true number of bales taken on board?

The case of the shipowners being in truth an impugning of the accuracy of the statement made at the time by their own master, they certainly take the oddest way of breaking down the accuracy of that written acknowledgment. They put the master and the mate into the witness-box, and these men together prove, first, that the mate went through a most careful and accurate mode of checking what was noted at the time as being put in the ship; and, secondly, that the captain, furnished with the results of this minute and careful process of scrutiny and examination, then, and then only, signs the acknowledgment No. 79. for 910 bales.

The rest of the evidence consists, as the Sheriff-substitute very pungently remarks, of a series of speculations as to how the discrepancy could have arisen. I do not think that there is any successfully established theory made out by that evidence.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Horsley v. J. &
A.D. Grimond.

It is to be noted, as was pointed out to us by Mr Dickson, that the punctual and accurate methods which are so well established as having been applied at Calcutta rather seem to have deserted the officers on the voyage, because the log-book shews certain discrepancies about figures, and there are also pieces of evidence which shew that in the history of the treatment and manipulation of the goods on the voyage, and particularly during the incident in the Gulf of Suez, the officers are not concurrent as to the place and time at which the whole of the goods which had been put out on lighters had been taken back, some saying that it was in the Gulf of Suez and some in the Bay of Suez. But this Suez incident really comes to no more than this,—it cannot be asserted that the goods remained in statu quo from the time when they were taken on board at Calcutta till they were taken out at Dundee, because a part of the goods was undoubtedly put out on lighters at Suez. I do not think that it is at all satisfactorily proved that such minute and continuous watching took place over the goods in the lighters that the twelve bales might not quite well have been taken away then. But I observe on that merely to shew that here again the ship, having the burden of proof upon it, fails to make out the identity of the quantity put out at Dundee with that taken in at Calcutta, the chain being broken by the Suez incident. I revert to this, that the bill of lading sets up the defenders' case, unless its accuracy has been broken down. The shipowners have carefully proved its accuracy, and they have gone on to shew that opportunities occurred during the voyage for the goods going amissing. It seems to me that the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion is right, although the findings in his interlocutor may be slightly varied.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is no doubt true that the receipt granted by the master of a vessel in the bill of lading for certain goods is not conclusive evidence against the owners of the vessel that these goods were in point of fact received on board. But, nevertheless, I think that that receipt does charge the owners with the goods. They may discharge themselves in many ways, but the onus lies upon them to shew that the goods acknowledged in the bill of lading were never in fact received on board, or it may be that owing to an exception in the charter-party they may discharge themselves of the goods.

Now, looking at the facts in the case, I agree with your Lordship that, so far as the owners are concerned, all the evidence goes to confirm the fact that they did receive the goods. The captain took minute care to see that the goods were checked before he signed the bill of lading.

All that the owners say is, that though they are unable to say how the goods disappeared, they did in point of fact disappear.

I agree with your Lordship, and with the Sheriff-substitute, that that is not sufficient to free them from liability.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am very far from asserting that in every case of discrepancy as to weight between descriptive statements in bills of lading and the

No. 79. quantities of goods actually taken on board and delivered, or even in the case of a discrepancy as to the precise number of a large quantity of bales or packages, the bill of lading is to be treated as a document laying upon the owners an unqualified obligation to deliver according to its terms.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Horaley v. J. & A.D. Grimond.

It has been laid down under different forms of expression, in a series of cases, that the master has no authority to sign bills of lading except for the numbers and quantities of goods which he has taken on board his ship; and if it be proved that bills of lading do not represent goods put on board, then, although the bills of lading may be obligatory on the master who signs them, they will not in the case supposed be binding on the owners.

But the question of fact which arises in this case is, I apprehend, to be solved according to the principle laid down in the case of M'Lean & Hope v. Fleming by one of the noble and learned Lords taking part in that case. Lord Chelmsford, after stating the legal limitation of the master's authority, proceeds,—“But it is not to be presumed that the master had exceeded his duty. His signature to the bills of lading is sufficient evidence of the truth of their contents to throw upon the shipowner the onus of falsifying them and proving that he received a less quantity of goods to carry than has been acknowledged by his agent.” Now, the facts of the case in which this principle was laid down were of this nature: It was a case of a contract for carrying a cargo of bones from the Black Sea to Scotland. The ship came home only half filled. The master had protested for short cargo, but in ignorance of the language in which the bills of lading were expressed the master had signed bills of lading representing a quantity in quintels amounting to a full cargo of bones. All the Judges who took part in the decision, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, were of opinion that the owner had discharged the onus of proving that the full cargo represented in the bills of lading was not in fact shipped. I observe the Lord Chancellor says,—“As regards the matter of fact, I think it is proved to demonstration that the cargo never was on board.” But one sees that even in cases where there is no fraud or systematic “short delivery,” there may be discrepancy of weight arising from the carelessness of weighers and difficulty of maintaining a perfectly efficient system of checking the weights and the like. I am anxious that in anything we decide in this case it should not be supposed that in a question as to weight the amount or quantity stated in the bills of lading is to be precisely binding on the owners of the ship, and that in case of a slight discrepancy between the weight stated in the bill of lading and the weight as ascertained at delivery, pecuniary claims against the owners would necessarily or probably arise. Here we have nothing to do with weight, but the contract expressed in the bill of lading is for the delivery of a specific number of bales of jute. These are not small objects as to which mistakes in counting might easily be made. They are bales weighing 4 cwts. Their loading necessarily proceeds slowly though aided by steam machinery, and there ought to be no difficulty in keeping a rigorously exact account of the number of bales put on board. Therefore in such a case I should think the presumption that the bills of lading truly represent the cargo put on board is peculiarly strong, always supposing that there is no fraud on the part of the master.

There is evidence no doubt that the fraudulent abstraction of cargo is a thing which is extensively practised at the port of shipment, Calcutta, but there is no suggestion that there was fraud in this particular case, and I am unable to find in the evidence any statement which proves that a full cargo was not put on board, or which even throws reasonable doubt on the correctness of the bills of lading. If this vessel had performed her voyage without detention at any place, the circumstance that the holds never were opened, or that the goods never were displaced, in the course of the voyage, and that all cargo found in the hold at Dundee was delivered, might have gone some length to prove or to suggest the probability of numerical error in the bills of lading. We are not dealing with a case of that kind, because we know that the ship was stranded near Suez, and it is common ground that 150 bales or thereby were removed from the ship and put into lighters, where they lay for a whole night, and a question arises whether the full number of bales was put on board again.

No. 79.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Horsley v. J. &
A.D. Grimond.

Now, the witnesses who were examined on this point—the master and the ship's officers—say that they were satisfied that all the bales were put on board on the following day, and I do not doubt that in the evidence which they have given these witnesses express their honest belief as to the state of the facts on which they were examined. Still, I cannot see that the evidence altogether excludes the possibility of certain bales having been lost in the process of transshipment. Theft is not the only possibility. Bales may have fallen into the sea when being loaded or unloaded, or when they were lying loose in the lighters. In short, we are necessarily in some ignorance of the history of this incident of the voyage. It is not urged on the part of the owners that they are within one of the known exceptions of a contract of carriage. If their case had been that the ship was stranded, that they used their best endeavours to take care of the cargo during the operation of lightening the ship, but that some of the bales had disappeared notwithstanding the use of proper precautions, a different question would have been raised, and one can easily see that in such a case the owner might succeed in avoiding liability on different grounds. But the owners' case, as maintained by evidence and in argument, is that it has been proved that all of the bales taken out of the ship at Suez were restored, and they seek to bring the case to this—that it is certain that the full quantity of goods set out in the bills of lading was not put on board. I do not think that the evidence is so conclusive on that point as to satisfy me that bales may not have disappeared in the course of the voyage. The result is that the owners have, I think, failed to discharge the duty, which was incumbent upon them if they wished to avoid the present claim, of establishing that the master had signed bills of lading in excess of the quantity of goods put on board, so that to the extent of the difference the owners are not bound by his act. I agree with your Lordships that the interlocutor ought in substance to be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR—I am of the same opinion. A shipmaster has no authority to bind his owners by an acknowledgment on a bill of lading for delivery of goods which have never been taken on board; but on the other hand, the master is the owners' agent to receive the goods when the ship is on general freight, and therefore his bill of lading is evidence against them, that the goods which he acknowledges to have been shipped were in fact shipped. The owners may be released of the obligation which it prima facie imposes on them to deliver the goods in good order, if they can shew that as matter of fact these goods were not put on board; but then the onus of falsifying their own bills of lading or the master's bills of lading lies on them. Therefore it appears to me that the

No. 79. only question we have to consider is the question of fact whether the owners have demonstrated that the bales now in question, which their master acknowledged, were never in fact put on their ship. On that question Jan. 23, 1894. Horsley v. J. & A.D. Grimond. my verdict is in the negative. We cannot infer the quantities shipped from the quantities delivered, because, in consequence of what occurred in the Gulf of Suez, the owners have failed to prove that all the goods shipped at Calcutta were carried safely to Dundee. I think they have failed to disprove the bill of lading, and therefore I agree with your Lordships that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor should be in substance affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 31st July 1893: Find in fact that the master of the 'Hesper' signed and delivered to the defenders, J. & A. Silver v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

Process—Diligence—Railway.—In an action of damages brought against a railway company by the representatives of a wayman in their employment who had been run over by an accident train, the pursuers applied for a diligence to recover a great variety of writings. The Court, without determining whether the pursuers might not be entitled to recover some of the writings on a more limited application, refused the diligence asked for.

1st DIVISION. AN action was brought in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against the Great North of Scotland Railway Company by the widow and children of William Silver, a wayman on the defenders' line of railway, who was killed on 23d January 1893 by being run over by an accident train which had been despatched to assist in removing an obstruction to the line caused by the breakdown of a goods train upon the defenders' up line at Buxburn Station.

The grounds of action were that the defenders' system was defective; that they took no proper precautions for the safety of waymen upon the line; and that the despatch of the accident train was unnecessary, the local staff having proved sufficient to cope with the emergency.

Proof having been allowed, the pursuers appealed to the First Division for jury trial, and moved for a diligence in terms of a specification containing eleven articles.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this application must be refused altogether. It is possible that we might be able to pick out here and there a bit of one or another article which might be the subject of a legitimate application. But the time of the Court is not to be occupied in discussing a scheme by which the pursuers have weaved a web of documents to obscure what is in reality a very simple issue. If the pursuers as the case proceeds can make a limited and relevant application, we will consider it. But as the application now stands it must I think be refused.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM, as being a shareholder in the defenders' company, declined.

Blakiston v.
London and

1ST DIVISION.

The facts above stated having been proved, held that B was entitled to have his petition granted.

ON 10th June 1893, John R. Blakiston, inspector of schools, Sheffield, presented a petition under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), for rectification of the register of the London and Scottish Banking and Discount Corporation, Limited, by removing therefrom his name as holder of forty ordinary shares of £10 each, and one founder's share of £10, and for repayment of the sums paid by him in respect of these shares.

The petitioner averred that he was induced to take the shares by a statement in a prospectus, dated March 1893, to the effect that Robert Scrafton, Esq. (director, Appleton, French, & Scrafton, Limited), who, as was well known to the petitioner, enjoyed a high reputation for business ability and integrity, was to be one of the governors or directors of the company.

"The petitioner has learned, and now avers, that before the said shares were allotted to him the said Robert Scrafton had intimated to the company and to the other governors named in the prospectus that he withdrew his consent to become a governor of the company, and declined to allow his name to be used in any way by the company. The governors of the company when they allotted the said shares to the petitioner were aware of the statement in the prospectus and of Mr Scrafton's withdrawal, but the fact of said withdrawal was not communicated to the petitioner, who acquired the shares and paid the said sums in ignorance thereof. The failure to inform the petitioner of Mr Scrafton's withdrawal was a fraudulent misrepresentation, and the petitioner was thereby materially deceived and induced to acquire said shares."

The company lodged answers, in which they stated that when the prospectus was issued Scrafton had consented to be one of the governors; and they further denied that he had intimated his withdrawal before the shares were allotted, or that they had been guilty of any fraudulent representation or misrepresentation.

The evidence taken at the proof is examined in detail by Lord Kinnear and Lord M'Laren (infra).

The material facts established were as follows:—In January 1893 Mr Scrafton, after meetings and negotiations with Mr A. F. Baker, the provisional secretary of the company, who had invited him to become a director of the company to be formed, agreed to do so, subject to the condition that he should have an opportunity of meeting with the other intended directors for the purpose of going over the articles and memorandum of association, and of satisfying himself in regard to the character of the business which the projected company was going to carry on. Early in March a prospectus was published relative to the formation of the company, in which Mr Scrafton's name was announced as a governor without his having had any meeting with the other directors. On this coming to his knowledge, on or about 7th March, he did not intimate his immediate disapproval of the publication, because he thought he could withdraw at any time before allotment was made. On 11th March, however, he wrote a letter to the secretary, in which he said,—“I am advised that as one of the governors advertised in the prospectus issued to the public I am responsible for every statement in the prospectus, and as I have had no opportunity whatever of verifying the statements contained therein, I cannot take any responsibility in regard to them, and have therefore no alternative but to request that my name may be removed as a governor from the prospectus, and notice may be sent to the public press to this effect, and that in the event of the company going to allotment, notice may also be sent to each shareholder informing them that I had resigned my position as a governor before the company went to allotment." On the 8th of March the petitioner applied for his shares, and on the 14th he received a letter of allotment. No intimation was made to him to the effect that Scafton had withdrawn from the directorate. It was also proved that the petitioner had taken his shares relying on the statement in the prospectus that Scafton was to be a director. He had no personal knowledge of Scafton, but knew that he was a director of Appleton, French, & Scafton, Limited, Middlesborough, a firm of millers of established reputation, and possessing mills in six of the principal towns in Durham and the north of Yorkshire.

No. 81.

Blakiston v.
London and

Argued for the petitioner;—It was established by the evidence that Scafton had made it quite clear to Baker that he could not entertain any proposal that he should join the directorate of the projected company unless he first had an opportunity afforded him of meeting his codirectors in order to look into the memorandum and articles of association and satisfy himself that the business of the projected company was sound and likely to become lucrative. That indeed was only what any prudent man would do before he lent his name to a prospectus and became liable for the accuracy of what it contained. Now, this condition was never fulfilled, and therefore in publishing his name in the prospectus as director the respondents had acted illegally. It was quite true that early in March his attention was called to the printed prospectus, but on the 11th, a few days later, he wrote to the secretary in peremptory terms requesting that his name should be withdrawn from the prospectus, and if the company went to allotment that each shareholder should be informed of the fact. In these circumstances, it was the duty of the respondents to have intimated this to every intending shareholder, and their failure to do so amounted to concealment of a material fact entitling any person who had been induced thereby to take shares to have his contract rescinded. Now, the petitioner had deposed that he had applied for his shares solely in reliance on the name of Scafton in the list of directors. It was also proved that that name was well known both to him and in the commercial world as connected with a firm of established reputation. He had no personal knowledge of Scafton, but he considered the name as a guarantee of the soundness of the prospectus. He had therefore been induced to take his shares by a material concealment or misrepresentation which entitled him to rescission of the contract, and to the remedy prayed for.¹

Argued for the respondents;—It was clear from the evidence that Scafton had intended to become a director of the company, and although he had intimated to the secretary that he desired a meeting with the projected directors in order that he might look into the prospects of the company, he had never taken the trouble to demand one. Moreover, although he was proved to have known on 7th March that the prospectus contained his name, he had made no objection till the 11th,

No. 81. by which time the petitioner had sent in his application for the shares. There was then prior to the petitioner's application no misrepresentation as alleged. But further, even assuming, what was not clearly proved, that Scrafton's letter of 11th March had been intimated to the governors before the shares were allotted to the petitioner on the 14th, there was no obligation upon them to inform him of this fact before allotment, and their failure to do so did not therefore amount to misrepresentation entitling him to rescission of his contract.¹ Lastly, the reliance alleged by the petitioner to have been placed on Scrafton's name was not of that kind which could entitle him to rescission. He admitted that he did not know Scrafton personally, but only by hearsay, as a man of sound financial standing. It had been decided in England that reliance upon the business reputation of a person whose name had been falsely published in a prospectus, without personal knowledge of such person, could only justify rescission where the person relied on was a recognised leader in the commercial world, such as a Rothschild.²

Blakiston v.
London and Scottish
Banking and Discount Corporation,
Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—This is a petition by Mr Blakiston to have his name removed from the register of shareholders of the London and Scottish Banking and Discount Corporation, Limited. The averments of fact which are set forth in the petition, and upon which the petitioner claims this remedy, are, that he was induced to take shares in reliance upon the statements contained in the prospectus of the company, that one of the gentlemen who had agreed to become a director was a certain Mr Robert Scrafton, who enjoys a high reputation for business ability and integrity; and that he has learned, and now avers, that prior to the allotment of shares to him the said Robert Scrafton had intimated to the company and to the other governors named in the prospectus that he withdrew his consent to become a governor of the company and declined to allow his name to be used in any way by the company. Then he goes on to say,—“The governors of the company when they allotted the said shares to the petitioner were aware of the statement in the prospectus, and of Mr Scrafton's withdrawal, but the fact of said withdrawal was not communicated to the petitioner, who acquired the shares and paid the said sums in ignorance thereof. The failure to inform the petitioner of Mr Scrafton's withdrawal was a fraudulent misrepresentation, and the petitioner was thereby materially deceived and induced to acquire said shares.”

It was maintained for the respondents that the petitioner cannot succeed in this petition unless the Court is satisfied that he has made out a case of fraud against them, that he has in fact made out no such case, and therefore that the petition must be dismissed. I may say at the outset that I do not see any ground for charging the governors of this company with fraud; but I think that, nevertheless, the petitioner is quite entitled to have the remedy he seeks, if he has succeeded in proving the averments of fact on which the petition is presented,—even although the inference which he draws from these statements of fact, that there was a fraudulent intention, should not be well founded, as I think it is not,—because the averments of fact, if they are proved, come to this, that a certain representation was made to him which was material to induce him to enter into the contract with the company; that he relied upon this representation when he applied for shares, and that if it were true when it was first made, it had ceased to be true when the company came to conclude the contract by allotting shares to him on his own application. No. 81.

I think, further, when one comes to consider the proof, that the petitioner has made out his case. What he says is that when he first saw the prospectus of this company, he thought, and said to a friend who was with him at the time, that it appeared to be a good thing, and therefore I have no doubt that, on considering the terms of the prospectus itself, he was disposed to become a shareholder of the company. But then nobody of ordinary good sense would act on such an inclination to the effect of acquiring shares and becoming a shareholder unless the statements in the prospectus appeared to him to be vouched by the name of some person either known to himself or enjoying a general reputation known to him, from which he could infer with some confidence that the statements in the prospectus were true. Jan. 24, 1894.
Blakiston v.
London and Scottish
Banking and Discount
Corporation,
Limited.

Now, he says that what induced him to have confidence in this prospectus was that he saw that one of the directors was Mr Scafton, a director of Appleton, French, & Scafton, Limited, Middlesborough. It appears that he is not personally acquainted with this gentleman, and he has no opinion from any knowledge of his own, of his personal capacity, but he does know that the company of which he is a partner is a company of high reputation, and there is evidence that that is the reputation which this company enjoyed. Now, I do not think we have anything whatever to do, in considering this question, with the actual position of this company, of which we know nothing. The only question is whether Mr Blakiston did or did not rely on the general reputation of the company, and upon the fact that Mr Scafton, who was set out on the face of the prospectus as having agreed to be a director, was a managing partner,—a member of a well-known company enjoying a high reputation. He says so himself, and I must say I see no reason for distrusting his evidence. I think we must believe that he resolved to make the application for these shares because, as he said, he was satisfied that a member of this firm, which was well known to him, would have nothing to do with a bogus company. That is to say, he was satisfied that Mr Scafton would not have allowed his name to appear on the prospectus as one of the directors of the company unless he had made such investigation as satisfied him in allowing himself to be held out to the world as vouching for the matters of fact contained in the prospectus, and also for the solidity of the promises which it held out to the public or applicants for shares. Now, I have no doubt, if that be proved as matter of fact, it is a material statement, inducing a member of the public relying on it to become a shareholder; and that if it is not true in point of fact that Mr Scafton gave any authority for the publication of his name in this form, that is a sufficient ground for rescission of the contract. The result is that Mr Blakiston entered into the contract under error as to an essential point, and that his error was induced by the representations of the other contracting party.

The question remains, whether the representation contained in the prospectus was or was not true, either at the first when the prospectus was published, or at the time when the company concluded their contract with Mr Blakiston by allotting shares on his application. As to the authority which Mr Scafton had given to publish his name as a person who had agreed to become a director, I do not think that there can be any question on the evidence, because Mr Scafton gave a perfectly clear account of all that passed between himself and the provisional secretary of the company at the time when he was considering the question of becoming a director, and the only other party to that conversation, the secretary in question, has not been called to dispute Mr Scrafton's statement. I take it therefore that we must assume that that statement is true, and that if Mr Baker, the secretary in question, had been in the box he must have confirmed all that Mr Scrafton says. Now, what he says is this, that having been invited to become a director of this company, he considered the matter favourably, and about the 12th or 13th January he had some correspondence and meetings with Mr A. F. Baker for the purpose of giving his decision on the question. He says that at this meeting Mr Baker said that "so far our arrangements were progressing satisfactorily, but, of course, a meeting would be held of the governors before the prospectus was issued, and before anything was definitely done, so that, of course, I did not trouble in regard to it at all." Then Mr Scrafton went to Norway, and returned on 28th January, and he says—"I saw Mr Baker on my return at the office of the company. He said that nothing much had been done during my absence, and that it would be some little time before the company would be ready to issue the prospectus, and to obtain the capital. But he said that, of course, the governors would be called together for the purpose of going through the articles of association and the prospectus and the agreements and so on before anything was done. I said that, of course, I would be glad to meet the other gentlemen who were proposing to be governors, to go into the business, and see on what lines it was proposed to be done in order that I might be quite satisfied in regard to the character of the business. That is all that passed at that meeting." Then he says at a later part of his examination that he had considered it quite necessary that he should see the articles and memorandum of association before he agreed to be a director.

Now, on that evidence it is, of course, quite clear that there was no completed agreement which could justify the promoters of this company in publishing to the world that Mr Scrafton had agreed to become a director, because he had only agreed to become a director subject to the condition that he should have an opportunity of meeting with the other proposed directors and going over the prospectus and the articles and memorandum of association with them. Mr Jameson referred us to a letter from Mr Baker to Mr Scrafton, dated 10th January, which seems to confirm this view of the matter so far as it goes, because he writes to him, and says,—“I had hoped to have had the pleasure of seeing you here, and if it is impossible for you to call, I am afraid we must abandon the idea of your associating yourself with us. We have the final meeting on Monday to complete prospectus.” There is a little difficulty in reconciling the date of this letter with the evidence. It is not quite clear. I do not think Mr Scrafton is asked about it, or if he is, I have not observed it in the evidence. It is not quite clear whether this was written before or after Mr Baker's interview with Mr Scrafton. If it was written after and referred to it, then it would be confirmation of Mr Scrafton's evidence, when he said,—“I must be present at the meeting of directors before I finally agree to become one,” because what Mr Baker points out is that there is going to be a meeting, and that if he cannot be there, they must give up the idea of his becoming a director. However that may be, the fact remains that on Mr Scrafton's evidence, which, for the reason I have given, I think the respondents cannot dispute, he expected that before he finally agreed to accept the office of a director he must have an opportunity of going over the prospectus and the memorandum and articles of association with the other directors. Now, if that be so, there was certainly no authority for publishing a prospectus with Mr Sraffton's name in it as a director until such a meeting had taken place. And that I think would be quite conclusive of the whole question between the parties were it not that it appears that after the prospectus had been published Mr Sraffton became aware of the fact, although he had given no previous authority for issuing a prospectus with his name in it to the public—he became aware of the fact that it had been issued, and did not at once object to it and put a stop to the publication. He found from a communication which he received from a newspaper office that the prospectus was being advertised. A newspaper proprietor asked him to obtain the company's advertisement for his paper, and Mr Sraffton wrote on 7th March forwarding the application of the newspaper to Mr Baker, the secretary of the proposed company, and saying nothing more against the proposed publication of the prospectus than this,—“I expected directors would be called together before prospectus issued.” Now, the prospectus had been issued before Mr Baker received that letter. There was no antecedent authority to publish to the world a prospectus with Mr Sraffton's name as one of those who were to be directors. The question that appears to be raised is, whether this letter did not supply the previous want of authority, by indicating to the persons in the administration of the company that Mr Sraffton was aware of the intention to publish his name, and did not oppose it. Now, that might be natural if the question were whether Mr Sraffton was in a position to complain of anything that the directors had done upon receipt of that letter. But that is not the question between the parties in this case. Mr Sraffton says,—“I did not take any immediate steps though I saw that my name was being published to the world, but I was aware that I would have an opportunity of withdrawing before allotment,”—that is to say, if on further inquiry he was not satisfied to go on and become a director of the company, he would be entitled to say—“You have no right to publish to the world that I have agreed to be a director, and you must not allot shares to anybody on the faith of a prospectus containing my name,” because he was not only entitled to withdraw from the office of director, but to withdraw from the position in which he was placed before the public as a person who had given his approval of the statements in this prospectus. And therefore Mr Sraffton was probably right enough in thinking that no harm would be done by his abstaining from intimating an immediate disapproval of the publication, because he could withdraw before allotment was made on the faith of the prospectus already published. Therefore it does not appear to me, so far, that the company has placed itself in a position of being able to say to anybody who has applied for shares on the faith of that prospectus that they had in fact Mr Sraffton's authority for saying he had agreed to become one of the directors.

But then the matter does not rest there, for, after consideration, Mr Sraffton writes a most clear and peremptory letter to the secretary for the company on the 11th March, in which he says,—“I am advised that as one of the governors advertised in the prospectus issued to the public I am responsible for every statement in the prospectus, and as I have had no opportunity whatever of verifying the statements contained therein, I cannot take any responsibility in regard to them, and have therefore no alternative but to request that my name may be removed as a governor from the prospectus, and notice may be sent to the public press to this effect, and that in the event of the company going to allotment, notice may also be sent to each shareholder informing them that I had resigned my position as a governor before the company went to allotment," and then goes on to say he had never in his previous experience become identified with any company without having an opportunity of knowing more about it than he knew about this one. Now, a question has been raised whether this letter was or was not before the administrators of the company when they made the allotment of which the petitioner complains. I think we must hold it quite clearly established that it was before them. Mr Scrafton is quite distinct in his evidence in saying that he wrote a letter in these terms and gave it to be posted, and he is corroborated by his clerk, against whose evidence I can see nothing that can be said, and he is further corroborated by the circumstance that his letter, or a letter of the same date, written from him, and containing the same information, must have been received by Mr A. F. Baker, because in this letter he communicates a certain address in London as the place where he would be found on Monday and during the following week, and on Monday he received a telegram from Mr Baker to that address. But then I think what is absolutely conclusive, if there were ever any doubt at all on the evidence, is this—that in the first place Mr Baker, who was a responsible officer of the company at the date of this letter, and must have received it if it was despatched at all, is not called as a witness to deny that he received it, and again that the persons who proceeded to allot the shares, and before whom this letter ought to have been laid if Mr Baker did his duty, are not called to say that they did not see it. Certain directors of the company who were appointed subsequent to the allotment were called to say that they knew nothing about it, but we have not the evidence of the persons by whom the allotment was actually made, and I think if the intention of the respondents had been to prove that the allotment was made without any knowledge of this letter having been written and being before their secretary, they ought to have called on persons who made it and who were managing the company's affairs at the time. Mr Scrafton's evidence as to what passed between him and Mr Baker would perfectly well explain the proceeding of the company to go on with the allotment notwithstanding that they had Mr Scrafton's letter before them, for he says that, according to Mr Baker's account, they did so intentionally in order that the allotment might not be delayed by other possible resignations. Now, we have no contrary evidence, and again I say that if the company intended to dispute Mr Scrafton's account of what passed at that meeting with Mr Baker, the same obligation lay upon them as lay on them in regard to the letter: they were bound to produce Mr Baker as a witness or account in some way, which they have not done, for his absence.

Now, if the result of the evidence is that at the time when the subscribers of the memorandum of association—for I understand it was they who made the allotment—proceeded to allot the shares to Mr Blakiston,—that is to say, to complete the contract of the company with him as an independent shareholder,—they were aware that Mr Scrafton, of the firm of Appleton, French, & Scrafton, whose name they had published for the purpose of giving confidence in the statements in their prospectus to those persons who might know Mr Scrafton and rely on his capacity and his honesty—if they knew at the time they were completing the contract with Mr Blakiston that Mr Scrafton declined to be a director, and had withdrawn any consent he might have been supposed to have previously given for that purpose, I think they were not entitled to withhold that information from the persons contracting with them. If it be proved—and I think it is proved—that Mr Blakiston made his offer in reliance on the reputation of Mr Scafton, and that at the time his offer was accepted by the allotment of shares the administrators of the company were perfectly well aware that Mr Scafton had not agreed, and did not intend to agree, to be a director, then I think the petitioner has made out his case, that he has been induced to make this contract in reliance on representations material to induce to that result, and that that representation was made by the company in the knowledge that it was in fact untrue. I am therefore of opinion that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an application by Mr Blakiston to be relieved of his contract to take shares with the London and Scottish Banking and Discount Corporation, Limited, on the ground that he was induced to enter into the contract by fraud; but at an early stage of the argument it became apparent that the petitioner had taken upon himself an unnecessary onus, and that it was sufficient for the purpose of this case that he should prove that he had purchased the shares—or rather agreed to take the shares—under essential error, induced by an agent of the company. Now, a consideration of the case involves two elements, whether there was in the mind of Mr Blakiston error relating to the essentials of the contract to take shares, and whether he took the shares in reliance on erroneous statements made to him—in other words, whether he was induced by the secretary of the company, or someone for whom the company is responsible, to enter into this contract.

On the first point, I think that while the evidence involves a variety of considerations, the import of it as a whole is clear that there was error in the statement made in the prospectus of the names of the directors of the company, and in allowing that statement to remain after one of the directors had intimated his withdrawal. Mr Scafton, the gentleman concerned, certainly admits, and his letters prove, that he had responded favourably to an invitation to join the company as a director—that he was willing to become a director, provided he was satisfied as to the prospects of the concern, and the truth of the statements made in the prospectus which was to be given out. I think there can be no doubt of that; but I think also that he was well entitled to make his consent to join the company conditional, especially when we consider that under a recent statute persons who allow their names to appear in prospectuses as directors are held responsible for the accuracy of the statements which they subscribe. Now, it may be, if we were here on a question between the company and Mr Scafton, that Mr Scafton had not taken all the opportunities that were open to him to become acquainted with the affairs of the company. He went off to Norway just at the time when the meeting of gentlemen who were proposed as directors was to take place, and it may be that the promoters of the company were entitled after what had passed in the verbal communings, and after Mr Scafton's letters, to insert his name in the proof prospectus believing that they would be able to satisfy him on the points on which he had stipulated for information. And I would say further, that when Mr Scafton received the proof, and especially after he had been informed that the prospectus was advertised, he was hardly in a position to say, if he left that advertisement uncontradicted, that he had not authorised its publication. But then we are not here in a question between Mr Scafton and the company—Mr Scafton may or may not have had good reasons for withdrawing. It rather appears that he had been led to take the final step by information which he received at the last moment from a different source; but he was entitled to withdraw at any time before allotment, and in the letter which Lord Kinnear has read he does most unequivocally resile from his informal undertaking to join the board, and gives his reasons for so doing. It is clear enough that this letter was received on the morning of the day appointed for allotment, because we have a telegram sent to the address given in the letter.

Now, in that state of the facts, and the contract between Mr Blakiston and the company being still incomplete,—because, of course, it required acceptance by the company in order to make a contract—they were in no way bound to allot the shares,—in that state of the facts, if the company were to proceed to allot shares to a shareholder who relied on Mr Scafton's name in the knowledge that Mr Scafton no longer intended to be a director, I must say that, whatever may have been their original position, they were certainly inducing him to go on and complete a contract under material error as to a matter affecting the constitution of the company. It is no answer to say that at the time when they signed the prospectus the promoters believed Mr Scafton was to join them. The truth is, that at the time when the contract was completed Mr Blakiston was under essential error, and that was induced by the neglect of the promoters of the company to give him notice of the change of circumstances that had taken place.

As regards the second point, the materiality of the change of matters consequent on Mr Scafton's withdrawal, I think that it must always be a material circumstance to a person who intends to subscribe to a company, that in a statement submitted to him there is a guarantee for good administration by a board of directors, consisting of men of substantial financial position and business capacity. In one of the cases cited the observation is made, with which I agree, that the names of the directors would generally be the first thing that is looked at by anyone who thinks at all of subscribing to a company. Now, I think that the illustration given in the case of Chadwick of a person induced to take shares in reliance on the names of one of the two leading financial houses in the world, is not to be taken as a normal case of what was meant by the learned Judge, but rather as an extreme illustration. It does appear to me that a party seeking to invest in a new company may very well rely on the circumstance that the list of directors contains a name which he knows as the name of a firm of established reputation—such a firm as we have here of millers, who have six mills in six of the principal towns of Durham and the north of Yorkshire, and which is known to be an established firm. The fact that a director is a partner of that firm might very well be considered a material element by someone who was not personally acquainted with him, but who merely looks to his known reputation. People entrust the conduct of their business and the treatment of their ailments to professional persons on no other ground than that they know these names as the names of leading men in their professions, and therefore I think there is nothing in the statement of Mr Blakiston that is at all improbable, and certainly there is no contradiction of his statement that he did in fact rely on Mr Scafton's name, and would not have made the application for shares but for the circumstance that he, or someone of like reputation, known to him to be a man of business habits and capacity, was on the list of directors. No. 81.

Now, the result of these considerations is, that, in my view of the case, the promoters of the company were not entitled to proceed with the allotment so far as Mr Blakiston was concerned after having received notice of Mr Scafton's withdrawal. They might, if they pleased, have adjourned the allotment, and might have tried to satisfy Mr Scafton; but supposing they failed to do so, or supposing they did not choose to apply to him again, then their clear duty was to intimate to all applicants for shares this change in the constitution of the company. It was all the more necessary that they should do so, seeing that, as I have pointed out already, in a recent statute applicants could hold those who subscribed the prospectus as guarantors of the statements contained in it.

I am therefore of opinion with your Lordships that the petitioner is entitled to have his name taken off the register.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Mackenzie v. Cameron.

DUNCAN M'INNES, a crofter on the estate of Cameron of Lochiel, died on 9th May 1892, leaving a general disposition and settlement, which he, inter alia, specially conveyed his whole right, title, and interest in and to his croft to John Mackenzie, a son of the testator's mother's sister. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn.

Lochiel having intimated that he objected to receive Mackenzie as crofter in the holding, Mackenzie brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Fort-William against him, praying for decree that he was crofter of and in the croft lately occupied by M'Innes in virtue of M'Innes' disposition in his favour, and of the provisions of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886.*

* The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 16, enacts,—"A crofter may, by will or other testamentary writing, bequeath his right to his holding to one person, being a member of the same family,—that is to say, his wife or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy (hereinafter called the 'legatee'), subject to the following provisions:—

Lochiel pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (3) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (8) The pursuer not being of the same family as the said Duncan M'Innes,—that is, not being a person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to the said Duncan M'Innes in case of intestacy, he is not entitled to the bequest in his favour.

On 23d October 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that Duncan M'Innes, a crofter, who died on 9th May 1892, bequeathed, inter alia, his right to his holding to the pursuer, and that the pursuer was related to the testator through his mother, who was a sister of the testator's mother: . . . Finds that, in the circumstances stated, the pursuer is not a member of the same family as the testator within the meaning of section 16 of the Crofters Act, 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29, and that the bequest is quoad the right to said holding null and void: Therefore sustains the first, third, and eighth pleas in law for the defender: Refuses the prayer of the petition: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer appealed. The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The appeal was competent. A statutory declaration that the decision of the Sheriff, or other inferior Court, "shall be final," did not of necessity exclude review.¹ Here the decision which was said to be final was a decision upon an objection by the landlord to receiving the pursuer as a crofter, on the ground that he was not a legatee in the sense of the Act. That was an objection on law, and did not raise a question as to what was "reasonable." Such phraseology pointed to objections by the landlord to the individual legatee, and assumed that he was a legatee in the sense of the Act,—that was to say, that he was within the relationship required by the Act. To hold that the decision of the Sheriff was final on questions as to the classes of persons entitled to succeed under the Act would make it impossible to correct any diversity of construction that might arise in the Sheriff Courts. (2) On the merits the Sheriff-substitute was wrong. It was conceded that on the first part of the 16th section of the Act taken by itself the appellant could not prevail, for he could never have succeeded to the deceased ab intestato, but the proviso at the end of the section showed that relations by affinity were included; "sons-in-law" being mentioned per expressum. It was reasonable, therefore, to put a wide construction on the word "family" in the earlier part of the clause, and to hold that relatives on the mother's side as well as on the father's were within the scope of the the legatee as crofter in the holding, the legatee may present a petition to the Sheriff, praying for decree declaring that he is the crofter therein as from the date of the death of the deceased crofter, of which petition due notice shall be given to the landlord, who may enter appearance and state his grounds of objection, and if any reasonable ground of objection is established to the satisfaction of the Sheriff, he shall declare the bequest to be null and void; but otherwise he shall decern and declare in terms of the prayer of the petition.

"(e) The decision of the Sheriff under such petition as aforesaid shall be final.

"Provided always that in the case of any legatee or heir-at-law more distant than wife, son, grandson, daughter, grand-daughter, brother, or son-in-law, it shall be competent to the landlord on his own part, or on the part of neighbouring crofters, to represent that, for the purpose of enlarging their holding or holdings, the holding ought to be added to them. . . ."

Mackenzie v.
Cameron.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The petitioner here has no case upon the merits of the action; he is not a member of the testator's family.

I confess I feel some doubt as to the competency of this appeal, but with the view I take of the case it is not necessary to decide that question.

LORD YOUNG.—The appellant's counsel conceded in the course of the debate that his client could not have any claim to this croft if his right was to be judged by the earlier words of the 16th clause of the Crofters Act—that is to say, the appellant is not a person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to the testator in case of intestacy. Therefore I consider that the appellant's case does not come under the provisions of the Act, unless we think that that position is not conclusive of the matter.

It was argued that the latter part of the section shewed that the testator could leave his croft by testamentary writing not only to those who would have succeeded in case of intestacy, but that the word "family" used in the Act must be largely extended so as to include anyone who is connected with him by ties of relationship. In my opinion we cannot read the statute in that way, and therefore I think the appellant has no claim to this croft.

On the question of whether the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor is final on this question, my opinion is that the statute contemplates that the landowner may have some reasonable objection to the person to whom the croft has been bequeathed, if that person is one to whom under the statute the croft may have been legally bequeathed, and in that case the landowner is invited to come before the Sheriff to state his reasonable objection, and the Sheriff's decree on that matter is stated to be final. My opinion is, however, that if the objection is that the croft has been bequeathed to a person to whom it could not legally be bequeathed, as not being within the relationship prescribed by the Act, the decision of the Sheriff finding that he is or is not within that relationship would not be final. I do not think that is a "reasonable ground of objection" in the sense of the statute, or that the Sheriff's decision is final as regards it. If it were otherwise the Sheriff might find that a person who was no relation whatever of the testator was a member of the family to whom the croft had been given, or on the other hand he might find that some near relation, a son of the testator perhaps, and to whom no reasonable person could take objection, ought to be rejected, and in each case his judgment would be final. I do not think that that is the meaning of the statute. It is not, however, necessary to decide that question in this case, because it is enough for decision that this appellant has no claim on the croft under the statute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—With regard to the competency of the appeal I admit I have some doubts, but I do not enter into that question.

It is enough for my decision that I am clear the appellant has not a right to this croft under the provisions of the Crofters Act.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am clear that the appellant has no claim to this croft, as he is not a member of the family of the testator as defined by the statute.

Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Custody of Child—Cruelty to Wife—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 27), sec. 5.—In a petition by a husband for custody of his children against his wife, who had removed the children from his custody and from the jurisdiction of the Court under pretence of taking them on a visit to their grandfather, the wife averred that on some occasions the petitioner had treated his children with cruelty, and that their health and morals would suffer if they were given up to their father, and further averred cruelty on his part towards herself. The Court granted the prayer of the petition, holding that the averments as to the father's conduct to the children were not such as to shew that, in the event of their being given into the custody of the father, their moral and physical welfare would suffer; and that (following Lang v. Lang, January 30, 1869, 7 Macph. 445, and Stewart v. Stewart, June 3, 1870, 8 Macph. 821), the averments of cruelty to the wife did not afford ground for interference with the father's right to the custody of his children.

*Observed (per the Lord President) that the applicability of the decisions in Lang v. Lang, 7 Macph. 445, and Stewart v. Stewart, 8 Macph. 821, as to the relevancy of averments of cruelty to the wife by the husband in such cases as the present, did not seem to be materially affected by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

1ST DIVISION. ON 6th July 1893 Colonel James Stevenson, a domiciled Scotsman, presented a petition in which he prayed the Court to ordain his wife, Mrs Florence L. Stevenson, to deliver up to his custody the children of the marriage, viz., a boy, born 1st May 1886, and two girls, born on 19th June 1887 and 11th March 1889 respectively.

He stated that his wife had left his house at Braidwood, Lanarkshire, on 26th April 1893, taking the children with her, and that she had refused to return to him though he was anxious that she should.

Mrs Stevenson lodged answers, in which she averred that the petitioner had treated her cruelly during their married life. She condescended on various acts of violence to her, and averred that he had systematically insulted her, threatened her with personal violence, and generally ill-treated her. With regard to her leaving the petitioner's house she averred,—“The respondent was driven to the conclusion that she must cease to live with the petitioner owing to his cruelty. She was constantly apprehensive, not only on her own account but on account of her children, of outbursts of violence on the petitioner's part. She, however, found it necessary to arrange for leaving in such a way as would enable her to get the children removed along with her. She consequently endured her husband's conduct until March 1893, when she requested the petitioner, owing to her impaired health, to allow her to go with the children to visit her parents at St Leonards-on-Sea. In order to procure his consent to her doing so she agreed that the visit should be limited to a few weeks. Had she not taken this course the petitioner would have absolutely prevented her taking away the children along with her.”

With regard to the petitioner's treatment of the children she averred that if they were given up to him their health and morals would be endangered, and that “the petitioner has neglected and taken no interest in the said children, and has otherwise so conducted himself that the Court should refuse to enforce his right to their custody, and in particular has allowed them to be brought up by the respondent at her own expense for such a length of time and under such circumstances as to deprive him of any ground for alleging that he has in any one particular duly discharged his parental duties.”

She averred further,—“He constantly called her [the respondent] a ‘pig,’ a ‘brute,’ a ‘damned liar,’ and an ‘ugly devil,’ told her to go to the devil in the presence and hearing of her children, used other insulting expressions to her, and annoyed her in numerous ways. . . . Not only did the petitioner subject the respondent personally to every kind of annoyance and humiliation, and threaten to take her children away from her, but he expressed his threats, and habitually used profane and blasphemous language, in the presence of the children themselves. The consequence was that the eldest child of the marriage, who is now only about seven years old, acquired a habit of repeating the oaths which his father used, and on being checked for this he defended himself on the ground that he was quite entitled to use the same language as his father. The petitioner in this way has gravely endangered the morals of the children. . . . Further, he has on some occasions treated the children with actual cruelty. In particular, on one occasion in the course of the winter 1892-93, he stamped violently with his shooting boots upon the foot of the son of the parties, Samuel Delano, causing it to swell and to become inflamed; on another occasion he thrashed the elder daughter, aged six, in a severe and painful manner; while at other times his conduct has been such as to alarm and terrify the children. . . . The petitioner possesses no income from which to maintain the said children suitably to their station if they should be handed over to him.”

She further stated that the son was suffering from rupture and required frequent surgical aid and careful treatment, and that such treatment could only be insured under her supervision and that of a skilled nurse.

She further averred that the petitioner's means, which she stated were about £350 a-year, were insufficient to bring up the children properly or suitably. Her own means consisted of a provision of £600 per annum from her father under her marriage-contract, and an additional £400 per annum subsequently allowed to her.

She founded, inter alia, on the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.*

Stevenson v.
Stevenson.

The petitioner denied the averments of cruelty to his wife and children, and stated that he had a sufficient income to educate and maintain the latter.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was settled law that a father is the natural custodian of his children, and the Court would oust him from that position only if it were shewn that the children would suffer in life, health, or morals by being left with him.¹ Under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the Court had possibly a freer hand given to it in dealing with such cases, but the considerations for the Court were the same after the Act as before it.² Cruelty to a wife did not oust the father from his position as natural guardian.³ Nor was it sufficient to state that the father was not in sufficiently good circumstances to make the child as comfortable as it would have been with the mother; all that was required was that he should be able to keep them from suffering from actual want.⁴ In this case the averments of cruelty to the children amounted to nothing at all.

Argued for the respondent;—In questions of this kind, under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the way in which the father had fulfilled his whole marital duty was to be taken into consideration, and cruelty by a husband to his wife was a breach of that duty, and entitled the Court to say that he was unfit to have the charge of his children.⁵ The principles of the common law in England with regard to such questions were the same as those of Scotland,—the paternal right, the whole marital duty of the husband, and the interests of the children, were all equally to be regarded. The decision of the Privy Council in Smart's case was of the highest authority, if not actually binding on the Court.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner is a Scotsman, resident on his estate of Braidwood, in Lanarkshire. The present application to the Court is occasioned by his wife having removed his children from his house, as she now avows in her answers, on the pretence that she was taking them to pay a few weeks' visit with her to her parents in England, but really with the intention of never returning, and of keeping the children in England.

This is a bad beginning to the respondent's case, and places her in an unfavourable position so far as conduct is concerned. She can take no advantage by the fraud she perpetrated on her husband, and her case must be considered as if she, and not her husband, were in petitorio. Now, when the answers are analysed, it will be found that, despite their great length, there is very little substance in them. What we are in search of is some definite reason for believing that it would be injurious to the interests of the children that they should remain in their father's house, which is their proper home, and from which they have been surreptitiously removed. The answers are largely taken up with complaints of the petitioner's conduct towards his wife. But, even taking those statements as true, they cannot be held to be relevant having regard to the decisions in Lang and Steuart, the applicability of which does not seem to be materially affected by the Infants Act of 1886. Moreover, it is impossible to disregard the fact that the respondent has not sought the remedy of separation, which this Court could have given her if she had had an authentic case of cruelty.

So far as the allegations in the answers relate to the petitioner's conduct towards the children, they amount to very little that is substantial, and do not seem to me to present a case giving rise to any reasonable conviction that the children will be injured in health, mind, or morals by living in their father's house. On the other hand, our refusing the petition would perpetuate the breaking up of the family.

In reaching the conclusion that the prayer should be granted, I have in consideration the welfare of the children, the conduct of the parents, and the wishes as well of the mother as of the father.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition, and found no expenses due to or by either party.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 52.—Held that it is incompetent to reclaim against an interlocutor, pronounced on the reclaimer's motion, with a view to submitting a prior interlocutor to review.

THIS action was raised by Mrs Ann Watson, Windygates, Fife, against Robert Morison, accountant, Perth, trustee under the settlement of Miss Helen Cruickshank, dated 20th July 1886, and against Miss Ellen Ann Russell and others, concluding for reduction of the settlement and codicils, on the ground that the testator was not of sound mind at the time they were executed.

On 23d November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) held production satisfied. The original documents had not been produced, but only copies.

The pursuer did not ask leave to reclaim against this interlocutor.

On 5th December the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the proposed issues, of consent assolizies the defender, Robert Morison, from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the Auditor to tax and report: Quoad ultra approves of the said issues as now adjusted and settled, and appoints the same to be the issues for the trial of the cause."

The issues approved were the issues proposed by the pursuer.

The pursuer reclaimed, with a view to the recall of the interlocutor of 23d November holding production satisfied.

Watson v.
Russell.

The defenders, Miss Russell and others, objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, on the ground that it was not competent for the pursuer to reclaim against an interlocutor which had been pronounced at her own request.

The pursuer founded on section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The reclaimer has not satisfied me of the competency of her reclaiming note, the objection to which is palpable. The interlocutor against which the reclaiming note is presented was pronounced on her own motion, as is evidenced by the fact that the issues which the Lord Ordinary approves of are those very issues which were lodged by the pursuer as the issues proposed by her for the trial of the cause.

Apart from the 52d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, no argument was advanced in support of the proposition that a party is entitled to reclaim against an interlocutor pronounced on his own motion; and good sense forbids the idea.

Now the 52d section does not purport to enable a party to reclaim against a particular interlocutor who formerly could not have reclaimed against that interlocutor. It merely says, so far as the reclaimer is concerned (and therefore, so far as this question is concerned), that every reclaiming note shall have the effect of submitting to review the whole of the prior interlocutors instead of merely the interlocutor primarily and directly reclaimed against. The hypothesis of the section is that there is a competent reclaiming note against the interlocutor purporting to be reclaimed against, and the criteria of that competency are not altered by the 52d section.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this reclaiming note should be refused as incompetent.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Title to sue—Acquisition of right and title after action raised.—A, the purchaser of a vessel from B, brought an action of damages in his own name and as assignee of B against C for injuries which had been done to the vessel prior to the date of the purchase. The summons was served on the 28th June 1893. On the 29th June the seller of the ship assigned to A all claims competent to him against C. Held (1) that at the date of the action A had no right to damages for injury done to the vessel prior to his purchase, and had no title to sue; and (2) that the subsequent assignation did not remedy the defect.

* Section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, provides,—“Every reclaiming note, whether presented before or after the whole cause has been decided in the Outer-House, shall have the effect of submitting to the review of the Inner-House the whole of the prior interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of whatever date, not only at the instance of the party reclaiming, but also at the instance of all or any of the other parties who have appeared in the cause. . . .”

JOSEPH A. SYMINGTON raised an action of damages "for his own individual right and interest, and also as assignee of Robert Symington," against James Campbell of Jura, concluding for £400. The summons was signeted and served on 28th June 1893.

No. 85.

Symington v.
Campbell.

He stated, inter alia, that he was the owner of a vessel called the "Alarm," which he had purchased on 18th May 1893 from Robert Symington, who again had bought it from James M'Allister and James Nelson in 1890. That in an action of damages brought by the defender Campbell against M'Allister and Nelson in January 1893 the vessel (being Robert Symington's property) had been illegally arrested on 3d February. "The defender having seized the said vessel, has since detained it in his possession. After seizure the messenger-at-arms employed, William Dunlop, proceeded to dismantle the said vessel. . . . The process of dismantling was carried through without reasonable care and skill, which the defender, or those acting for him, were bound to exercise, but negligently, and with reckless disregard of the pursuer's property. . . . Further, instead of keeping the vessel in safe harbour and taking all reasonable precautions for its preservation, as defender, or those acting for him, were bound to do, the said vessel was allowed to drift, and was ultimately run aground on the open beach in what is called the 'Clay Hole,' and was left there, where it still remains, without anyone being instructed to take charge of it. In consequence thereof the said vessel has now become unseaworthy. . . . In its present condition it is of little value, and would require extensive and thorough repairs. These repairs cannot be executed at Stranraer, and the vessel is unseaworthy, and cannot, in its present state, be removed, and is fast breaking up. . . .

1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

"Serious loss and damage has been suffered by the pursuer and his author through the said illegal and wrongous action. The said vessel, when seized, was in course of a trading voyage between Belfast and Stranraer. Further, by the detention of said vessel, there has been lost the trading season which was just beginning when its seizure was effected, and to repair the vessel will take some considerable time. Further, the said vessel has been so injured by the manner in which she has been dismantled and dealt with since the defender took possession of her that it will cost not less than £250 to refit and replace the said vessel in as good a condition as when she was seized. The said Robert Symington has assigned to the pursuer all claims competent to him in respect of the illegal arrestment or detention of the said vessel, and of the damage done to said vessel by the fault or negligence of the defender, or those for whom he was responsible."

The pursuer produced an assignation by Robert Symington in favour of the pursuer bearing to be granted in consideration of a sum presently paid and dated 29th June 1893.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The arrestment and detention of the said vessel having been illegal and unwarranted, the defender is liable therefor in reparation to the pursuer. (2) The dismantling and subsequent dealing with said vessel having been illegal and unwarranted, the pursuer is entitled to reparation therefor.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

On 20th December 1893 the Lord Ordinary, Kincairney, reserved the defender's plea of no title to sue so far as it related to the pursuer's claim of damages on account of the alleged illegal and unwarranted arrestment of the vessel, and, quoad ultra, repelled the defender's plea of no title to sue, and allowed a proof.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Title to sue.—As owner of the ship the pursuer had no title to sue, for, on his own statement, the alleged damage had been done prior to the date when he became owner. As assignee of the seller he had no title, for the action was raised on the 28th June, the date on which the summons was served,¹ and the assignation was dated the 29th June. This was not the case of a person having a substantial right at the date of raising the action, and going on to formally complete his title before decree, for prior to the assignation the pursuer had no right at all. The passage in *Stair*² referred to by the pursuer did not therefore apply.

The pursuer argued;—Title to sue.—The pursuer had an independent title as owner of the ship to vindicate against anyone not shewing a better title all claims for compensation arising directly out of injuries done to the ship at whatever date. But if that title were in itself insufficient, then the defect was cured by the assignation. That had been lodged before the closing of the record. It would have been sufficient had it been lodged at any time before decree.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no answer to the objection raised by the defender to the pursuer's title.

At the date when the summons was signeted and served, both things being done upon the same day, the pursuer had no assignation from Robert Symington; and accordingly, so far as regards the injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon the owner of the vessel during the ownership of Robert Symington, this pursuer had no title to sue, and valid objections have been raised to the action going on. This is not the case of a person having at the time of raising the action a substantial right, requiring only formal completion. The title of the pursuer here depends on an assignation, which he does not say had been gone into at all before the action was raised. The whole transaction took place after the summons had been served. This sweeps away, on the pursuer's own shewing, his title to nearly all that he is suing for. It is clear that a man who buys a ship does not thereby buy all previous claims for damages connected with the ship, and therefore the pursuer's claim for damages, so far as rested on what took place before he became owner of the ship, goes by the board. I go further and say that there is no averment on this record of any injury having been inflicted upon the owner of the ship after May 1893, when the pursuer bought it. The latest incident averred is that the vessel was allowed to drift away owing to the defender's carelessness, and in consequence got into an unseaworthy condition. Now, all this occurred before the 17th May 1893. There is, it is true, a suggestion by the pursuer as to damage having been suffered by him, owing to the non-delivery of the vessel by the defender, but his averments upon this point are of too shadowy and unsubstantial a character to be worthy of consideration, and are irreconcilable with his account of the hopeless condition of the ship at and prior to the date in question. I am of opinion that the defender has stated a good objection to the pursuer's title, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the action dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

The pursuer here alleges that he has a good title to sue, upon two grounds, No. 85.
1st, that he is the purchaser of the ship; 2d, that he is the assignee of all claims for damages connected with the ship.

Jan. 30, 1894.
Symington v.
Campbell.

The facts with regard to the second of these two propositions are as follows:—The summons in this action was served upon the 28th of June, which, according to the authorities cited to us, is the date of the raising of the action. The assignation is dated June 29th, the day after the raising of the action. The question before us is whether at the date of raising the action the pursuer had a title to sue. I think he had not, and that suspecting this he procured the assignation next day in order that he might have a good title. It has been suggested that this case is like that of executors who have been held able to sue competently before getting confirmation, and that in consequence it is competent for the pursuer here to sue. But the difference between the cases is that the executors had a good title at bottom, which they only required to have formally made absolute, while the pursuer here had absolutely no title, till the assignation had been entered into. “But,” says the pursuer, “I have a title qua purchaser.” This title he obtained in May 1893, but all the damage to the vessel was done before that date, and the mere fact of becoming the proprietor of a ship will not give the purchaser the right to claims for damages sustained before his purchase. The pursuer tried to remedy this defect by procuring the assignation, but he did so too late for the purposes of this action.

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has no title to sue.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defender's plea of no title to sue, and dismissed the action.

Reparation—Personal injury—Road—Horse frightened by manure piled on ground adjoining road—Occupation of ground by trespasser.—In an action of damages for personal injury the pursuer averred that the defender was the proprietor of a farm of which the pursuer was tenant, and from which he was to remove at Whitsunday; that before the term of removal the defender entered on a field on the farm and placed thereon a heap of bags of manure covered with a tarpaulin, which flapped in the wind, close to the private road leading to the farm-house; that on 12th May, while the pursuer was driving along the road his horse shied at the manure bags, and overturned the conveyance, whereby the pursuer was seriously injured. He further averred that the defender in placing the bags where he did was a trespasser on the ground in the pursuer's occupation. Held (1) that the pursuer's averments, apart from the statement as to trespass, were not relevant to support an issue of fault on the part of the defender in placing the manure near the road; but (2) that he was entitled to an issue whether the defender wrongfully placed the bags of manure upon a field in the occupation of the pursuer, and whether the pursuer was injured by his horse taking fright thereat.

THOMAS GIBSON, Dumfries, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at 1ST DIVISION.
Kirkcudbright against Robert Stewart, Esq. of Culgruff, concluding for Sheriff of £500 for damages in respect of personal injury alleged to have been Dumfries and caused by the fault of the defender. Galloway.

The pursuer became tenant of the farm of Airds, of which the defender was proprietor, at Whitsunday 1891, on a lease for fifteen years. On 12th December 1892 he executed a deed of renunciation of the lease in favour of the defender, whereby he became bound to remove from the houses and grass lands at Whitsunday 1893, and from the land in white crop at the separation of the crop.

The pursuer averred that on the afternoon of 12th May, "when driving down the loaning or farm-road that leads from Airds farm-house to the public road, the pursuer observed, for the first time, a large quantity of bags of artificial manure built up within a corn field on his said farm of Airds, and immediately adjacent to the said loaning on the west side thereof. . . . The defender had no right to the pursuer's corn crop growing there, nor to the use of that part of the field where the bags were placed. The bags were placed close to pursuer's corn crop, close to the side of said loaning where it is unfenced, and near to the gate between said corn field and a fallow field, in the latter of which the pursuer afterwards learned the manure was to be used. The height of the bags so built up was over 7 feet, and they were placed within 2½ feet of the inner wheel track of said loaning. They presented an unusual appearance, and emitted a strong, offensive smell. For the purpose of removing any cause of alarm in his pony on account of the manure bags, the pursuer in driving down said loaning and observing the said bags, came off his trap, and as a precautionary step in taking the animal past them for the first time, he walked past them alongside his pony. The pony went safely past. . . ." (Cond. 5) "In returning from Castle-Douglas the same afternoon about six o'clock, the pursuer drove his pony safely through the gate from the public road into the said loaning, up which it proceeded for about eighty yards, until it came to the said gate between the said fallow and corn fields, when owing to a turn in the said loaning near the said gate, the manure bags came first into full view. Just when the pony reached said gate and when it would be within ten yards or thereby of the said manure heap, without any warning, it turned sharply round with its head towards the dyke with which the loaning is there fenced on the south side of the said fallow field, with the result that the inside shaft of the conveyance broke, and the whole weight of the pursuer and his niece being thrown upon the other shaft it also broke causing them to fall upon the road. Since the pursuer had previously passed the said manure bags, a tarpaulin or other covering had been thrown over them, the loose portions of which were waving or flapping with the wind. . . ."

The pursuer then averred that he had been seriously injured by the accident, and averred further;—(Cond. 7) "The accident to the pursuer was due to his said pony taking fright, and swerving or shying through the fault of the defender in placing such an unsightly and offensive obstacle as the said bags of manure so near the said (at that part unfenced) loaning, and where he had no right to place them. They created a nuisance to the said loaning, and rendered it unsafe for driving horses along it. So placing them there was not only in the circumstances negligent of the defender, but was also in breach of his said contract of lease with the pursuer, by virtue of which the defender had no right to use that part of the field where the bags were placed, during the occupation of the pursuer thereunder. The defender placed the manure bags in said field without any consent from the pursuer to his doing so, and at his own risk. He was well aware that they would be a source of danger to horses passing up and down the said loaning, as the defender had previously placed some tiles, near to the part where he afterwards placed the manure bags, to which the pursuer had objected, and warned him that said tiles might be a source of such danger. The accident to the pursuer was the natural result of the defender placing said manure bags where he did. Further, the insufficient and negligent manner in which the said tarpaulin or other covering was secured by the defender, also materially contributed to the accident. . . ."

Gibson v.
Stewart.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault of the defender, is entitled to reparation as craved, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the petition. (2) The pursuer having approached with said pony what had to be regarded by him as a known danger, and the accident having resulted therefrom, the action should be dismissed. (6) The deposit of said manure bags being an ordinary act in farming operations, no liability attaches to the defender in connection therewith. (7) The place where said manure bags were put being ground neither cultivated nor beneficially used, but mere waste land belonging to the defender, he was entitled to put same there in the exercise of his legal rights without incurring any liability for so doing. (8) Contributory negligence.

On 28th October 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) repelled the defender's first plea in law and allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division for jury trial, and at the hearing proposed the issues quoted below.*

Argued for the respondent;—The pursuer had not averred anything to shew that the defender's action in putting the manure bags where he did was anything but an ordinary act of husbandry on his part, and the action ought, therefore, to be dismissed as irrelevant. The land was coming out of lease at the date of the accident, and an incoming tenant, in such circumstances, was entitled to enter upon the land and put manure on it ready for spreading. Further, there was no plea on record to the effect that in entering on this piece of ground the defender was trespassing. The English cases cited by the pursuer were all cases of the wrongous use of a highway, which this road was not. It was the ordinary farm road. The pursuer had passed the heap in the morning and knew it was dangerous; he should, therefore, have led the horse when returning.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender had at the time of the accident no right to enter upon the land on which the manure heap was placed. The land was in the pursuer's sole possession, and the defender in entering on it was simply a trespasser. He had no right as incoming tenant to enter upon a field still in the occupation of the pursuer. Further, he was in fault in putting the heap where he did, as it was likely, particularly

Jan. 30, 1894.
Gibson v.
Stewart.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer alleges that as he was driving along a farm road his horse took fright at a pile of bags of manure covered with tarpaulin which had been placed by the defender on a field adjacent to the road, that he was thrown out and seriously hurt. The main part of the argument which we heard for the pursuer was on the footing that the defender, who is proprietor of the ground on which the heap was placed, was in fault in having put near a road something which might and did frighten a horse, and the argument proceeded exactly as if the defender were the lawful occupant of the field and the road a public road. In this view the case against the defender was that, having regard to the contiguity of the road, the defender was in fault in putting down a heap of manure so near that a passing horse might take fright at it.

In my opinion the case so laid is irrelevant, none of the decisions support it, and any bearing which the statute law has on the question is adverse to the pursuer. The proximity of even a highway does not lay an embargo on the cultivation of the adjoining fields, and the deposit of a heap of manure is an ordinary incident of agriculture. Many of the sights and sounds of modern agriculture may startle a horse, but people who go along country roads must lay their account with such risks. The pursuer made nothing in argument of the circumstance that there was a tarpaulin over the manure which flapped in the wind, and, if this were a ground of liability, no housewife would be safe to put her clothes out to dry on her own washing-green within sight of a road. It is obvious that country life would be impossible if the most ordinary and everyday act could not be done without the risk of an action of damages on the ground that somebody's horse had been thereby startled.

The English cases cited are divisible into two classes—first, those in which there has been an illegal encroachment on the highway itself, and second, those in which some more unusual operation, such as digging a pit in a field, caused an unusual danger. Neither class has any application to the matter in hand. So far as statute law is concerned, the fact that in some statutes some limitations are placed on the free use of adjoining lands suggests that the common law does not recognise such restrictions.

Accordingly, I am against allowing the issue originally proposed, which stands second of the amended issues proposed at the close of the debate.

There is, however, another view of the pursuer's case, very obscurely indicated on record, which requires more consideration. It is said that the defender had no right to use or come upon the ground in question at all for agricultural purposes, inasmuch as the pursuer was still tenant of the farm; that the defender's putting the manure heap where he did was an encroachment on the rights of the pursuer, and an act of trespass; and that the result of this trespass was the accident to the pursuer. It is obvious that the case thus presented is in a totally different chapter of law to that which I have just discussed. The case which I have discussed was that of lawful occupiers of ground adjacent to a road, and the case advanced against them was that they had violated the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. The case now presented makes trespass the gravamen against the defender—the form of trespass being the deposit of manure on ground which he had no right to use for such a purpose—road or no road. Now, I consider this case relevant; and, although it is very badly stated, and the pleas as applied to it quite unscientific, I think that the pursuer is entitled to an issue. The issue now proposed by the pursuer is not appropriate, and does not present the question which I have stated. The primary question for the jury, with the aid of the Judge, will be whether the defender committed a trespass by putting his manure where he did, apart altogether from the nearness of the road, and solely with regard to the rights of the pursuer under his lease. The next question arises only if this one be affirmed, and it is whether the shying of the horse was caused by the manure heap being placed where it was.

The issue which I propose is as follows:—"Whether on or shortly before the 12th day of May 1893 the defender wrongfully placed a quantity of bags of manure, furnished with a tarpaulin covering, on ground then in the occupation of the pursuer under lease between him and the defender of the farm of Airds in the parish of Crossmichael; and whether on or about the said day the pursuer was injured in his person through his horse taking fright at the said bags or tarpaulin, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

THE COURT settled the above issue as the issue for the trial of the cause.

Lease—Mines and minerals—Construction—Right to occupy houses.—The proprietor of a mineral field, and of the surface of certain detached pieces of ground on which were built workmen's houses, stores, &c., let the minerals for a period of thirty-one years with the usual rights to work the same, and with right also to the tenant "to use and occupy," during the currency of the lease, the houses, &c., the tenant paying and so relieving the landlord of all feu-duties and taxes payable in respect of the houses, and also undertaking to keep in repair and insure the same; "for which causes and on the other part," the tenant bound himself to pay a fixed rent, or, in the option of the landlord, specified lordships.

Some years afterwards the landlord died. Under his testamentary arrangements, the mineral field was left to his sister, but the detached houses remained part of his general testamentary estate.

In a competition between the sister and the testamentary trustees of the deceased, the latter averred that the value of the detached houses was at least £275 per annum, after deducting the sums necessary to pay the feu-duties, &c., and claimed that they were entitled to payment of that sum annually out of the fixed rent or the lordships.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the whole of the fixed rent or lordships was payable in respect of the right to work the minerals, the occupation of the houses being a separate right, the consideration for which was the payment of the feu-duties, &c.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By lease, dated in 1873, between William Smith Dixon, of Govanhill, ironmaster in Glasgow, as first party, and the firm of William Dixon, Limited, as second party, the first party, "in consideration of the rents, lordships, and others after mentioned," let to the second party "All and Whole the whole coal, ironstone, fireclay, and other metals and minerals still remaining in those parts of the lands of Carfin, belonging to the first party, in the county of Lanark, for thirty-one years," as from 1st September 1872, with powers to work and carry away the same,—“With right also to the said second party during the currency of this lease to use and occupy the stores, manager's house, and dwellings for workmen, and other houses and gardens attached thereto, situated at Carfin, the second party paying and so relieving the first party and his foresaids of all feu-duties payable to their superiors in respect of those held by them from other parties in feu, and also paying to the first party and his foresaids a ground rent for those built on land belonging to them forming part of Carfin estate, at the same rate as the rent payable by the second to the first party for land under the separate lease of Carfin farm and others, and paying and relieving the first party and his foresaids of all public and parochial burdens and taxes of every kind in respect of the said houses and others, whether exigible from landlord or tenant, and also insuring the stores and managers' houses against fire, and also maintaining the said houses in a proper state of repair during the currency of this lease: . . . For which causes, and on the other part, the second party bind and oblige themselves to content and pay to the first party, and his heirs, executors, and assignees, the yearly rent or lordships after specified, and that half-yearly on the last days of February and August . . . videlicet—the sum of £800 sterling yearly of fixed rent, or, in the option of the first party or his foresaids, the royalties or lordships following, videlicet . . . And further, the second party bind and oblige themselves to satisfy and pay to the first party's tenants in the surface of the lands the minerals in which are hereby let, for such portions of the said lands as are now occupied, or which may be hereafter occupied, by the second party, excepting only the houses and others hereinbefore mentioned, and that at such rates as may be arranged between the second party and such tenants, and failing arrangement, as may be fixed by two arbiters mutually chosen, or by an oversman to be appointed by such arbiters, and that in addition to the fixed rent or lordships hereinbefore mentioned.”

Besides the lands of Carfin, the minerals of which were let under the foregoing lease, Mr Dixon was proprietor of several adjoining feus, but not of the minerals therein, which were reserved by the superior or the seller. Most of the houses referred to in the lease were situated on these detached feus, three only being on the lands of Carfin.

Mr Dixon died on 16th June 1880. Under his testamentary arrangements, the lands of Carfin, with the whole minerals therein, but subject to the lease, were conveyed to his half sister Mrs Church and through her to her marriage-contract trustees. On the other hand, the detached feus, with the houses thereon, remained the property of Mr Dixon's trustees.

Down to 31st August 1890 the whole lordships falling due under the lease were paid to Mrs Church's marriage-contract trustees, Mr Dixon's testamentary trustees having made no claim to any portion of them.

Thereafter, Mr Dixon's trustees intimated to the mineral lessees, William Dixon, Limited, that they were entitled to share in the lordships to the extent of the annual value of the houses on the detached feus belonging to them and occupied by William Dixon, Limited.

In consequence William Dixon, Limited, did not pay the lordships for the two years ending 31st August 1892 to Mrs Church's trustees, and on 16th January 1893, they as pursuers and real raisers brought a multipointing for determination of the respective rights of Mrs Church's trustees and Mr Dixon's trustees in the lordships for these years, being in all £3198, 10s. 5d.

Dixon's
Trustees v.
Church's
Trustees.

Mr Dixon's trustees averred that the gross annual value of the detached feus and houses thereon was £562, and that the nett annual value, after deducting the feu-duties, rates, and taxes payable by the tenants under the lease, was £275, and claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in payment pro tanto of arrears at the rate of £275 per annum since Mr Dixon's death, or alternatively to be ranked to the extent of £550, being the alleged nett annual value of the houses for the two years ending August 1892.

Mrs Church's trustees maintained that all the items composing the fund in medio were payable in respect of the subjects of which they were in right, and that no part of the fund was payable in respect of or attributable to the occupation of the houses, &c. in question, on the ground that the clause in the lease which conferred on the mineral tenants the right to such occupation expressed in gremio the full agreed-on consideration therefor. Mrs Church's trustees therefore claimed the whole fund in medio.

On 17th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the claim for Dixon's trustees and sustained that for Church's trustees, and ranked and preferred the latter accordingly.*

Dixon's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—Where subjects belonging to one person were occupied by another the presumption was that the occupier held the subjects as tenant in consideration of the payment of a rent

* "OPINION.— . . . The question appears to me to depend upon this, whether, upon the just construction of the lease, the miners' houses in question are let simply as part of the mineral subject, or, on the other hand, are let as a separate subject, and for a separate consideration.

"I am of opinion that the latter is the correct view. The right to occupy the houses (along with other houses as to which no question arises) is certainly let by a separate and distinct clause in the lease; and that clause undoubtedly specifies certain definite payments or prestations which are the conditions of such right of occupation. In particular, the tenants are taken bound to pay for the houses on the estate of Carfin proper certain ground rents which are to be calculated in a certain manner, and for the houses in question, which are built upon feus, the feu-duties payable to the superiors. They are also bound to relieve the lessor in both cases of all public and parochial burdens effeiring to the houses which are thus let to them; and all this is stipulated apart from and in addition to the proper mineral rents or lordships which are imposed upon the tenants by the clauses in the lease which follow.

"It is true that the obligation to pay the mineral rents or lordships begins in the usual way with the words 'for which causes and on the other part,' and the trustees found upon that expression as implying that the mineral rent or lordship is payable, inter alia, for the right to occupy the houses. But it rather appears to me that this is giving too much weight to the mere collocation of the clauses; especially seeing that, as matters stood at the time, the question which has now arisen was not foreseen, and was of no importance. And, on the whole, I prefer the construction which assumes that, according to the scheme of the lease, the houses were let as one subject on certain terms, and the mineral field as a separate subject on certain other terms. I am the more disposed to adopt this view that it appears to have the support of two judgments pronounced in the Valuation Court by Lords Fraser and Lee in 11 R. 844 and 12 R. 639."

adequate to the value of the subjects.¹ Here, however, the contention on the other side was that Dixon's trustees held these houses not as tenants but merely in virtue of a right to use and occupy, which was incidental to the lease of the minerals, or, at least, that if they were tenants of the houses, the only consideration for such tenancy was the obligation to relieve from feu-duties, &c. Such a construction ought not to prevail if another was possible, where, as the reclaimers averred and offered to prove, the consideration was wholly inadequate to the value of the houses. That another construction was possible was clear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, who did not say that the reclaimers' construction was absurd, merely that he preferred the other. "For which causes" prima facie included the possession of the houses as well as the right to work the minerals. There might be some apparent difficulty in apportioning the fixed rent or royalties, but if the Court were satisfied that the reclaimers were entitled to the fair annual value of their houses, it ought not to be difficult to determine what that value was. The decisions by the Lands Valuation Judges, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, were not binding here, nor were they res judicata between the present parties, who were not parties there.

Argued for Mrs Church's trustees;—The Lord Ordinary had taken the sound view. In construing the lease it must be kept in view that the granter was proprietor both of the minerals and of the houses, and probably did not contemplate the possibility of the two passing to separate owners. The real subjects let were the minerals, and they were the only consideration for which the rent or royalties were paid; the right to use and occupy the houses was a mere incidental right, the consideration for which was the obligation to relieve the granter of feu-duties, &c. The tenants were under no obligation to occupy the houses, and if they did not do so, could it be suggested that they were entitled to an abatement out of the fixed rent or the royalties equal to the value of the houses, less the taxes, &c.? Further, the rent of the houses, if any money rent was due, must bear a certain proportion to the aggregate money rent paid, and thus if, as had in fact happened, royalties, not fixed rent, were paid, the rent of the houses would vary with the amount of royalties paid; but it was absurd to suppose that the value of the houses should rise with the increase in the output of the coal.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The material facts seem to be these: In 1873 Mr W. Smith Dixon, who was then proprietor of the lands of Carfin, and also of certain lands adjoining, granted to the pursuers (the real raisers) a lease of the minerals of Carfin "with right to use and occupy the stores, manager's house, and dwellings for workmen, and other houses and gardens attached thereto, situated at Carfin." These stores, houses, &c., were most, not all of them, situated not on the lands of Carfin, but on the adjoining lands, of which, as I have said, Dixon was also proprietor. Three of them, of the annual value of £78, were on Carfin. The words "situated at Carfin" were reasonably descriptive of all of them. Mr Smith Dixon died in 1880, and under his testamentary settlements his testamentary trustees (who are the first claimants) became, and are now, proprietors of the lands adjoining Carfin on which the houses, with the exception of the three I have noticed, are situated, while his sister Mrs Church became proprietor of the lands of Carfin in which the minerals exist, and subsequently conveyed them to her marriage trustees, who are the second claimants.

The fund in medio consists of the rent for the years 1891 and 1892 under the lease of 1873 (which still subsists) and amounts to £3198, 10s. 5d., being the aggregate of the lordships payable for these two years.

Dixon's
Trustees v.
Trustees.

From Mr Smith Dixon's death in 1880 down to 1891 the whole rents were paid to Mrs Church's trustees, his testamentary trustees having made no claim to them. They have, however, come to think that they have a right, which it is their duty to assert, to a fair rent for the houses standing on the ground of which they are the proprietors, and their consequent claim has led to this multipoleinding. The tenants (the raisers) have no interest in the matter—no claim being made against them beyond the fund in medio which they are ready to pay to the party having right.

No question of amount can be decided on the case as it stands. The only question argued was the general question whether the testamentary trustees have any right to rent under the lease as being proprietors of the houses, &c., referred to, which they admittedly are, and have been since 1880.

The testamentary trustees aver that the annual value of the houses, their property, of which the tenants are in possession under the lease, is £562, and we must assume that they may prove this if allowed an opportunity. Assuming the truth of the averment, it would certainly prima facie be unjust to deny the owners a corresponding return from those who have the whole use and occupation of them. Mrs Church's trustees, however, maintain that this prima facie view is overcome by the terms of the lease, subject to which the testamentary trustees became owners. They contend that by this lease the tenants had right "to use and occupy" these houses for this rent and return only, viz., that they should pay and so relieve the proprietor of all feu-duties payable in respect of those houses held in feu, and paying a ground rent for those built on ground belonging to the proprietor "forming part of Carfin estate" at a certain farm rate—the same as the tenants paid for a farm on the Carfin estate under another lease—and paying and so relieving the landlord of all taxes and keeping the houses in repair. Ground rent at a farm rate applies only to the three houses on the land part of the estate of Carfin, and with these we have here no concern. The view therefore is that the tenants were by the lease to have the houses in question for the return of relieving the owner of feu-duty, taxes, and cost of keeping in repair, and that none of the rent payable under the lease, i.e., none of the fixed rent, or lordship in excess of it, was payable for the right to use and occupy them, that right being accorded altogether irrespective of such rent. The Lord Ordinary accepts this view, and in support of it refers to two judgments of Lord Lee and Lord Fraser in the Valuation Court upon the import of this very lease in a question between the lessees and the Assessor.

I shall have something to say regarding these judgments before I conclude, but in the meantime I observe—1st, that the only parties to the lease who were before the Valuation Court were the lessees; 2d, that they admitted that the actual value of the buildings now in question, as they then (in 1885) stood as lettable subjects, was over £600; 3d, that they admitted, and indeed contended, that the rent (whether fixed or lordship) specified in the lease was applicable, or at least was intended to be so, to the buildings as well as to the minerals, both being alike subjects let by the lease, and that the view that the landlord had given them property worth over £600 only because they undertook to relieve him of the landlord's burdens upon it, was on the mere statement of

No. 87. it extravagant. I take the figures as stated in the Valuation Court—value of the property £602; landlord's burdens £129.

Jan. 30, 1894.
Dixon's
Trustees v.
Trustees.

The parties now before us in this competition are the two landlords—for there are two—viz., Mrs Church's marriage trustees, as owners of Carfin and its minerals, and Mr Smith Dixon's testamentary trustees, as owners of the buildings, &c., on the adjoining lands—both being equally let by the lease. When two subjects let by the owner of both under one lease to one tenant, pass on the landlord's death to two successors—one succeeding to the one, and the other to the other—there must necessarily be an adjustment of their respective rights under the lease, with a partition of the rent accordingly, and that this necessity occurs here is not disputed. Where the lease bears that each of the subjects is let as a distinct and separate subject, at a distinct and separate rent, there will of course be no difficulty in making the adjustment, and consequent partition, for in such case you have in effect two leases although in one deed. I think, and I must say, without doubt, that this cannot, at least de plano and without inquiry, be predicated of the lease before us. I say “without inquiry,” for it is conceivable that property may not be worth more for use and occupation than the feu-duty and the public burdens upon it, so that relief of these will be a fair equivalent for such use and occupation given by an ordinary business lease, without grace or favour. This, however, would not be “rent” in the ordinary or any reasonable sense of the word, and the landlord in such lease would no doubt return the rental of the subject let as nil. The record is not so precise and satisfactory as it might, and probably ought, to have been, and I have been unable to reconcile the valuations given with those which appear to have been given and accepted in the Valuation Court. But I understand that the testamentary trustees (the owners of the houses) undertake to shew to our satisfaction—1st, that the lease was for a fair rent of both subjects at their lettable value; and 2d, that the fair lettable value of the subject to which they succeeded was about £600. The matter in hand is a just and equitable adjustment of the rights of successors to distinct and separable portions of the subjects let by the lease, with a corresponding partition of the rent, and in dealing with it I think the facts I have stated must, if admitted or proved, be taken account of. Suppose them admitted, the injustice of giving the whole rent to the one party, and to the other only relief of feu-duty, taxes, and repairs is too obvious to require more than simple expression.

Now, is there any prima facie unlikelihood in the case which the testamentary trustees aver and (as I understand) undertake to prove? As regards the fair lettable value of their property their statement is confirmed by the valuation in 1885 of the statutory authority under the Valuation Act, and it is not suggested that there was any notable rise of value between 1873 and 1885, although it may possibly be proved that there was. Then as regards the notion that it was the intention of the lease to let the tenants have this property at a fraction of its value (really only for relieving the owner of the owner's burdens), I am disposed to assent to the view of it taken by the tenants under the lease, viz. (as Lord Fraser states it), “that no landlord would give to a tenant property worth £602, 9s. merely because the tenant undertook to relieve him of obligations to the amount of £129, 13s. 4d.” His Lordship does indeed observe upon this that he does “not appreciate the force of the argument,” adding as his reason, “the landlord was content upon receiving a certain lordship,” (viz., in consideration of that) “to let to his tenant upon easy terms all the houses, stores, and schools which have been separately valued"—i.e., to let to his tenant at £129 what is worth £600. But this simply means that the rent is a fair rent on the whole—the deficiency in the rent with respect to the one subject being made up by an exactly corresponding excess with respect to the other. To do this in terms and of purpose would be unmeaning if not foolish, the same end and result being rationally and without injustice attained by holding that the rent is one rent for both subjects, undistributed (or unapportioned), because both belonged to the lessor and were let to the same lessee.

Dixon's
Trustees v.
Trustees.

In the matter immediately before us, viz., a division or partition of the rent (or rents, if you please, although I think the singular more accurate—the relief from burdens not being in my opinion rent in any reasonable sense of the term) between the two successors, in several parts of the subjects, to the original owner of the whole, we have, I think, a satisfactory principle of justice and equity to guide us. There is no reason for regarding this lease otherwise than as an ordinary business contract for fair valuable consideration on both sides, the tenants giving as rent the fair lettable value of what they got. Nor is there any difficulty in ascertaining what was the fair lettable value of that part of the subjects which has descended to the testamentary trustees. It was indeed ascertained in 1885 to be about £600. The present owners say it is £562. But if the parties differ, the value can be ascertained, and I think the ascertainment should be as at 1873, the date of the lease, and that this (taking account of the tenant's obligation to relieve of burdens falling on the landlord) is as regards these subjects the value which the tenants get from the owner of them in return for the rent they pay. Nor, in my view, does this value ever fluctuate either up or down. The remainder of the value which the tenants take under the lease they take from the owners of Carfin and its minerals, and it may fluctuate, and has in fact always done so, the rent being arranged with reference to the quantity of minerals carried off, which was of course contemplated as a very possible varying quantity. The fixed rent of £800 is the least payable, and taking the testamentary trustees' estimate on record of the value of the property which the tenants have from them, viz., £275, the balance of £525 is what Mrs Church's trustees are on an apportionment or partition (perhaps the preferable word) entitled to receive as the value which the tenants have in their property, although it might consist of mere permission to mine if they pleased, and to exclude others. If they work mines to such extent as to acquire minerals yielding lordship beyond £800—the fluctuation in the value of what they have from Mrs Church's trustees begins to operate, but to the exclusive benefit of these trustees, the testamentary trustees asking no share of it.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the rent ought to be partitioned or divided between the owners of the subjects which produce it, and in respect of which it is paid, according to the value of the subjects contributed by each respectively, and this will, I think, be fairly and satisfactorily done by giving the testamentary trustees the fair lettable value of their property which the tenants have by the lease, without taking any account of the increase of rent beyond £800 in respect of the extended working and appropriation of the minerals. To the whole of this increase the owners of the minerals (Mrs Church's trustees) are in my opinion justly entitled. But I need not dwell on this topic, as the testamentary trustees claim no part of the increase, but put their claim exactly as

No. 87. they would, and at the amount they would, were there no increase and the fixed rent alone were payable.

Jan. 30, 1894.
Dixon's
Trustees v.
Trustees.

If, therefore, we shall sustain the view contended for by the testamentary trustees, there is no difficulty in making the partition of the rent accordingly, and the only question is whether that view ought to be sustained. It is simply this, that these trustees are entitled to so much of the rent as represents the fair lettable value at the date of the lease of the property which has passed to them, taking account of the tenant's obligation to keep it in repair and to relieve the proprietor of all taxes and burdens upon it falling on them as such. I think it is sound, and ought to be sustained for the reasons which I have stated at length. There really ought to be no dispute between such parties as are before us as to what that fair value is, but if there should be, there can be no serious difficulty in ascertaining it.

A suggestion was made in the course of the argument of a distinction between letting and giving right to use and occupy for a term, which I should have noticed sooner had I attached importance to it, which I confess I did not. I have, however, since writing all that I have already read, and communicating it to your Lordships in consultation, learnt that such distinction is favourably regarded by your Lordships, who dissent from the views which I have expressed, and it is, I think, therefore my duty to express distinctly my opinion upon it. The view, as I understand it, is this—that when a right to work minerals for a term is let to a tenant with right to the tenant to use and occupy specified buildings during the currency of the lease, the tenant paying and so relieving the landlord of all taxes and burdens thereon, and keeping them in repair, the buildings are not really let at all, but only a right of use is given, when the tenant finds it convenient to take it, as an accessory convenience to him in his mineral workings, and that he is bound to relieve the landlord of the burdens and keep the subjects in repair only during such periods as he may find it convenient and so choose to make use of them. I cannot assent to this view as applicable to this lease or to the buildings in question, which really form a village adjoining the mineral workings, and consist of dwelling-houses, shops, stores, and two schools. The word “let” is certainly unnecessary to the constitution of a lease of houses, which is, I think, very clearly effected by any words which give right to use and occupy for a term. The term here is thirty-one years from September 1892, and during the whole of it the tenant has the exclusive right of use and occupation, which the lessor can, during that term, neither take himself nor give to another. The proposition that the tenant's obligation to make the stipulated return (whatever that is) does not, as regards the term, correspond with the term of his right and the landlord's obligation to give that right, whatever use the tenant makes of it, or whether he makes none, is in my judgment untenable. If that were taken to be the meaning of the contract, it would follow that it was to the tenant's advantage, at least in his opinion, that he should, during the currency of the lease, have the control of the buildings to the exclusion of the landlord and all others, whether he found it convenient to use them or not; that the landlord gave him this advantage in consideration of no other return than relief of taxes, &c., corresponding to the periods (and there might be none) of use by the tenant, and that the fact of the landlord giving it to his own manifest detriment was not to be regarded as one of the “causes” for which the tenant on his part agreed to pay the stipulated rent. Suppose that the subject, the right to use and occupy which was by the lease given to the mineral tenant, the same language being used, had been—not buildings—but a farm (and farms are often let to mineral tenants) of the same lettable value, say £600 a-year, with the proviso that he should relieve the landlord of the burdens, no matter what or of what amount, but only a fraction (larger or smaller) of the lettable value, would it be a true view of the contract that the farm was not one of the subjects thereby let, and was not to be taken account of as referred to in the rent clause commencing with the very intelligible and familiar words—"For which causes and on the other part"? If so, it might indeed follow that if the minerals and the farm passed to different proprietors, the proprietor of the minerals would take the whole rent, the proprietor of the farm taking nothing in the view that the tenant had it rent free.

Trustees v.
Trustees.

If the learned Judges in the Valuation Court thus construed the lease now before us, I could not follow their opinion in adjudicating upon the interests of the parties now before us, which are of a different order and of much greater magnitude than those which had to be considered between the assessor and the tenants under the Valuation Act. It is noticeable that the view on which they proceeded—Lord Fraser at least, for I doubt whether Lord Lee concurred in it—was not presented by the terms of the case stated by the magistrates and adjusted by the parties, and does not appear to have been suggested in the argument. Lord Lee says (12 R. 641)—"But it is maintained that by the lease the stipulated rent of £800 and the stipulated lordship are not due for the minerals alone, but for the combined right of working the minerals and using the houses. The terms of the case support this view, but it is necessary to look at the lease itself in order to see if it is sound." I quote this only to shew that the case adjusted and settled by the parties supported the view of the true meaning and construction of the lease which I have taken. His Lordship proceeds to say—"On an examination of the lease I am of opinion that unless the fixed rent of £800 or alternative lordships are to be regarded as the consideration stipulated for the minerals, it is necessary to revalue the whole subjects. But this is not what is asked by the appellants." And again "it is not one of the facts of the case that the rent of £800 or alternative lordship is in excess of the annual value of the minerals alone." This seems to indicate that a revaluation of the whole subjects would or might have been ordered had the appellants asked for it, or that a statement in the case that £800 (or lordship at the rate named) was in excess of their lettable value would have received effect.

But the question before us is quite another question than this. The whole rent bargained for as such, "for which causes, &c.," may not in 1885 have been in excess of the annual value of the minerals alone, and yet it may have been so in 1873, at least in the estimation of both the parties contracting, who agreed to it as the fair rent and return for the houses and minerals together.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The case is attended with much difficulty, but I am disposed to follow the Lord Ordinary, and to concur in the decisions which have been already pronounced. The mineral field is, I think, the true subject of the lease. I regard the right to occupy the houses as a privilege which is given in order that the landlord may obtain the rent of the minerals for which he stipulates. The houses are not let as the other subjects are let. For the tenants are not bound to occupy them, and while nothing can be payable unless they occupy, the rent stipulated in the lease is not the less due to the landlord if they do not occupy. The conditions on which they may occupy are stated. They are bound to pay feu-duties and landlord's taxes, &c. I take this to be the consideration for their occupation, and I think that subject to these payments the landlord gave his tenants a right to occupy the houses rent free, as the condition of obtaining the mineral rent. I am aware that in form the rent is stipulated as the consideration for all that the landlord had conceded to his tenants. But we may disregard form in order to give effect to the true meaning of the parties, and I think that we do so when we hold that the rent was truly payable for the right to work the mineral field. It is to be observed that the rent in the option of the landlord might be a lordship on the output, and it is, in my opinion, the most natural construction of the lease to regard such a payment as a rent for the minerals alone.

At the date of the lease the point which we are considering could be of no practical importance. It was immaterial to the owner of the whole subjects from which of them the return was to be made. But this makes it all the more likely that he was regarding the return for the minerals alone, and making an arrangement by which that return should be as large as possible.

If the rent were held to be payable for the houses as well as for the minerals it must be apportioned. It would in that case be a cumulo rent, and there could be no other alternative. I see great difficulty in effecting an apportionment, especially as the landlord has been in use to exact a lordship greatly in excess of the fixed rent. The reclaimers were not able to furnish any satisfactory principle. I see no other than this, that the cumulo rent should be apportioned among the subjects comprehended within the lease in the ratio of their value. Apart from the difficulty of putting a value on the mineral estate, the application of this principle would lead to very anomalous results. The rent of the houses would be increased in proportion to the increase of the lordships on the minerals. The increase in the output cannot increase the value of the mineral subject. On the contrary it necessarily diminishes it. If the output is maintained, the necessary result would be that an increasing share of the lordship must be apportioned to the houses, and it may be a share altogether exceeding a reasonable rent.

It was said by the reclaimers that in order to fix the rent of the houses we must take the rent at which they are let by the tenants and deduct that rent from the fixed rent or lordship. But this is in no sense apportionment, and is, therefore, inadmissible. Nor can I hold that in making the necessary apportionment we are to take the fixed rent alone, for there is no fixed rent due if the lordships are exacted, and the lordships are payable for the same "causes" as the fixed rent.

These considerations may not be in themselves conclusive, but to my mind they support the construction which I have put on the lease.

LORD TRAYNER.—I quite appreciate the argument addressed to us in this case on behalf of the claimants Dixon's trustees, to the effect that the stipulated rent, whether fixed rent or royalty, is to be paid in return for or in consideration of the whole rights conferred on the tenants in that part of the lease which precedes the rent clause, and that therefore some part of the rent is due and paid in respect of the houses in question. The words "for which causes," &c., with which the rent clause commences, might bear the construction put upon it by Dixon's trustees without doing any violence to the language used. But a consideration of the whole clauses of the lease bearing upon the question now to be decided leads me to the same conclusion as that which the Lord Ordinary has reached. The real subject of the lease is the mineral let, and for it the rent is stipulated. That the stipulated rent is payable for the minerals and for the minerals only, appears to me to be a conclusion supported by the fact that that rent is to be estimated or ascertained by a royalty or lordship on the quantity of minerals worked by the tenant, a mode never adopted so far as I know for ascertaining or fixing the rent of houses. It is quite true that the lease stipulates for a fixed rent or royalty in the option of the landlord. But that in effect is just stipulating for lordship, with the proviso that the landlord shall never be required to accept less as lordship in any year than the sum denominated fixed rent. In addition to the right to work the minerals for which the royalty or lordship is to be paid, a right is conferred on the tenant to occupy certain houses, but the conditions upon which that right may be exercised are stipulated for separately from the conditions on which the minerals are to be worked. If the houses are occupied by the tenant, then he is to keep them in repair, and to pay the feu-duty and landlord's taxes effeiring thereto. These, however, seem to me to be the whole of the tenant's obligations in respect of his occupancy of the houses. If he does not exercise his right of occupying the houses he incurs no obligation to the landlord for repairs or otherwise. But his other obligations in respect of the minerals are not affected by his occupancy or non-occupancy of the houses. I think with the Lord Ordinary that the right to occupy the houses is a separate right from the right to work the minerals, and that the conditions on which the two rights or either of them may be exercised are separately stipulated. I agree further with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the argument for Dixon's trustees is based more upon the mere collocation of the clauses in the lease than upon the terms of the clauses themselves. If the clause conferring the right to occupy the houses in the precise terms in which it now stands had been inserted after the rent clause, there could have been no question.

Succession—Vesting—Substitution.—A testator by holograph settlement left the liferent of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his widow. He then disposed of the fee of his estates, and, inter alia, provided, "I leave to my nephew J. F. W. my estate of B, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of B are to revert back to my nephew J. H."

J. F. W. survived the testator, but predeceased the testator's widow unmarried, and was survived by J. H. J. F. W. left a general trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estates, heritable and moveable.

In a question between J. F. W.'s trustees and J. H., held (diss. Lord Young)

No. 88. that the fee of the lands of B vested in J. F. W. at the testator's death, subject to a simple substitution in favour of J. H., in the event of J. F. W. dying without leaving an heir-male of his body, which substitution had been evacuated by J. F. W.'s general disposition.

WALTER WHYTE, of Bankhead, died on 16th September 1880, leaving the following holograph writing, which was held to be testamentary—Hamilton v. Whyte, July 13, 1881, 8 R. 940, aff. June 15, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 53:

“ Bankhead 19 June

“ Notes of intended Settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead.

“first—I liferent my wife Mrs Margaret Pollok or Whyte, in my whole estate both Heritable & Moveable burdened with an Annuity of £300 Stg Three hundred pounds sterling a year to my Sister Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton Widow of the late James Hamilton Writer in Glasgow should my wife survive me—at the death of my Wife said Annuity to cease, In place thereof I leave to my said Sister Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton in liferent only and to my nephew John Hamilton Writer in Glasgow in fee my pro indiviso half of the lands of Kenmuir situated in the parish of Old Monkland & County of Lanark, likewise my pro indiviso half of the lands of Shettleston situated in the Barony parish of Glasgow & said County of Lanark—To my nephew James Hamilton I leave my lands of Cuthill & Newmill of Brieche &c. situated in the parish of Whitburn & County of Linlithgow subject to the liferent of his mother the said Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton I also leave to my nephew James Frances Watson presently residing at Ardmore House in the Parish of Caddross Dumbartonshire, my Estate of Bankhead situated in the parish of Rutherglen and County of Lanark, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said Nephew James Frances Watson dieing without leaving any lawful male heir of his body—Then & in that event my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew John Hamilton, my Moveable Estate at the death of my said wife is to be equally divided between,” &c.

Mrs Whyte, the testator's widow, died on 20th September 1892, predeceased by his nephew James Francis Watson, who died unmarried on 3d April 1883, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 14th September 1870, by which he conveyed to trustees, as trustees for the ends, uses, and purposes therein mentioned:—“ All and Sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of every kind and description, and wheresoever situate, at present belonging or that may belong to me at the time of my decease, including also all means and estate over which I have the power of testing and disposal, together with the writs and vouchers of the same, and all action, diligence, and execution competent to follow thereupon.”

On 1st March 1893 James Francis Watson's trustees raised an action against John Andrew Hamilton [designed John Hamilton in the settlement], of which the leading conclusion was for declarator that the lands of Bankhead “were vested in the said James Francis Watson in fee, absolutely and without restriction or limitation, except a life-rent in favour of the testator's widow, Mrs Margaret Pollok or Whyte, and were validly and effectually conveyed to and vested in the pursuers as trustees of the said James Francis Watson, by the general conveyance or disposition in their favour contained in his foresaid trust-disposition and settlement, dated and recorded as aforesaid, for the ends, uses, and purposes therein set forth: And it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the destination in favour of the defender contained in the foresaid settlement of the said Walter Whyte of his estate of Bankhead, including therein the whole of the subjects before described, in the event of the said James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful male heir of his body, was, and has been, evacuated by the conveyance or disposition in favour of the pursuers contained in the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement of the said James Francis Watson, and that the defender has no right or title to or interest in the said estate of Bankhead." There were also conclusions for reduction of two notarial instruments with reference to the lands of Bankhead, and of a decree of general service as heir of provision to James Francis Watson, expedite by the defender, but as it was admitted that if decree of declarator were granted, decree in terms of the reductive conclusions followed as a matter of course, the latter need not be further noticed.

Trustees v.
Hamilton.

The defender lodged preliminary defences, and a record was made up.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) By the terms of the late Mr Whyte's settlement the fee of the estate of Bankhead having vested in his nephew James Francis Watson, and having been conveyed by Mr Watson to the trustees in his trust-disposition and settlement, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (2) The destination of the estate of Bankhead in the said Walter Whyte's settlement in favour of the defender having been evacuated by the conveyance to his trustees in the trust-disposition and settlement of the said James Francis Watson, the pursuers are entitled to declarator to that effect as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (2) The defender is entitled to absolvitor in respect—(a) That, under the late Walter Whyte's settlement no right of fee in the subjects in question ever vested in the late James Francis Watson. (b) That, in view of the terms of the destination of the said subjects contained in the said settlement, the said James Francis Watson was barred from granting any gratuitous deed dealing with the said subjects to the prejudice of the defender. (c) That it was a valid condition and qualification of any right conferred on the late James Francis Watson by the said Walter Whyte's settlement that the subjects in question should revert to the defender in the event of the said James Francis Watson dying without leaving a male heir of his body. (d) That the trust-disposition and settlement of the said James Francis Watson was inept and ineffectual to affect the said subjects or to alter the destination thereof contained in the settlement of the late Walter Whyte. (e) That, on a sound construction of the late Walter Whyte's settlement, and in view of the events which have occurred, the fee of the said subjects is now vested in the defender.

On 1st July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions, and granted leave to reclaim.*

* "OPINION.—I confess that this case does not seem to me to be one of difficulty.

"In the first place, I think that it is clear that the fee of the estate of Bankhead vested in James Francis Watson. The testator gave his widow a liferent of the whole estate, and in regard to the estate of Bankhead the words of the settlement are,—'I also leave to my nephew James Francis Watson, presently residing at Ardmore House, in the parish of Cardross, Dumbartonshire, my estate of Bankhead.'

"Now, that is an absolute conveyance, subject only to the liferent of the testator's widow, and I do not see how it can be contended that the conveyance

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The fee of Bankhead had never vested in James Francis Watson, he having predeceased the liferentrix, and as he had died without leaving an heir-male of his body, the fee was now vested in the defender. Had this been a conveyance in trust, with directions to the trustees to hold Bankhead for behoof of the testator's widow in liferent, and on her death to convey the fee as in the deed, it could hardly have been disputed that, on the authority of the cases from *Young v. Robertson*¹ downwards, the vesting of the fee in the events which had happened was postponed ;² and although there was no conveyance in trust here, the same result ought to follow, in accordance with the testator's evident intention, which was to postpone the vesting of the fee until the death of his widow, with the view, it might be conjectured, of ensuring as far as possible that the fee should then pass to a relative of his own. "At the death of my wife" was to be read into each sub-is not to take effect, at all events to the effect of giving the fee to the donee a morte testatoris.

"But then it is said that there was a clause of return here, to take effect, in the event which happened, of James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, and that that clause of return cannot be evacuated by him, at all events by a voluntary conveyance, or by deed of settlement. I think that it has long been settled that although a clause of return to the granter or his heirs is good against a donee, a clause of return in favour of a stranger is not in any higher or better position than a simple substitution. I am of opinion that the clause of return here is, for the purpose of questions of this sort, a return in favour of a stranger. There is no averment upon record that John Andrew Hamilton was heir-at-law of the testator, and whether he was in fact so or not he is not called in that capacity, but simply as 'my nephew John Andrew Hamilton,' and it is not unimportant to notice that James Francis Watson, to whom the direct conveyance of Bankhead was made, is also a nephew of the testator. So here we have an absolute disposition of the estate to one nephew, and a clause of return in favour of another nephew.

"It seems to me that, upon the authorities which were cited at the bar, that is just a substitution, and a substitution which it was in the power of James Francis Watson surviving, as he did, the time when the gift came into operation, viz, the death of the testator, to evacuate if he chose to do so.

"The next question is, whether or not he has evacuated that substitution by the general deed of settlement which he left. Now, I think that it has been settled by the case of Thoms that a general disposition carries all the estate over which the granter had power of disposal, and the extraneous circumstances which, in the case of Glendonwyn—and I think one other case—were held to overcome that general view, simply shew, I think, that that is the general rule, because it was assumed in that case that a general disposition would carry everything over which the granter had power of disposal, unless there were circumstances to shew that he did not intend to do so.

"Now, here there are no such circumstances whatever. You have an estate conveyed to him which he might dispose of, and you have him disposing, in the most absolute terms, 'All and sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of every kind and description, and wheresoever situate, at present belonging or that may belong to me at the time of my decease.' I think that it is clear that that carried this estate, which, as I have said, vested in him, and which, although it was subject to substitution, he could dispose of, with the effect of evacuating that substitution. I therefore apprehend that decree must be pronounced in favour of the pursuers. . . ."

sequent bequest of the fee of the several portions of the testator's estate. No. 88.
 A writing like the present ought to receive a liberal construction so as to carry out the testator's intention, for it was a holograph writing; it was styled "notes of intended settlement," shewing that the testator contemplated the preparation of a formal deed; and it was in the form of a will, not a de presenti conveyance. Words of bequest were now effectual to carry heritage, as being equivalent to a disposition or conveyance.¹ That meant such a disposition as would carry out the testator's intention, and not necessarily an absolute disposition in favour of the person first called under the will.² It was said that the defender's contention could be sustained only on the assumption that the fee was in pende until the death of the liferentrix, or at least until the death of J. F. Watson without leaving an heir-male of his body. But the argument that a right of fee could not be in pende would not be sustained—except in the class of cases to which its application must now be regarded as settled by authority—where the result would be to defeat the testator's clear intention. It was not necessary, however, to hold that the fee here was in pende. The will was capable of the construction that the fee vested in J. F. Watson, subject to defeasance in the events which had occurred, or what was here in effect the same thing, subject to a clause of return which J. F. Watson could not evacuate by any gratuitous deed. Even if the fee had vested in J. F. Watson absolutely, there was admittedly a substitution in favour of the defender, and this substitution had not been evacuated by J. F. Watson's general settlement.³

Jan. 31, 1894.
 Watson's
 Trustees v.
 Hamilton.

Argued for the pursuers;—The gift of Bankhead was equivalent to a conveyance in fee to J. F. Watson, and that conveyance took effect on the death of the testator. If it did not take effect then, the fee was necessarily in pende until it took effect. The sound construction of the will was that there was a mere substitution in favour of the defender, and that substitution had been evacuated by J. F. Watson's settlement. It was now settled that a general disposition evacuated a prior special destination, not granted or taken by the granter of the general disposition, unless there was evidence extrinsic or within the will of a contrary intention.⁴ There was no such evidence here.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—Walter Whyte, who died in 1880, was at his death owner of the lands of Bankhead, and the question in the case is as to how he has settled the succession to these lands by his will dated 19th June 1873, it having been decided by this Court and the House of Lords that the will is valid and effectual to settle the succession according to its true construction and legal import. The question thus comes to be, what is the true construction and import of the will in this matter. That the succession to these lands in liferent is by the will settled on the testator's widow is clear and undisputed, and she accordingly enjoyed the liferent from his death in 1880 until her own death in 1892. The question therefore is, how is the succession to the fee settled?

Watson's
Trustees v.
Hamilton.

That it is primarily settled on the testator's nephew James Francis Watson is undoubted. Whether this primary settlement is absolute—or only contingent on James Francis Watson's survivance of the testator—or whether it is contingent on his survivance of the liferentrix, is the question in dispute. The words, the effect of which is in dispute between the parties, are these,—“But I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew John Hamilton.” The words “revert back” are obviously inaccurate and inappropriate, but I think they must nevertheless have effect as importing that in the event specified the lands shall go to John Hamilton, or that the succession thereto (the succession to the testator therein) shall devolve on John Hamilton. The event specified is—“my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body,” and no time or limit of time for its occurrence is expressed. But the parties were agreed, and I think rightly, that some intention, to be collected from the will, must be imputed to the testator on this subject. He necessarily contemplated Watson's survivance or predecease at some period or other capable of being specified, although not in terms specified by himself, and meant that if he survived that period the succession should devolve on him, and that if he predeceased it leaving an heir-male of his body, the succession should devolve on that heir; and, on the other hand, that if he predeceased that period without leaving such heir, the succession should devolve on John Hamilton. What is that period? The pursuers say the death of the testator. The defenders say the death of the liferentrix.

Now, in answering this question we must, I think, have regard to the fact that the instrument we have to construe is not a deed of conveyance, but a will expressive of a testator's intention. The distinction is material. In construing and determining rights under a deed of conveyance we are governed by established technical rules which we cannot generally—certainly not always—sacrifice to a well-founded conviction that they lead to results contrary to the maker's intention. In the case of a will intention always prevails. We may possibly mistake the intention, but we must give effect to what we are judicially convinced was the intention, and authorise and order to be done whatever is formally necessary to carry it out. Now, a more striking case of a will, a writing only expressive of intention, as distinguished from a deed of conveyance, than that which occurs here cannot easily be conceived. The maker's intention as to the settlement of his heritable as well as his personal property is expressed, and must have effect as to both according to intention, and I should think clearly, without allowing any conveyancing technicalities to prevail over the intention, as they might in a deed of conveyance of land. And in my endeavour to reach the intention I cannot distinguish between land and money, but must, I think, take the same language as meaning the same thing with respect to either.

The Lord Ordinary assumes that there is in this instrument an absolute conveyance of Bankhead to J. F. Watson, subject only to the liferent of the testator's widow, and if the assumption were sound I should not question the conclusion that the fee is therefore given a morte testatoris notwithstanding the subsequent provision for the event of the death of the disponee without an heir of his body.

But have we any such case to deal with? I think not. The testator expresses his will to the effect that his widow shall liferent everything, whether land or money, and that at her death there shall be distribution of every thing, both land and money. There could be no distribution before. In the distribution some of the objects of his bounty are to have land, and others money. His nephew J. F. Watson is to have land—the estate of Bankhead—and it is in the expression of the testator's will to this effect that he expresses his wish that it shall be understood that in the event of J. F. Watson dying without an heir-male of his body the estate of Bankhead shall go to John Hamilton. Now, it seems to me clear, as matter of intention, that what the testator meant was, that if neither Watson nor an heir-male of his body existed at the period of distribution Bankhead should go to Hamilton. This is certainly the meaning which, on the very same words, we should have imputed to the testator using them, had the subject been money; and in construing a will so as to reach the testator's intention no reason occurs to me why we should construe the same language differently according as the subject of it is land or money. Prior to the Act of 1868 the language of mere will without de presenti conveyance was inoperative, but this is no longer so, and the language of will is as operative with respect to land as with respect to money. Our system of public records necessitated provision for making up a recordable title. Such provision is accordingly made by declaring that when in a will words are used with reference to land, which, if used with reference to money or other moveable property, would give a right to the beneficiary to claim and receive the same, they shall be deemed equivalent to a general disposition of such land within the meaning of sec. 19 of the Act of 1868, so that a recordable title may be completed as provided in that clause. But the formal completion of the title being the sole purpose of this provision, and indeed the sole purpose of sec. 19 of the Act, it would, I think, be outside and foreign to that purpose to take any account of the provision in construing words of survivorship, or, which is the same thing, words providing for the event of predecease. The disposition to be implied from words of testamentary bequest or expression of will, must be a disposition in accord with the meaning and intent of the will. If the meaning and intent to be collected from the will now in question be that Watson should have absolute right to Bankhead a morte testatoris, and that it should thereafter be subject to his debts and deeds (of course saving the liferent), then the implied disposition will be a disposition to him, and a title may be completed accordingly. If, on the other hand, we shall be of opinion that the testator meant that Hamilton should have the lands in the event of Watson predeceasing the liferentrix without leaving an heir-male of his body, then the disposition to be implied for the purpose of completing a title must be a disposition to him.

It was suggested as a difficulty that a fee in land cannot be in pendente. I do not appreciate the difficulty, which I think imaginary. It would certainly have equally existed had the testator signified in the most explicit terms his will and intention to be that in the event of Watson surviving the liferentrix he should have Bankhead, or predeceasing her leaving an heir-male of his body, that such heir should have it, but that in case of his predeceasing the liferentrix without leaving such heir, that then Hamilton should have it. I could not countenance the notion that such a will would be inoperative or incapable of execution according to the only meaning which the words expressing it could bear, because of a difficulty in finding a place of rest and repose for the fee during the subsistence of the liferent.

I have already observed that I think the construction of the survivorship clause (or clause providing for the event of predecease) would have been clear had the subject of the gift been moveable property or mixed property, both heritable and moveable, and need not refer to the authorities, of which the case of Young v. Robertson, 4 Macq. 314, is now perhaps the chief. That was a case relating to both heritable and moveable estate, and there being a trust, there was of course a disposition which did not, however, and could not affect the construction of the survivorship clause. Suppose the testator here had left to his nephew Watson the lands of Bankhead, and also the sum of £10,000, with exactly the same expression of his will in the event of Watson dying without leaving an heir-male of his body, is it doubtful that the event would, on the authority of Young v. Robertson, have been referred to the death of the liferentrix, or would it have been referred to the death of the testator as to the land, and to that of the liferentrix as to the money?

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

By force of the Act of 1868 the will is equivalent to a general conveyance in favour of James Francis Watson. If it were not it would not affect the heritage of the testator. It is only operative because it is a conveyance or equal to a conveyance. Further, I think that it came into operation from the testator's death. There is no other time assigned. The creation of a liferent and annuities did not postpone the disposition of the fee. These are burdens merely, either on the land or on the fiar. Accordingly, under the will, James Francis Watson, on the death of the testator, could have made up a feudal title to the lands by expediting a notarial instrument under the Titles to Lands Act. That he did not do so is of no importance, for the will as a general conveyance vested in him a personal fee.

It is said that the clause which declares that on failure of heirs of the body of James Francis Watson "the said lands of Bankhead are to revert back" to John Hamilton, has the effect of suspending the conveyance till the death of the liferenter. I cannot see that it has. The words of the clause seem to imply an immediate fee. For unless such a fee were taken the lands could not "revert" to Hamilton, and Watson seems to be the only person from whom they could so revert. But I am not disposed to put my judgment on any such narrow ground. I think that the clause is a substitution of Hamilton on the failure of Watson and the heirs of his body. It can be nothing else if we hold that the conveyance took effect on the death of the testator.

If there had been a trust, and if the trustees had been directed to convey on the death of the liferenter, the case would have been different. For in that case it would probably be held that the trustees were bound to convey to a beneficiary who survived the period at which they were directed to convey, and that no interest could vest in anyone who died before that date. But we are here dealing with a direct conveyance, which, unless there be some limitation to the contrary, must come into operation at the testator's death, and as on this view it necessarily created a fee in Watson, the clause in favour of Hamilton can only be a substitution.

I am further of opinion that the substitution was evacuated by the general settlement of James Francis Watson. I need not say more on this head.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF KILTEARN, Defenders (Respondents).

Jan. 31, 1894.
M'Vicar v.
School Board
of Kiltearn.

School—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62)—Emoluments of teacher appointed prior to Act—Government grant.—The schoolmaster of a parish, appointed prior to 1872, raised an action against a school board for payment to him of the whole Government grant for the year 1892-93, in which he averred that "in terms of his appointment and according to the usage of the parish" his emoluments included "... (3) the whole of the ordinary Government grant earned by and payable to" the school; that the school board had acknowledged and acted upon the terms of his appointment; and that he had received payment of the whole grant down to 1892. He also founded upon a "special agreement" contained, as he alleged, in certain minutes of the school board dated in 1888 and 1890, which set forth that, as the schoolmaster received "all the annual grant earned by the school, it was not incumbent upon them to appoint salaried" teachers, but that they were willing "to sanction the appointment of such 'at his own expense,'" and that they sanctioned certain appointments accordingly. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer had no right to the Government grant in virtue of his office as an "old" teacher, and had stated no relevant case of a specific contract with the school board giving him a right thereto.

DONALD M'VICAR, schoolmaster of the parish of Kiltearn, raised an action against the School Board of that parish for payment of £157, 2s., being the amount of the ordinary Government grant for the year from February 1892 to February 1893.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

The pursuer set forth that he had been appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Kiltearn by the heritors in January 1871, and that since the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, he had continued to act as teacher under the School Board.

He averred,—(Cond. 2) "The emoluments of the pursuer, in terms of his appointment, and according to the usage of the parish, include, besides house and garden—(1) a fixed salary, which, as at his appointment, was at the rate of £35, but was, by minute of the School Board, of date 3d June 1873, increased to £50, in respect of the reduction then made in the rate of school fees; (2) the whole school fees; and (3) the whole of the ordinary Government grant earned by and payable to said school. In 1889 the school fees were abolished, and the compensation payable to the pursuer in lieu thereof has not yet been adjusted by the School Board. The pursuer was, since his appointment in 1871 down to 1892, duly paid the said fixed salary and the whole of said ordinary grant. Down to 1889 he also received the whole school fees. The School Board have all along and down to 1892 acknowledged and acted upon the terms of the pursuer's appointment and the usage in the parish, as above set forth; and, by minutes of date 20th August and 11th December 1888 and 25th February 1890, it was specially agreed by the School Board with the pursuer that, in respect of the said terms on which the pursuer held office, he should himself provide and pay the necessary monitors and pupil-teachers, and he has done so accordingly in the case of two pupil-teachers.*

The defenders stated that they "disputed the pursuer's claim to be entitled in every year during which he is schoolmaster to the whole Government grant, whatever it may be, as part of the emoluments in which he is secured." They averred that he had not been prejudiced in his emoluments by the defenders, but was in receipt of a sum exceeding what he got in 1872.† They explained that they had paid to him out of the Government grant a sum which greatly exceeded the amount of grant which he had received at the passing of the Act in 1872.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having right to the whole ordinary Government grant earned by the school in virtue of his appointment, as condescended on, the defenders are bound to pay the amount thereof. (3) In any event, in respect of the agreements condescended on between the School Board and the pursuer relative to the appointment of the pupil-teachers of said school, the pursuer is entitled to decree, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) The defenders not having undertaken to pay to the pursuer the whole Government grant, and, separatim, not being bound so to do, the action cannot be maintained.

On 16th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) repelled the third plea in law for the pursuer "in so far as stated as a separate ground of action," and before further answer allowed a proof. ‡

* "Excerpt from minute of meeting held 20th August 1888.—The clerk produced a letter dated 18th May 1888 from Mr M'Vicar, teacher, making application for two temporary monitors owing to the increase in the average attendance of the school. The board having gone into the matter considered that, as Mr M'Vicar receives all the annual grant earned by the school, it is not incumbent upon them to appoint salaried temporary monitors, but they are willing to sanction the appointment of such at Mr M'Vicar's own expense." The minutes of 11th December 1888 and 25th February 1890 approved the appointment by Mr M'Vicar of two pupil-teachers at salaries "payable by him."

† The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 55, provides,—That teachers in office before the passing of the Act "shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained. . . ."

‡ "OPINION.—As originally framed, the summons was brought to try the general question whether the pursuer, who is an 'old schoolmaster,' is entitled to receive the whole of the Government grant. The sum sued for, £157, 2s., was the amount of the Government grant earned between 28th February 1892 and 28th February 1893. The summons does not contain any declaratory conclusions. But, as I have said, the pursuer's original pleas raised the general question.

"On adjustment, however, the following plea was added—'3. In any event, in respect of the agreements condescended on between the School Board and the pursuer relative to the appointment of the pupil-teachers of said school, the pursuer is entitled to decree, as concluded for.' This plea, if well founded, would be sufficient for the decision of the case, although it would not settle the general question. I am of opinion, however, that the arrangement made by the board with the pursuer as to the appointment and remuneration of the two pupil-teachers is too narrow a foundation on which to build a claim for the whole of the Government grant during the currency of those appointments. The board relieved the pursuer of his obligation to pay the pupil-teachers before the commencement of the period during which the Government grant sued for

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in repelling the pursuer's third plea in law. The agreement condescended on, and set out in the minutes referred to, was not ultra vires of the School Board, who were entitled to contract with a schoolmaster with regard to the Government grant.¹ Even if the minutes did not themselves embody a contract they were clear evidence of an antecedent contract to give the pursuer the whole grant. The actings of the School Board had been up to 1892 in accordance with that understanding, and the pursuer was therefore entitled to a proof to establish the agreement.

M'Vicar v.
School Board
of Kiltearn.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The action was irrelevant, and the Lord Ordinary should have sustained the plea to that effect. It was necessary first to consider the pursuer's right as an "old" teacher, and next his allegation of the defenders' obligations to him. Now, the pursuer had no right to the whole Government grant in virtue of his office as an "old" teacher, and he had made no relevant averment of a contract giving him such a right with either the heritors or the School Board. That clearly distinguished this case from those cited by the pursuer, for these actions were founded upon contract. The Government grant was by the Act of 1872 payable to the board and not to the teacher, and the only right given by that Act to the teacher was that he should not be prejudiced in his emoluments by any new arrangements made by the board after 1872.² It had not been suggested that the pursuer had been so prejudiced. (2) The minutes produced shewed no contract at all that the pursuer was to get the Government grant. They only shewed that while he had it all, the board would direct him to pay assistant teachers, for whom he asked, out of it. That was part of the administration of the fund.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that we are in a position to dispose of this action finally now, and I am of opinion that the pursuer's case fails on both the grounds which are stated. I agree with the defenders that the proper order in which to consider the pursuer's case, even for the purpose of estimating the alternative case which he presents in the third plea, is to ascertain first of all what are the original rights which he asserts himself to have possessed. Now, this much is plain, that he has not set out on record any new contract, or any innovation upon his rights during the period of the administration of the School Board, beginning with its formation in 1872 down to the events of 1888 and 1890. He says that in terms of his appointment, and according to the usage of the parish, his emoluments included salary, fees, and the "whole of the ordinary Government grant earned by and payable to said school." Now, these last words seem to contain a fallacy. They certainly cannot represent—he was earned; and I do not think they are now barred from disputing the pursuer's claim to the whole of the grant. What happened was simply this. The pursuer asked the board to appoint additional teachers. They said, 'We are willing to do so, but, as you are at present drawing the whole of the Government grant, you must pay them.' I do not think that this amounts to a contract between the board and the pursuer, that so long as the appointments of the pupil-teachers continued, he should continue to draw the whole of the Government grant, even if he ceased to pay the salaries. I think that, on the School Board undertaking themselves to pay the pupil-teachers, the question as to the pursuer's right to the Government grant became as open as it was before."

does not profess to represent—that these are the words of his appointment. I think we must read this as an averment that when he was appointed in 1871 he was entitled to the salary, fees, and the existing Government grant, which, as we know, was voted by Parliament to the schoolmaster of a particular parish. School Boards then came into existence, and from that time onwards down to the period in dispute the course of events, no doubt, was that the board suffered him to receive a grant which was payable in terms of the orders of Parliament, not to him but to them. They allowed a system of administration to go on, about which it is not necessary to say more than that it is not in exact conformity with the relative rights and duties of the School Board and schoolmaster. The schoolmaster was allowed during that period to act as if he was the head of an enterprise school, accountable to them only for the successful administration of the school, which nominally, as they treated it, but really in point of law, was under their control. But the important point, as it seems to me, is the negative one that from the time when the heritors appointed the pursuer down to the period in dispute, the School Board did not enter into any contract with him at all. The only act alleged in this record to have been done by them is the increase of his salary, which has no bearing on the question.

Well then what was the pursuer's position say in 1888? He had no contract with the School Board, but had certain statutory rights secured to him by the Statute of 1872, and these may be stated shortly as the right to receive an equivalent in money of the total emoluments he held at his original appointment. Now certain letters and minutes are referred to, which go no farther than to prove that that state of matters existed de facto. This gentleman was receiving the whole of the grant, and the School Board naturally looked to him to bear the burdens effeiring to the person whoever he might be who received the grant. But I cannot discover in these papers anything beyond the recognition of that fact, and cannot discover any act done by the School Board by which that system, which I think was not normal and was scarcely legal, was stereotyped and imposed on them as matter of contract. Then, when we come to the period of 1888, it is important to observe what the pursuer's case on record is. He founds on certain specific minutes which primarily and directly relate to an increase of the staff of the school; and it is only indirectly that they bear on his own rights. Now, if he had said that there was an antecedent contract of which this transaction furnished evidence I could have understood his case, but he says this transaction about the pupil-teachers was itself a contract relating to the future appropriation of this grant. I cannot assent to this view. The situation may be illustrated in this way. Suppose a new school board had come into office the moment after this minute was passed, I think it is quite clear it would have been within their powers, and probably part of their duty, to say,—“We are the recipients,—the statutory recipients,—of this parliamentary grant; it has not been assigned away; it is questionable whether it could be; but we shall from henceforth ourselves receive the grant, make the pupil-teachers take their proper place under us, and we shall be their paymasters, relegating the master to his rights.” Supposing that had been done at the critical period of April 1892, the schoolmaster might have had a grievance which might be represented thus. He would say,—“From February down till now I have been acting on the assumption that the money was to come into my hands.” Well, I think the answer of the Lord Advocate is conclusive, that assuming such a grievance to exist, the remedy for it is not a claim for payment of the grant, but a claim for compensation, and the only measure of compensation allowed is the difference between what he actually got and the quantum of his emoluments in 1872. Therefore I think the case on the second branch is unsound in fact and in law, and it appears to me that we are in a position to dispose of this case without proof. The parties table the minutes which form the alleged contract which we are asked to enforce, and there are not averments that would extend or develop the scope of inquiry beyond these documents. I therefore think that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismiss the action.

M'Vicar v.
School Board
of Kiltarn.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. By the interlocutor under review the Lord Ordinary does two things,—he “repels the third plea in law for the pursuer, in so far as stated as a separate ground of action, and before farther answer, allows the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the defenders a conjunct probation.” The pursuer objects to the first finding of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and the defenders object to the second finding, so that neither party is agreed on this judgment. I agree with your Lordship that the first question is, whether or no there is anything to go to proof, and I also agree that there is nothing to go to proof. The averments which are supposed to require proof apart from the special agreement founded on in 1888 are these,—“The emoluments of the pursuer in terms of his appointment, and according to the usage of the parish, include, besides house and garden, (1) a fixed salary,” and so on. What is there to go to proof there? There is no averment of agreement or contract at the date of his appointment,—nothing said of such an agreement; and if you look at the pleas in law to elucidate the averments on record, the first plea in law is this,—“The pursuer having right to the whole ordinary Government grant earned by the school in virtue of his appointment, as condescended on.” What does that mean? It means—“In virtue of my appointment, in virtue of my being public schoolmaster, in virtue of my being appointed before 1872, I have certain rights,” and one of these rights, he says, is a right to the ordinary Government grant. Well, as the Lord Advocate said, we would require to know what followed upon the appointment of public schoolmasters before 1872, and we know, as your Lordship has said, that before 1872 these school grants were voted directly to the teachers by Parliament, and that in 1872 this was changed and this grant appropriated by the School Board for School Board purposes. Now, why, or in what manner, in virtue of his appointment as schoolmaster, did this pursuer acquire right, as he says he acquired it, to the ordinary Government grant? I think he had no such right. If that be so, as I think it was, when we come to consider the second part of the case—the alleged special agreement contained in the minutes of 20th August and 11th December 1888 and 25th February 1890,—do we find any agreement here, in which the School Board agreed that during the currency of this appointment, or in all future time, he, the schoolmaster, should have what he never had before, the right to all the ordinary Government grant? I do not think any contract could be spelt out of these minutes and documents. It humbly appears to me that the view of the Lord Advocate is the right view as to the minute of 20th August on which he founds. The whole matter comes to this: the schoolmaster being de facto by a voluntary allowance in possession of the whole of the school grant, it is right and proper that if you want assistants you must pay for them. I can spell nothing else out of the minutes

No. 89. and letters than that; and if that is the state of matters, I agree with your Lordship that our course is to dismiss the action.

Jan. 31, 1894.
M'Vicar v.
School Board
of Kiltearn.

LORD M'LAREN.—It appears to me that the foundation of the arguments and of any view which can be taken in this case must be the 55th section of the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872. That section provides that a schoolmaster appointed prior to the passing of the Act shall not in respect of emoluments as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by him at the passing of the Act be prejudiced by any of the provisions of the Act. Now, when an Act of Parliament dealing with pecuniary rights states that a person having a vested right shall not be prejudiced by a new arrangement, that would seem to me prima facie to mean that his emoluments shall not be cut down, that he shall be entitled to the same sum in money of which he was in receipt before the passing of the Act, neither more nor less. That is the view which was taken of the construction of the statute by the other Division of the Court in the case of Grant v. Urquhart and Glenmoriston School Board (13 R. 783), a view with which I entirely agree, and it is confirmed by this other consideration, that as regards the school grant—the Government grant for schools,—the right of the schoolmaster prior to the passing of the Act in 1872 was a right quite different from anything that he can have in the grants voted by Parliament subsequent to that time. Prior to 1872 the grant was a grant in aid of the schoolmaster or teacher payable directly to himself upon a certificate of his exertions in teaching, but the grant now is a grant to the school board to be applied in their discretion and according to the purposes of the Act. One result of this change is that a schoolmaster appointed prior to 1872 can no longer receive as in his own right the grant of which he was previously in the enjoyment. His right is to receive out of the school funds an equivalent of the emoluments of office—a sum equal to what he was receiving previously out of the Government grant, together with all the other elements that make up the emoluments of his office. That being so, I should have thought, apart from decisions, that it would not be a fair administration of school funds that a school board should enter into an agreement with a schoolmaster to pay him the whole Government grant during his life. I shall not readily presume a contract of that kind, because I must say I do not think it would be a fair administration of the money voted by Parliament, that a school board should part with the control of its public fund, and instead of being free to apply it in the appointment and payment of additional teachers when necessary, should be bound down to pay the whole of it to one man for the rest of his life. But that is the hypothesis of the pursuer's action that the defenders undertake to pay him the whole of that public fund. I see no evidence of such a contract, and no relevant averments of such a contract capable of being a proper subject of an order for proof. The averment in condescendence 3 really amounts to no more than this, that since the passing of the Act of 1872 the pursuer has been in receipt of the Government grant by voluntary concession on the part of the School Board. That may have been in their judgment the best thing they could do with the money, but the past payment by no means binds them to continue the arrangement if circumstances have altered, and if they now find it desirable to make a rearrangement of the burdens affecting the school fund.

When we come to the alleged special agreement I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the letters founded on do not amount to an agreement to pay the schoolmaster the Government grant even for the limited period of four years. No. 89.

 It appears to me that these letters are wanting in the elements of contract between the schoolmaster and the board, and it is consistent with the terms of the letters and the evident intention of parties that the letters meant nothing more than this, that so long as the schoolmaster was in receipt of the Government grant (being the fund out of which pupil-teachers ought to be paid), he undertook to make payment of their salaries. That was the motive of the letters, that was the matter out of which the correspondence originates, and there is nothing in the correspondence tending to shew that the negotiations ever passed into a new phase involving a contract with the schoolmaster, giving him a right to the continuance of the sum he had previously been receiving. Matters seem to have proceeded on the old footing,—that is to say, the payment depended on the pleasure of the School Board, and could be terminated by the board without notice whenever they thought proper in the exercise of their trust to make a different disposal of their fund. I therefore agree that the action should be dismissed.

Jan. 31, 1894.
 M'Vicar v.
 of Kiltearn.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think with your Lordship that there is no relevant case on record of any specific contract either with the heritors before the passing of the 1872 Act or with the School Board afterwards which can give the pursuer a claim to the Government grant. The pursuer says that, in terms of his appointment, he was entitled to certain emoluments, the first of which is a fixed salary of £35 a-year. Now, that might of course mean that the heritors agreed to give him a salary which was fixed at that time. If there were any question about his claim for salary I do not suppose that anybody would dispute that; there is a clear and sufficient averment to that effect, although he does not condescend on the specific terms of the agreement which is implied in that statement. But then when he goes on to say that by the terms of his contract, and by usage, he was entitled to the ordinary Government grant in addition to this salary, I think it became incumbent on him to make a much more specific averment of the terms of the contract if he means to allege that it was by contract that he acquired a right of that kind. I do not myself see at present how it could be possible for the heritors to give him an absolute right to a future parliamentary grant, irrespective of the terms of the statute by which it should be conferred. But if it was part of his case that such right had been really vested in him in virtue of his agreement with them, I think it was incumbent on him to make a specific averment to that effect. It might very well happen that when a parish schoolmaster was appointed before the passing of the Act of 1872 the heritors might hold out to him the prospect that his emoluments would include the Government grant; but then the Government grant at the time was voted directly by Parliament to the schoolmaster himself, and as the heritors had no power whatever to procure or administer the grant, such an intimation could not mean anything more than this, that whatever grant Parliament might think fit to give him should be over and above the salary and fees which the heritors undertook he should receive. In short, the contract of the heritors must always have been for a remuneration within their power; and, on the other hand, the schoolmaster's claim to the Government grant depended on the will and pleasure of Parliament, exercised in his own favour personally and individually. Therefore I agree that there is no relevant averment that at the passing of the Act of 1872 this gentleman had an abso-

No. 89. lute right by contract with the heritors to continued payment of any Government grant.

Jan. 31, 1894.
M'Vicar v.
of Kiltearn.

Well, then, after the Act passed, there is no averment at all of any contract with the School Board by which it can be alleged that they gave him the grant prior to the averment with reference to the arrangement about the pupil-teachers in 1888. When the Act passed there can be no question that it became the right and duty of the School Board to administer the grant, which was no longer made to the schoolmaster himself but paid into the school funds, and the distribution of which is a duty with which they are charged, and therefore it was for them to determine whether the whole of the grant should be paid to the teacher, or, if not, what proportion should be paid to him. The only qualification upon that right which the Act creates in favour of the schoolmaster—I mean in favour of a schoolmaster holding office before the Act came into force—is that his emoluments prior to the Act should not be prejudiced, and therefore if the School Board chose to give him a smaller proportion of the Government Grant than he had been in use to receive previously, without increasing his emoluments in other respects, he would have a claim for compensation under the 55th section of the statute. But it is not alleged that any such claim arises to the pursuer in this action, because the amount of income he is now receiving exceeds his total income prior to the passing of the Act. Now, if there be no contract with the School Board prior to the minutes of 1888, I entirely agree with your Lordships that it is impossible to spell any contract out of these minutes. If the schoolmaster had up to that time an absolute right to the Government grant, then I should have had no difficulty in reading the minutes as meaning this, that he undertook to pay a certain proportion of the grant to which he was entitled to the pupil-teachers, and that the School Board had bargained with him that, in respect of that agreement, they would appoint pupil-teachers as his assistants, and otherwise they would not. But then that agreement depends entirely on his being able to establish that he had that antecedent right, with which the board could not interfere unless he chose, and therefore that he was in a position to make stipulations in regard thereto. As he had no such prior right, the minutes with reference to prior local regulations between these parties, it appears to me, come to nothing more than this, that the School Board assented to his proposal that the pupil-teachers should be appointed, and that inasmuch as he was in receipt of the parliamentary school grant, he must undertake to pay the pupil-teachers out of this sum so received.

I therefore agree with your Lordships that there is no relevant averment to be sent to proof, and that the action should be dismissed.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

Reparation—Burgh—Road—Regulation of traffic.—In order to ease the traffic passing up a steep street in Glasgow, there was laid down a stone track which led up on the right hand side of the street for a considerable distance, and then passed diagonally across it. At one point the track was only 18 inches from the pavement, between which and it there was a rough gutter

6 inches below the kerbstone of the pavement, and sloping gently upward to the track, which was about a foot above the gutter. The rule of the road was, according to these arrangements, reversed for traffic going up and down the street. A child of five years old while playing at the point referred to tripped in the gutter, and falling on to the track was run over by a cart and killed. The track had been for a long time in the same condition without accident. In an action of damages by the child's father against the Police Commissioners founded upon the position of the track and condition of the gutter, held that no fault was attributable to the defenders.

 Glasgow
 Police Commissioners.

ON 1st June 1891 a child named Annie Scott, five years old, while playing in Forth Street, Port-Dundas, Glasgow, was run over by a cart and killed.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

Adam Scott, her father, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Police Commissioners of Glasgow for damages for her death.

He averred that the "accident was caused by the defenders (1) owing to the defective and dangerous formation of said roadway, which caused said child to fall thereon; (2) owing to their having constructed or retained on the wrong side of said street and close to the pavement, so as to endanger the lives of passengers, a track on which they thereby specially invited and instructed vehicles to proceed."

The defenders denied that the accident was caused by their fault.

At a proof the following facts were established:—Forth Street was a steep street with a considerable curve, leading from Port-Dundas Road up to the wharves at Port-Dundas canal. Prior to its being taken over by the Police Commissioners, the then existing road trustees, about forty years before the accident, in order to ease the traffic up the hill, placed a stone cart-track or tram-track on the street. This track began on the south or right-hand side of the street, and after keeping to the outside of the curve on that side sloped diagonally across the street and up the remainder of the hill. At the place where the accident occurred it was about 18 inches from the pavement, between which and it there was a gutter. The foot-pavement was very narrow. The gutter was 6 inches wide and 6 inches below the kerbstone of the pavement, and the cart-track was about a foot above it. The street was causewayed on the track for a short distance, and beyond that it was macadamised for the use of the traffic downhill. According to these arrangements the ordinary rule of the road was reversed, the ascending traffic keeping to the right instead of to the left side of the street, while descending traffic kept the other side. During the day there was a stream of heavy traffic, and while the Police Commissioners when they acquired the street had not altered the existing arrangements, they stationed a policeman at the corner of Port-Dundas Road to regulate the traffic.

On 1st June a carter named Thomas Currie was proceeding up Forth Street along the cart-track towards the canal with two carts, each drawn by one horse, he being in the leading cart to which the second horse and cart were attached, and sitting on the left-hand side of the cart, i.e. at the side furthest from the pavement. After the first cart had passed, and when the second cart was opposite a passage a little below Adam Scott's house, his daughter, who had been playing on the pavement with an old tin, suddenly ran off the pavement after the tin. She saw the second cart, and tried to turn back, but her foot catching in the gutter she fell over on the cart-track and was run over and killed by the wheel of the cart. There was no record of any similar accident in the street.

On 2d August 1892, the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this

No. 90. interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident to the pursuer's daughter, Annie Scott, on 1st June 1891, in Forth Street, Port-Dundas, was due to the faulty formation of the road for which the defenders are responsible; therefore assolizies the defenders."

Scott v.
Glasgow
Police Commissioners.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—As to the position of the tramway, the evidence on both sides shewed that it was dangerously near the foot-path. Anyone who made a false step into the gutter at the place in question was exposed to immediate danger. The skilled evidence shewed that there was no need to have it at that side. But the appellant did not need to go nearly so far, for the evidence shewed that it would have entirely met the defenders' object if it had been a few feet further into the street, which was wide and gave ample room for that to be done. The foot-passenger who slipped would thus have had a chance of escape. But the case was not rested merely on the position of the tramway, but on the circumstance taken along with it, that the gutter was steep and rough, and interposed a sort of trap between the tramway and the pavement. It was not proved, indeed, that other accidents had occurred. But that was quite inconclusive. The case as to the defenders' duty was stronger than the recent case as to the Molendinar Burn.¹ There an accident might rarely happen, in time of flood; here it might happen any day.

Argued for the defenders;—No fault was attributable to them. The rule of the road had to be reversed in order to ease the heavy traffic up a steep hill, and a policeman was stationed specially to regulate the traffic. The street had existed for forty years in its present condition, no accident had previously occurred, and no complaint had ever been made.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a sad accident, but the question is whether it is attributable to the fault of anyone.

The traffic at the particular place where it happened was for very good reasons specially regulated, and I think that authorities having charge of a street are quite entitled to regulate the traffic along it without regard to the ordinary rule of the road, if they are of opinion that circumstances seem to render this desirable.

Here, owing to the steep gradient, it was thought better in the opinion of the burgh's engineers that there should be a stone tramway, and that it should start from the right side going up, and should gradually curve across the road, thereby to a certain extent easing the gradient, and they also had a constable detailed to be upon the spot to regulate the traffic. That was quite right. Further, I have no difficulty in holding that a vehicle is not in fault because it happens to be on a particular side of a roadway if there is no other traffic to make it a duty that it should be on one particular side for the purpose of passing or crossing another vehicle. Driving on a particular side is a matter entirely within the discretion of the driver, except where he has to pass or meet another vehicle. In that case, of course, he must conform to the rule of the road, either the general rule, or any special rule prescribed by authority. No fault is therefore attributable to the magistrates or other authorities because they specially arranged that this tramway should pass up the hill on the right instead of on the left side of the road.

² Dargie v. Magistrates of Forfar, March 10, 1855, 17 D. 730, per Lord Ivory, 737, 27 Scot. Jur. 311.

It is next said that it was dangerous to have the gutter six inches below the level of the pavement. We have familiar instances, however, of this, and in every town, where unless the depth was six inches the surface water could not be carried away. The drop may be dangerous to persons who are not careful, or to children under no supervision. But the danger is one which must be faced, and as has been often observed in this Court, in the case of children whose parents cannot afford to give them such supervision, the risk must be taken. It is wonderful how soon children in this position learn to appreciate the danger and how few accidents there are. I am of opinion, then, that there was no fault on the defenders' part in having this gutter as it was.

The only other danger suggested is that the tramway was set at a certain height above the gutter, which necessitated having a slope up to the tramway. It has been in this condition for forty years, and apparently no accident has happened. I do not think that this was a danger against which the magistrates were bound to provide.

On the whole matter, I think we must affirm the judgment appealed against.

LORD YOUNG.—In all towns some streets from their position are attended with more danger to the people using them than others. We are all quite familiar with the existence of such streets, and no instances are more familiar than streets formed on ground sloping upward or sloping to one side. Forth Street seems to be on ground of that kind. The question we have to decide is this—Are the public authorities at fault in allowing this street to be there, because it may be attended with danger to those using it for traffic or to children playing on it? To say so would be ridiculous. No actionable fault or wrong was committed either by private individuals or by the public authorities in allowing such streets to be constructed and used.

If there had been no tramway in Forth Street, as might easily have been the case, and this accident had happened by reason of a carter driving his horses in the same line as the tramway runs, it was not suggested that there would have been any case against the defenders. But because forty years ago it had been thought prudent to put a tramway in this street in order to ease the burden of horses going up the street, and because the Commissioners of Police had not altered the street since they took it over it was said that they were liable. I must say that appears to be a ridiculous proposition.

It was a question for consideration upon which side of the street that tramway might have most efficiently been constructed, and there might be conflicting views as to which was the best side for its position in order that it might ease the traffic, but it did not seem to be suggested that the magistrates had erred in the exercise of their judgment. There were a great many considerations besides the primary one of easing the horses as to the side on which the tramway should be placed. One side might have more houses and shops on it than the other. The middle of the street might seem to some as the best place for the tram lines, but I am not going to determine such a question. I am satisfied that there is no ground whatever for attributing the accident to the fault that the tramway was there.

On the whole matter, and without any doubt, I am satisfied with the findings in fact and law of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am satisfied that no blame has been proved against the defenders, and that therefore the defenders should be assoilzied.

No. 90. LORD TRAYNER.—That is my opinion also. I think that no fault at all has been proved against the defenders.

Gibson v.
Gibson.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion.—In an action at the instance of a wife for divorce on the ground of desertion, it was proved that the husband had treated his wife with cruelty, and when drunk had turned her out of his house, and that for more than four years thereafter the spouses had lived separate. Evidence on which the Court (by a majority of seven Judges, aff. judgment of Lord Wellwood, diss. Lord Trayner), refused to grant decree of divorce, on the ground that the spouses had been living separately of mutual consent.

Observed per Lord Rutherford Clark,—“I am aware that neither remonstrance nor entreaty is required as a solemnity in order to divorce for desertion. But the presence or absence of remonstrance and entreaty are very material in determining whether there was desertion, or whether the separation existed of mutual consent, especially when the spouse who complains of being deserted was the first to separate. In such a case, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the continued separation is to be referred to the cause which originally produced it, or, in other words, to the choice of the pursuer to live apart because of the cruelty of her husband.”

with three consulted Judges.
Ld. Wellwood.

In April 1892 Mrs Grace Gibson, New Cumnock, raised an action in the Court of Session, against George Gibson, her husband, concluding, inter alia, for divorce on the ground of desertion.

The pursuer and the defender, who was a grocer at Craigbank, New Cumnock, were married on 3d March 1880. One child was born of the marriage.

The pursuer averred that shortly after the marriage the defender became so much addicted to drink that he suffered from attacks of delirium tremens, during which he was violent and dangerous in his treatment of the pursuer. She averred a number of acts of cruelty towards her and her child during the years 1880, 1881, and 1882, and particularly she averred that (Cond. 5) “In or about the year 1882, the specific date being unknown to the pursuer, the defender took a knife to bed with him, and hid it under his pillow, for the avowed purpose of doing the pursuer some bodily harm. In or about the month of June 1882 defender put pursuer and her child out of doors, threatened to kill her if she returned, locked and secured the premises, and then proceeded to his father’s house at New Cumnock, and remained there for some time. Immediately before this occasion the defender announced to the pursuer his intention of commencing business as a butcher at New Cumnock. . . . The defender insisted that the pursuer would have to keep the butcher’s shop at New Cumnock. The pursuer, in consequence of weakness, induced by a long course of cruelty and abuse, was physically unable to do so, and said so to the defender, who thereupon got into one of his customary fits of passion. On or about the day before the defender removed to New Cumnock, he came into his house drunk, and objected to pursuer’s sister taking back to her own house a sideboard which belonged to her. He threatened to smash the sideboard and the pursuer, and became so outrageous and violent in his conduct that the pursuer had to seek refuge from his violence. Furthermore, on or about the day when the defender removed to New Cumnock, the pursuer returned to his house to get some clothing, and with the desire to go with him if he were calm, kind, and reasonable. The defender on seeing her became ungovernable in his passion, swore at her, and threw her into the same state of terror in which he had repeatedly and systematically placed her. She had to call for assistance, and upon hearing the voice of a neighbour the defender desisted from the attack upon her which he threatened. The pursuer escaped from the house, and again took refuge with her sisters. The same day the defender locked the house, and left Craigbank without leaving any message for the pursuer. The pursuer could not get admission to it when she returned. The furniture was removed, and the house of the parties was broken up by the defender. The defender thus deserted the pursuer, and has continued in malicious desertion of her ever since. The only communication he sent her thereafter was the following letter:—‘Ayton Bridgend, New Cumnock, May 23, 1883.—Grace,—If there is any of the furniture you want let me know by return, as I am leaving New Cumnock and going to dispose of everything. Let me know by Friday morning, and I will send them up to you. Hoping little Andrew is keeping well. GEO. GIBSON.’ The defender left the district without informing the pursuer of his address, or as to what he intended doing.”

Gibson v.
Gibson.

The defender denied the cruelties alleged and the fact of the desertion on his part.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having deserted pursuer, and having wilfully and maliciously continued in said desertion for four years, the pursuer is entitled to decree of divorce as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having deserted the defender, is not entitled to maintain this action. (3) The parties having in any event separated from each other by mutual consent, the action is not maintainable. (4) The defender not having been guilty of the wilful and malicious desertion libelled, is entitled to absolvitor.

Proof was allowed, from which it was, in the opinion of the Court, proved that during the years 1880 to 1882 the defender had treated the pursuer with such cruelty as to entitle her to leave him, and that on the day above referred to, June 1882, he had, when drunk, turned her out of doors, and had again acted in the same way when she returned to get her clothes on the following day. With regard to the conduct of parties after that day, it was proved that, after turning his wife out of doors, the defender removed all the furniture from his house to New Cumnock (which was two miles from Craigbank), where he had taken a house and shop. He did not, however, begin business there, but lived in New Cumnock, chiefly with his parents, during the year following June 1882. During that time the pursuer was living with her sister at Craigbank. On 23d May 1883 the defender wrote the letter to his wife quoted in the condescendence.

The pursuer wrote in reply,—“Craigbank, Thursday.—George,—In answer to yours of this morning, I will be very glad if you will send up the sideboard and drawers, also the small tin case, and any books you are not wanting for your own use. You might send my work-boxes and the rocking chair, and any of my clothes you see. I am glad to say Andrew is keeping strong and a good speaker, and believe me, George, I sincerely hope you will get on well wherever you go, and will always be pleased to hear of your wellbeing. I would have liked to have saved

No. 91. the crumb-cloth too, but you know best what you require. They will all be kept for little Andrew. Trusting you are well, I am, yours,
 Feb. 1, 1894. GRACE.”
 Gibson v. Gibson.

The pursuer denied that during the year following June 1882 she ever saw her husband at Craighbank or New Cumnock. The defender, on the other hand, deponed that he had frequently met her but had not spoken to her. In the end of May 1883 the defender left the neighbourhood, and his residence was unknown to his wife till 1891, shortly before the present action was raised. During all that time he never sent any money for the support of his wife and child, neither did he ever make any attempt to get his wife to return to him. The evidence with regard to the willingness of the pursuer to rejoin the defender is given below.*

* The pursuer deponed,—“The night before he went to New Cumnock he was drunk and violent, and ordered both me and my child out. I did not go at first, and he shoved me out. He did not give any reason, except that he was not satisfied with me; he often said he wished I would die and be out of the way altogether. When he had got me and the child out the night before he left, he locked the door and shut up the house. I went to my sister and asked if I would be allowed to stay for a little. I hoped defender would change his mind, and that I would get back. . . . On the morning after defender turned me out, I went round to the house and tried the door, and found it locked. I went back later in the forenoon, and the door was open. I went in. Defender was not there. I saw that he was determined to remove. Some of the things were away. I took a dress and some underclothing, and was going to take them to my sister's. On my way out I met defender coming in. He came forward in a threatening manner, and asked what the hell I was doing there. I shouted to Mr Ross, who was in the shop next door, and Mr Ross replied, but I do not recollect what he said. My husband got me by the shoulders and pushed me out at the door, and said if ever I came back he would kill me. I had gone out the previous night with just the clothes I had on, and I went back in the morning to get some things. After defender put me out I rapped at the door to try and get in again, but the door was locked. I was not back after that. . . . I never said that I would not return to him. I never heard that he was ‘willing and desirous’ that I should return to him until I saw it in the defences to this action.” In cross.—“Though my married life was very miserable, my affection for my husband did not disappear. I continued to like him just as much after the treatment I have described as I did before. When he put me out I always went back when he allowed me. He was sometimes very violent, even when sober. I was not aware that he was given to drink before I married him; I thought he was a perfectly sober man. I would have gone back to him after June 1882 if he had asked me, even though I was afraid. I should have been in danger of my life; but all the same, I would have risked it. . . . I was intending to go to New Cumnock with him. (Q.) What altered your mind? (A.) His treatment in putting me out the night before he began to take the furniture away. His conduct was getting worse, and my health was failing, but I would have accompanied him all the same if he had not put me out, and threatened that if I went back he would kill me. He never asked me to go back after that. He never looked near me. I never sent word to him that I would go back if he would amend his ways. I knew that he was living in New Cumnock a considerable time after he went there. I was informed he was not occupying the house he had taken, but living with his parents. I did not make any communication to him at that time. . . . The letter dated ‘Thursday’ was not written on the footing that I was to continue living apart from my husband. I was always in hopes that he would write for me to go to him. I asked him to send me part of the furniture, because he said he was going to sell off anything I did not wish, and I was anxious to save a few things from the sale. . . . The letter dated ‘Thursday’ is the first request I made for my things. I was afraid to go and ask for my things, because I understood defender was staying with his father, and his father had been outrageous to me on one occasion and threatened to thrash me, and I dared not go to the house. I did not send a message to ask for my things, because I did not think any attention would be paid to it. It was not owing to any aversion to having to do with my husband that I did not ask for my clothes. I was afraid both of him and his father, but I would have gone to him if he had asked me. . . . My relatives were angry at my husband for the way he treated me, but if he had treated me anything like the thing, they would have been kind to him. They wanted me not to go back in consequence of the way he had treated me, but I persisted and said I would go back if he would take me." Re-examined.—"The last thing my husband said to me was that if ever I came back he would kill me. He has never spoken to me from that day until now, and has never signified directly or indirectly that he wanted me back, or that he would treat me as a man should treat his wife. I would have incurred the risk of going back to him if he had asked me."

The defender in his evidence deponed that he wrote the letter of May 23d "to induce my wife to come back." * No. 91.

Mrs Hogg, a sister of the pursuer, deponed,—“I told her I was surprised at her being willing to go back considering his treatment of her. She said she would be quite willing to go back.”

Mrs Hyslop, another sister of the pursuer, deponed,—“She expressed herself willing to go back if she saw any sign that he really wanted her. I do not say she was willing to go back at the time she first came to me; I think it was later on that she spoke about her willingness to return.”

* In re-examination, however, he deponed,—“(Q.) Your view has all along been that it was your wife who left you, and not you who left her? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And taking up that view you did not make any overtures to her to go back? (A.) That is so. (Q.) You thought it was her place to ask to come back to you? (A.) Yes.”

† “OPINION.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to the remedy she seeks. I have arrived at this conclusion with some reluctance, because I think that during the cohabitation the defender treated the pursuer very badly, and further, I do not see any reasonable hope of the parties coming together again.

“The pursuer has brought a large body of witnesses to prove that the defender was a drunkard, that when he was drunk he was abusive and violent, that he treated the pursuer cruelly, threatened her frequently, and occasionally struck her, although of this there is not so much evidence. On the other hand, whether owing to the want of means or lapse of time, or because such evidence is not to be obtained, no one is brought to say a good word for defender except himself.

“I therefore hold it to be sufficiently established that prior to the separation of the spouses in 1882 the defender treated the pursuer with such cruelty as to entitle her to leave him, and to justify a judicial separation. But unless divorce on the ground of desertion is to be allowed in every case in which the injured party would be entitled to judicial separation, I do not think that the pursuer can get the decree she asks. It does not follow that because one party to a suit is not to be believed in regard to certain points of the case, the other party's evidence is to be accepted on all points. Now, in the present case, as I have said, I believe the pursuer's evidence in the main as to the defender's ill-usage of her, but there are certain points of her evidence material to the case which I cannot accept implicitly. I am not satisfied—I do not believe—that after she left her husband and refused to accompany him to New Cumnock, she had any real desire to join him again. It is practically admitted that she made no effort at reconciliation. She says that she would have been willing to go and live with him if he had asked her. I must say that I do not believe this, because the whole of her actings are inconsistent with it. I think the truth is that she was glad, possibly with reason, to be quit of him, and so were her relations with whom she lived; and probably nothing would have been heard of this case if the defender had not recently reappeared in the neighbourhood, his reappearance coinciding with right to certain money opening to the pursuer.

"If the facts of the case are examined, I think they shew that though they afford ample grounds for judicial separation they do not afford sufficient material for divorce. The defender's alleged desertion is thus described on record (condescendence 5). Speaking of the day on which the defender left Craigbank, the pursuer says,—'The same day the defender locked the house, and left Craigbank without leaving any message for the pursuer. The pursuer could not get admission to it when she returned. The furniture was removed, and the house of the parties was broken up by the defender. The defender thus deserted the pursuer, and has continued in malicious desertion of her ever since.' If that is the desertion on which the pursuer relies, it is certainly not substantiated. In June 1882 the defender did not desert the pursuer. He had previously carried on business at Craigbank, but at Whitsunday 1882 he, with the full consent of the pursuer, took a house or premises at New Cumnock, which is about two miles distant from Craigbank. There is no ground for saying that he deserted his wife in leaving Craigbank and going to New Cumnock. He had to go there because he had given up his premises at Craigbank. The fact is the pursuer refused to go with him,—I assume justifiably.

"During the following year the defender was living within two miles of the pursuer. She knew well where he was, and she must have seen him occasionally at Craigbank, but she made no effort whatever at reconciliation, and neither did he. And so things went on until May 1883, when a very important incident occurred. The defender finding that business was not prospering at New Cumnock, owing, as he says, to his wife not coming to assist him, resolved to go elsewhere, and accordingly he wrote the letter, No. 8 of process, to the pursuer,—'May 23d 1883' (quoted on p. 471).

"The defender says he wrote this letter to give his wife an opportunity of proposing to come to him. I do not believe that; I think the letter was written in order to get a bid for the furniture. At the same time the occasion was critical, and gave the pursuer an opportunity of shewing what her real wishes were. Instead of remonstrating with the defender for going away, or proposing to come to him, she replied as follows:—'Craigbank, Thursday' (quoted on p. 471).

"She afterwards wrote the letters, Nos. 12 and 13 of process, in regard to the sideboard. [These were mere notes as to sending the sideboard.]

"Thus the spouses parted, as it seems to me, by mutual consent, and the defender went off with the good wishes of the pursuer, however coldly expressed. He seems to have led a very wretched life, partly, no doubt, due to his bad habits, while the pursuer has, fortunately for her, been living with kind and attentive relatives. This has gone on for ten years, and I do not think it is proved either that the defender has intentionally kept out of the pursuer's way, or that she has made any serious attempt to find him with a view to reconciliation. He has neglected his duties as a husband and a father, but so far as I can see the pursuer's one feeling was relief at his absence.

"The question to be decided is whether these facts justify me in holding that the defender has deserted the pursuer. I think not. Not merely is the balance of authority against the pursuer's contention, but I do not think that any case has been quoted on her behalf which when examined will support her demand.

"The cases mainly relied on for the pursuer were Muir, 6 R. 1353; Winchcombe, 8 R. 726; Gow, 14 R. 443; and Gould, 15 R. 229. These cases have been very much discussed recently, especially in the case of Watson before the whole Court, 17 R. 736. I do not think that the judgment which I will pro-

by the Lord Ordinary as proved, that the defender's conduct to the pursuer prior to June 1882 was such as to entitle the pursuer to leave her husband's house, and to obtain judicial separation. That being so, the fact of his turning her out of his house in June of that year was the culminating point of his cruelty, and was the beginning of desertion on his part, because he then said that he would not take her back, and would kill her if she came back. The question then was, had he continued in that desertion for four years? He was in the wrong to begin with, and that fact shifted the onus of making overtures to return from the pursuer to him, and yet he had never said one word to shew that he had departed from his original desertion.¹ The question then came to be, whether a wife who had been deserted was bound, in order to enable her to obtain divorce, to humble herself by asking her husband to take her back as a condition precedent to bringing her action. There was no authority for saying that remonstrance and an offer to adhere was absolutely necessary. The Court would not insist on remonstrance if the circumstances were such as to shew that that course would be useless; indeed the case of *Watson*² decided that the fact of remonstrance having been made or not made was only a fact to be taken into consideration in deciding whether the deserted spouse had been willing to return to the nounce will really conflict with any of them. The ground of decision, especially in the cases of Winchcombe and Gow, was that it is not a bar to a wife obtaining divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion, that before the desertion began she had left him on account of his cruelty. For instance in Gow's case the pursuer, the wife, left her husband on account of his cruelty, and went to live with her father. The husband a few weeks later sold his furniture, left the place where he resided, and, up to the time of the wife instituting the action, had not communicated with or made his address known to his wife. Thus, as Lord McLaren said, he 'made it impossible that overtures of reconciliation should be addressed to him.'

"Winchcombe's case was not precisely the same. The husband treated his wife with cruelty deliberately for the purpose of obtaining a separation from her. He then broke up his home, went abroad, and disappeared. Therefore there was here actual desertion by the husband.

"It will be observed that in these cases there was actual and intentional desertion on the part of the husband, although, no doubt, preceded by the wife leaving him on account of his cruel treatment; and in these and the other cases the husband, when sued, was abroad at the time. I may refer to Lord Shand's observations on these cases in Barrie, 10 R. 208, 215.

"The great distinction between these cases and the present, and cases like Barrie and Watson, is that in the latter, the spouse, who is said to have deserted, has been accessible, living within the same town, or within easy reach without any effort being made on the part of the spouse, who complains of being deserted, to effect a reconciliation. In regard to this distinction, I may refer to the opinion of Lord Shand in Watson's case (17 R. 743, 744), in which I concurred at the time, and which I think expresses tersely and forcibly the conditions which are requisite as a foundation for an action of divorce on the ground of desertion.

"In the present case there is in addition what practically amounts to a deliberate agreement to live separate, which it seems to me places an insuperable impediment in the way of the pursuer founding upon the subsequent absence of the defender as constituting desertion.

"I have already stated my reasons for regretting that I am driven to this conclusion. It is satisfactory to know that the pursuer's money is settled on herself."

other. In Bowman's case,¹ the wife, unlike the present pursuer, was not willing to return to her husband, and said so in Court, and that was the ratio decidendi in the case. It did not decide anything with regard to the necessity of remonstrance. The case of *Chalmers*² was not one of divorce, and only shewed what sort of offer a wife who had justifiably left her husband's house was bound to take notice of. She certainly was not bound to go back unless her personal safety was assured, and it was not in this case. The case of *Winchcombe*³ was the nearest to the present, and ruled it. In that case, though the wife said that she was not willing to return, still divorce was granted. The case of Barrie,⁴ where the wife deserted and divorce was refused, was distinguishable in this, that there the spouses parted only because of incompatibility of temper, and that they lived close to each other, and on quite friendly terms, after the separation. The case of *Lilley*⁵ shewed that when the husband was in the wrong in the beginning it was his duty to try to induce his wife to return to him. The case of *Gow*⁶ was in favour of the pursuer, the only distinction being that the parties lived farther apart after they separated than the spouses had in this case. In none of these cases, which were those most in point, was it held that remonstrance and an offer to adhere was necessary to obtaining divorce. It was not necessary to shew that the pursuer wished to adhere; it was only necessary to shew that she was willing to do so if her husband would treat her properly. If the desertion did not begin in 1882 when the defender turned his wife out of doors, it at all events began in 1883, when he left New Cumnock without leaving an address.

Argued for the defender;—The case of Bowman was directly in point, and decided that divorce should not be granted in such a case as the present. Assuming that the pursuer was entitled to leave her husband in 1882, and to obtain decree of separation, that did not entitle her to divorce on the ground of desertion. The pursuer must prove that during the whole four years she wished to return to her husband, and the proof shewed that that had not been her position during any part of the time. When she left her husband's house she conveyed the impression that she did not wish to live with him any longer, and if she did she was bound to do something to remove that impression. Now, on the contrary, she had lived practically in the same village with him for a year, and had written at least one perfectly friendly letter to him, and yet she had never said a word as to coming back to him. That brought the case within the rule of Barrie.⁴ It was not enough for the pursuer to say that she was willing to go back conditionally, her offer must be unconditional, and such as to shew that she really wished to return. Although Watson's case decided that remonstrance was not absolutely essential where it would clearly be unavailing, it decided that it must be made wherever it was possible that it might be successful. There must, in short, be a disposition towards reunion shewed in some clear way, otherwise the deserted spouse would be barred from obtaining divorce. No such disposition had been shewn here. This case was distinguishable from Gow's case in this,

Gibson v.
Gibson.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to decree of divorce. The evidence satisfies me that the parties have been living apart with the consent of the pursuer, and that she has not been willing to adhere during the period which has elapsed since cohabitation ceased. It is not a case in which the pursuer had not opportunity for using means to endeavour to re-establish the family life. The defender and pursuer were living near one another for a long time after the separation; they were in communication by writing after they ceased to meet, and there has never been a suggestion on the part of the pursuer of a desire to resume cohabitation. On the contrary, it is her own case that she could not live with the defender, that he had been unkind and brutal to her, so that she was justified in separating herself from his society. This may be so, but if that was her position, and if it was in a state of mind which resulted from it that she tacitly consented to the breaking up of the conjugal home, as on the evidence I am satisfied she did, I can see no ground in that for holding that she is entitled to decree upon the plea that she has been wilfully and maliciously deserted by her husband. If she could not live with her husband because of his cruelty, and desired to be supported by him, her remedy was an action for separation and aliment. I cannot hold that where spouses live apart it is a sufficient cause for granting a decree of divorce for desertion that the ground on which the wife who is suing did nothing to re-establish the family life was that she could not live with the defender because of his cruelty. Wilful and malicious desertion can only be held proved at the instance of a spouse who was willing to cohabit. If there is unwillingness to cohabit because of the other spouse's cruelty, the law provides the remedy of separation and aliment, on the ground that the pursuer is justified in refusal to cohabit. It does not provide any remedy by divorce because of cruelty. If the separation is caused by cruelty, it is a separation which the injured spouse justifies by alleging a right to leave the other spouse's society. But such a separation is from the very nature of it a separation consented to by the injured spouse, and no duration of such a separation by itself can, in my opinion, be ground for a decree of divorce for desertion. In this case there is nothing else. I am therefore in favour of adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG.—I understand from what passed at consultation that all your Lordships are of opinion that no desertion has been proved to begin with, and if there was none, there could be no malicious persistence in desertion for four years. The Lord Justice-Clerk says he is of opinion—and the Lord Ordinary seems to be of the same opinion—that the spouses separated of consent. If that is the result of the evidence, there is no room for any question of law. From that opinion I am not prepared to dissent. If the desertion is not proved, and if there was no malicious persistence in the desertion, there is no room for legal opinion, and I express none.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In this case the pursuer separated herself from the society of the defender on account of his cruelty. She did so for good cause, and I am not surprised that she did not return. She had a very reasonable fear that his violence would be repeated. She has lived apart since 1882, and except for two letters which passed in 1883, there has been no communication between them. For most of the time the defender was resident in Glasgow, and it is certain that he contributed nothing to the maintenance of his wife or child.

The question is, whether the defender was in desertion, or whether the spouses were living separately of mutual consent? I answer it according to the latter alternative. I think that the pursuer was glad to be rid of her husband, and that in order to secure that end she was willing to take the burden of maintaining herself and her child.

The remarkable fact is that she made no effort to resume cohabitation. She says that she was willing to live with her husband provided that she saw any prospect of his amendment. I doubt whether any such idea was ever seriously entertained, and I cannot take her statement as proof of the fact. Her conduct is, to my mind, conclusive to the contrary. In a case like the present it is, I think, idle to speak of being willing to resume cohabitation when there was no effort to resume it. Nor is there, in my judgment, a surer proof that the pursuer released her husband from all his marital duties and desired to live alone than the fact that she never asked him to contribute to her support and to the support of his child. She tries to give another colour to her conduct by saying that she did not know her husband's address. There was no difficulty in obtaining it. She knew his mother, who was living in her neighbourhood, and could easily have procured the address of her son. It is not said that he was absconding.

I am aware that neither remonstrance nor entreaty is required as a solemnity in order to divorce for desertion. But the presence or absence of remonstrance and entreaty are very material in determining whether there was desertion, or whether the separation existed of mutual consent, especially when the spouse who complains of being deserted was the first to separate. In such a case, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the continued separation is to be referred to the cause which originally produced it, or, in other words, to the choice of the pursuer to live apart because of the cruelty of her husband.

It is said that the defender put the pursuer out of the house, and that this act was the beginning of his desertion. We cannot judge by the act alone irrespective of the intention. Cruelty and threats of cruelty which lead to a separation cannot be equivalent to desertion unless they are used for producing and maintaining a separation. No such case is before us. The defender may have turned his wife out of doors, but it was the act of a drunken man. It cannot be regarded as having been done in order that he might separate himself from the society of his wife. The pursuer says that in their last interview he threatened that if "I ever came back he would kill me." I cannot hold it to be proved that he made this statement. There is no evidence for it other than the evidence of the pursuer. Still less can I hold such language to be proof of a settled purpose on the part of the defender to separate himself from his wife. It seems to have been uttered in drunkenness, and when I consider that for many years the pursuer lived separately from her husband without complaint or effort after reconciliation, I should require very strong proof before I could hold that the separation was due to the defender's refusal to receive her. We have no such proof. She says,—“If he had promised to live a decent life

I would have gone back." This can only mean that she would not go back if she thought she was to be exposed to the same cruelty as before. She so acted, and with complete justification. But in that case is she deserted? I think not, because she was not willing to adhere. The condition which she attached to her return seems to be conclusive against her. It shews that she preferred to live apart from a fear of her husband's violence. She used the remedies which belong to a wife who is treated cruelly. She cannot at the same time claim the remedies which are given for desertion. No. 91.

Gibson v. Gibson.

I do not consider the case where the violence is used and the threats of violence are made for the purpose of producing and maintaining a separation, or that where the husband turns his wife out of the house and keeps it closed against her. It does not arise on the evidence, and I reserve my judgment on it. We are dealing with the case of a drunken husband who made his house intolerable to his wife. I do not think that his conduct had any purpose in it. It was the outcome of intemperate habits which destroyed his sense of duty and manhood. It may be hard that a woman must remain united to one who used her so ill. But cruelty is not desertion. A wife is bound to submit to such usage as she receives from her husband, or else to withdraw from his society. And if she chooses the latter alternative, she has, to my mind, shewn in the most emphatic manner that she is not willing to cohabit with him. She acts in the exercise of a legal right which may be declared by a decree of judicial separation. It is immaterial whether the decree be pronounced or not. Her right depends on the cruel treatment, and is only ascertained by the decree. So long as she acts in the exercise of that right she cannot be deserted, just as I think that no woman could be deserted if she were living apart from her husband under the authority of a decree of separation. In either case the separation is due to her own act, though justified by her husband's cruelty. I do not mean to say that a woman who has separated herself from her husband by reason of his cruelty may not thereafter be deserted. But it is, I think, a condition of the possibility of desertion that she abandons her position and is willing to resume cohabitation. So long as she maintains it, she is excluding her husband from her society.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—The parties in this case were married in March 1880, separated in June 1882, and have never lived together since. The question is, whether the pursuer has proved that this rupture of their conjugal relations was caused by the wilful and malicious desertion of her by the defender.

It appears from the evidence that the defender was a man of dissipated habits, that he sometimes came home at night the worse of drink; that when in that state he was apt to be quarrelsome and violent; and it is alleged that the pursuer had frequently on these occasions to leave the house at night and take refuge with her sisters, who lived a few doors off, or remained in a shed in the neighbourhood. It is not suggested that the defender conducted himself as he did with the intention of inducing or compelling the pursuer to separate from him. In fact she always returned, after a shorter or longer time, to her husband's house, and resumed cohabitation with him. Whether the defender's conduct would have justified the pursuer in separating herself permanently from him, we need not inquire. Separation a mensa et thoro is the remedy provided by the law of Scotland to an injured spouse in respect of conduct such as is alleged against the defender, and not divorce a vinculo matrimonii, such as is sought here. Whether it is a satisfactory or sufficient remedy it is not for us to say.

It further appears that the defender intended to leave Craigbank, where he had been residing, and had in April preceding, as the pursuer knew, taken a house and shop in the neighbouring village of New Cumnock for the purpose of carrying on business there—a step which the pursuer tells us she did not approve of. It was while the defender was about to leave Craigbank and to remove to New Cumnock that the incidents occurred which led to the separation.

The pursuer's account of the matter is this—(His Lordship quoted the pursuer's evidence as given at p. 472).

Now, it is right to point out that the pursuer gives an essentially different account of the matter on record. The account there given is—(His Lordship quoted the passage from the pursuer's condescendence, see p. 471).

Now, it will be observed that there is nothing said on record about the pursuer and her child being locked out of the house and taking refuge with her sister the night before the defender removed to New Cumnock, or about his threatening at the meeting next day to kill her if she went back, and which she swears altered her mind as to going to New Cumnock with him. The two accounts are quite inconsistent, but in my view it is immaterial to consider which of these two accounts, if either, is to be taken as correct, because neither, in my opinion, leads to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to divorce. I may, however, be permitted to remark that I am not disposed to place implicit reliance on the evidence of a party who makes such diverse statements in so material a part of her case.

It appears to me upon the evidence that there is no proof that the defender deserted the pursuer—that is, that he separated from her with the intent of putting an end to the conjugal cohabitation; on the contrary, I think that she deserted him. She may or may not have had good reason for doing so, but that is not the question.

It is no doubt true that the defender removed the furniture from Craigbank, and, as the pursuer phrases it, broke up the house there. But that is of no materiality in this case. The defender had, as the pursuer knew, taken a house and shop in the neighbouring village of New Cumnock for the purpose of carrying on business there, and to which he had removed. This was not done by the defender with the view of breaking up the matrimonial establishment and of withdrawing himself from the pursuer's society. He and his house were just as accessible to the pursuer there as if he had continued to reside at Craigbank. The pursuer had often, she tells us, returned to her husband in somewhat similar circumstances before, and it may be permissible to doubt whether her reason for not doing so on this occasion was not that she did not wish to remove from the immediate vicinity of her sister's house, and possibly from the protection which that afforded her.

It is true also that the defender did not open a shop in New Cumnock, and that he broke up his establishment there at the end of a year. He says that his reason for doing so was because he could not carry on a shop without the assistance of his wife, and that at the end of the year he had lost hope that she would rejoin him. I see no reason to doubt the truth of that statement. We have the correspondence which passed between them when he gave up his house in New Cumnock, and I think that the terms of that correspondence, and the fact that he voluntarily returned to her the furniture and other articles which she desired shew that he entertained no feeling of ill-will towards her. In my opinion, if she had ever proposed to return to him he would have been ready and willing to receive her.

Gibson v.
Gibson.

Assuming, however, that the pursuer is to be treated as the deserted party, I think the result is the same, whether she was willing or unwilling to return to him. If it be that she was unwilling to return to her husband, then she acquiesced in the separation, and cannot complain—Volenti non fit injuria. In that case the parties were living apart by mutual consent.

She professes, however, that she was all along willing to return to him "if he had asked her." I confess that if her statement as to his treatment of her while they lived together is to be taken as literally correct, I doubt, with the Lord Ordinary, whether it is true that she was willing to return to him. But be that as it may, the fact remains that she never approached her husband in any way with a view to putting an end to the state of separation. That being so, I think the case falls within the principle of the case of Watson, 17 R. 736. If she desired to resume cohabitation it was her duty to take the initiative, and to have communicated with her husband. There could have been no difficulty in her doing so, but that she never did.

If we are to believe the statements of the parties, both were willing to resume cohabitation, but neither would take the first step in that direction.

On the whole matter, I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion, for the reasons stated by Lord Rutherford Clark, and have nothing to add.

LORD TRAYNER.—I hold it proved in this case that the defender in the month of June 1882 turned his wife and child out of his house, locked the door, and left the house; that on the following day, finding his wife at the house, he again turned her out, and said that if she came back he would kill her; that he immediately thereafter removed the whole furniture from that house to a house in a neighbouring village two miles distant—New Cumnock; that he lived at New Cumnock for about a year, and thereafter left New Cumnock without communicating to the pursuer where he was going; and that from the time he turned the pursuer and her child out of doors in June 1882 he has never asked the pursuer to return to live with him, communicated with her in any way, or done anything towards the support and maintenance of the pursuer and her child. These facts being proved, I am of opinion that they amount in law to wilful and malicious desertion, which, having been persisted in for more than four years, entitles the pursuer to decree of divorce in respect of such desertion.

If the pursuer had agreed to live apart from her husband I need scarcely say that she would not have been entitled to the remedy of divorce, nor would she have been entitled to divorce if all she could allege and establish was ill-usage, however gross. For that state of matters the law provides a different remedy. But if desertion is established, as I think it is here, then the fact that the injured wife did not desire to return to her husband at any time or during the whole time of his desertion does not thereby deprive her of her right to a divorce. If he had bona fide invited her to his house, and offered to renew conjugal cohabitation at any time during the four years, then his desertion would have ceased. But if the desertion is maliciously persisted in by one spouse for the period of four years, in my opinion the state of mind of the other spouse during that period is immaterial, provided always that the conduct of that spouse does not establish that the living separate is agreed to. In short, in my view the injured spouse is not bound to do anything to bring the desertion to an end. In the present case (although in the view I have expressed it is not material to this decision) I hold it is proved that the pursuer was willing to return to her husband, the defender, if he had asked her.

I think, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer should have decree as concluded for.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark.

—A wine and spirit-merchant, who carried on business in a public-house, of which he was proprietor, died intestate on 7th December 1891. His widow entered into possession of the business, and on 16th February 1892 she succeeded in obtaining from the licensing magistrates, in competition with her husband's executor, a transfer of his certificate. The widow died on 23d February, and her executor then entered into possession of the business, stock, and fittings, and carried on the business till 16th May, when he sold the goodwill, stock in trade, &c., to a purchaser for £1500. The widow's executor had prior to this sale made and carried out an arrangement with the husband's heir-at-law, whereby the latter agreed to grant to the purchaser of the goodwill a new lease of the premises for seven years, in consideration of a sum of £250 paid by the widow's executor.

In an action of accounting raised by the husband's executor against the widow's executor, held by a Court of seven Judges (disc. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner) (1) that the defender was not bound to account for any profits made after the widow obtained a transfer of the certificate; and (2) that the defender was not bound to account for any part of the price received for the goodwill of the business sold by him.

Ld. Kyllachy.

JOHN HENDERSON PHILP died intestate and childless on 7th December 1891. He was survived by his widow and also by his mother, three brothers, and one sister.

He carried on business as a publican in a public-house of which he was proprietor, of the value of £45 a-year, and at his death there were in the premises fittings and stock in trade of the value of £102, 9s.

His brother Arthur Philp was his heir, and Thomas, another brother, was decerned his executor qua next of kin.

After his death his widow carried on the business (which had before her marriage belonged to her), using for that purpose the stock, shop-fittings, &c. On 16th February 1892 she applied to the magistrates for a transfer of the existing licence into her own name. She was opposed in this by her husband's executor, who made a competing claim to have the licence transferred to himself. The magistrates preferred her claim, and from that time the business was conducted under a licence in her own name.

She died on 23d February, and thereafter the business was carried on, No. 92. and the profits thereof retained till 16th May, the date of the expiry of the transferred licence, by Matthew Martin, her brother, whom she had by her settlement appointed her sole executor and universal legatee. At that date her executor sold the goodwill of the business, including the stock and fittings, to Thomas Logan for £1536, 6s. 2d. in terms of an agreement, dated 26th March 1892, by which the heir-at-law had agreed to grant Logan a lease of the premises for seven years at a rent of £45, in consideration of a sum of £250 to be paid to him by Martin on the signing of the lease.

Philp's Execu-
tor v. Philp's
Executor.

On 19th July Thomas Philp raised an action of accounting against Martin of the whole intromissions with the estate of the deceased had
(1) by Mrs Philp during her lifetime; and (2) by the defender as her executor.

The pursuer maintained that the defender was indebted as executor in, inter alia, (2) the sum of £126, as the profits of the business from 7th December 1891 till 16th May 1892, at the rate of £6 per week, twenty-one weeks; (3) £1536, 6s. 2d., as the price realised by the sale of the goodwill, stock in trade, and fittings of said wine and spirit business.

The defender, inter alia, pleaded;—(2) The goodwill of the said business having belonged to Mrs Philp at the date of her death, the defender is not bound to account for the value of the same to the pursuer.

On 21st January 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defender is bound to account for the profits of the business mentioned on record, from the death of the late John Henderson Philp to the date of the transfer of the licence to his widow, under deduction of the sum of 30s. per week as remuneration for the widow's personal services; (2) that the defender is not bound to account for any further profits; and (3) that he is not bound to account for any part of the sum received by him for the goodwill of the business sold by him in May 1892: With these findings, appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure."*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of accounting brought by the executor of the late John Henderson Philp, wine and spirit-merchant in Glasgow, against the executor of his (Mr Philp's) widow. There are various items in the accounting which appear to admit of adjustment, and with which I need not at present deal. But there are two points on which I heard argument the other day, and which it is necessary to decide. The first point is as to the profits of the deceased's business between his death on 7th December 1891 and the transfer of the licence obtained by his widow on or about 16th February 1892. During that period the widow,—who had all along, it appears, managed the business,— continued to manage it as before, using for that purpose the stock, shop fittings, &c., which were undoubtedly part of the husband's moveable estate. The question is, whether besides accounting for the stock and shop fittings, she is bound to account for the profits which she made during that period.

"I am of opinion that the profits in question belong to the deceased's executry estate, subject, of course, to a reasonable allowance to the widow for her personal services. The widow had, at this time, no title of her own to which to ascribe her possession. The business was conducted by her in the deceased's name; and the profits having been earned by the employment of the deceased's stock in trade and other moveable property, I see no reason why she, or rather her executor, should not account for these profits.

"The other question is as to the goodwill of the business, which is said to have been appropriated by the widow, and to have been sold for a large price by the defender as her executor. The facts as to this matter, which do not seem to be disputed, are these:—The husband died intestate, as I have said, on 7th December 1891. The widow died on 23d February following. A few

Philp's Execu-
tor v. Philp's
Executor.

On 18th March 1893 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the parties were agreed with respect to the sum payable to the pursuer on the footing of the preceding interlocutor, and that the sum agreed on had been paid, and therefore assolizied the defender.

The pursuer reclaimed.

On 15th July 1893 the Second Division appointed the cause to be argued before the Judges of that Division and three Judges of the First Division.

Argued for the pursuer;—Although the business, with the stock in trade, was originally the widow's, it passed on her marriage to her husband jure mariti, and formed part of his moveable estate at his death. The Lord Ordinary had then rightly held that, at all events until the licence was transferred to the widow, the defender had no right whatever to the profits of the business made up to that period. But the Lord Ordinary was in error in holding that the transfer of the licence had the effect of investing the widow with the business. It was clear that the purpose of the Act of 9 Geo. IV. c. 58,* under which the magistrates had acted was merely to continue temporarily the business in order to keep available the assets of the estate of the deceased. Under the transferred licence then the widow occupied purely as an administrator or manager for her husband's executor. In this view the business, with the profits, must be regarded as still forming part of the executry of the husband, and as falling to the pursuer. The pursuer had also right to participate in the sum derived from the goodwill of the business. It was entirely days before her death she, having hitherto managed the business (which, before her marriage, had been her own), applied for a transfer of the licence into her own name. She was opposed by the present pursuer (her husband's executor), who made a competing claim to have the licence transferred to himself. The magistrates, rightly or wrongly, preferred the claim of the widow, and from that time the business was conducted in her name, and under a licence which she held as an individual. After her death, and down to May 1892, the business was carried on by the defender as her executor. It was then sold,—realising, along with the stock and fittings, a sum of about £1500. Of this sum, £250 was paid to the heir-at-law, the owner of the shop, as his share of the goodwill. The remainder is retained by the defender as part of the widow's estate.

"I am of opinion that the pursuer has no claim to participate in the sum derived by the defender from the goodwill of the business. The defender did not sell on pursuer's behalf, and stands in no fiduciary relation to the pursuer. Any goodwill which existed at the husband's death was necessarily extinguished when the widow, not on behalf of the pursuer, but in competition with him, obtained a transfer of the licence to herself. From that time, in my opinion, the business, with the profits and goodwill, so far as not attached to the premises and belonging to the heir, belonged to the widow or her estate; and it was the business thus acquired by the widow, and not the husband's business, which was eventually sold by the defender."

* The Home Drummond Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 58), provides,—“Sec. 19.—Provided always, and be it enacted, that if any person duly authorised to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling house as aforesaid, shall die before the expiration of the certificate to him or her in that behalf granted, it shall be lawful for any two or more Justices of the Peace or magistrates of the county or royal burgh respectively in which such house or premises are situated to grant to the executors, representatives, or disponees of the person so dying and who shall be possessed of such house or premises, a transfer of the certificate to keep or continue such house or premises as a common inn, alehouse, or victualling house, as before such death, until next general or district meeting to be held under the authority of this Act.”

personal,¹ affecting the business and not the premises. Even if it could be held to belong to the heir, the pursuer did not admit the defender's averment that he had arranged with the heir to sell the goodwill; if necessary, this question must be remitted to probation.

Executor.

Argued for the defender;—It was admitted that up to the date of the transfer of the licence the pursuer was entitled to the profits of the business, but the defender was entitled to them from that date till the widow's death. The effect of the statutory transfer of 16th February was to operate a new licence investing the widow with all the rights to the business. The magistrates had rightly made the transfer, for in the words of the statute she was "possessed" of the house at her husband's death, which the pursuer was not. She certainly was no manager for the pursuer, for he had unsuccessfully competed with her for the licence. As regarded the goodwill of the business, the term was elastic and difficult of definition, but the cases would seem to shew that where applicable to a public-house, goodwill was a thing attaching to the premises,² rather than to the person managing the business. Being then heritable, the goodwill passed with the house, and belonged to the heir, who had agreed to allow the defender to sell it.

LORD YOUNG.—John Philp died intestate and childless on 7th December 1891 survived by a widow, his mother, three brothers, and one sister. Arthur, his eldest brother is his heir, and a younger brother, Thomas (the pursuer), his executor. John (the deceased) was at his death proprietor of a public-house of the value of £45 a-year. He was in the personal occupation of this house, in which he carried on the business of a publican. At his death there were in the premises fittings and stock in trade of the value of £102, 9s. per inventory and valuation, the accuracy of which is, I understand, admitted. The widow, on her husband's death, arranged with his heir for permission to occupy the premises, and carry on the publican business therein at a rent, as I gather from the accounts, of £40 a-year. It is immaterial that the arrangement with the heir was made subsequent to the discovery that the will in the widow's favour had been revoked. She occupied accordingly (as we must hold with the landlord's permission), and carried on the business till her death on 23d February 1892, after which her brother and executor (the defender) continued the occupation and the business till the following Whitsunday. On 26th March 1892 the defender entered into the agreement with the landlord of the premises, the import of which is that the latter should grant a lease thereof for seven years at a rent of £45 to Mr Thomas Logan, a tenant of the defender's selection, the defender paying £250 to the landlord as a consideration for the agreement. This agreement was implemented, and Logan has accordingly been in occupation of the premises as tenant since Whitsunday 1892. The defender's transaction

Philp's Execu-
tor v. Philp's
Executor.

This action of count and reckoning was raised on 19th July 1892, and the first request for an accounting, so far as appears, was made on 21st June. No demand was ever made for possession of the shop-fittings or the stock in trade left by the deceased, or claim intimated in respect of them prior to 21st June. The explanation of this delay, and the misapprehension of both parties for a time, may be something connected with the destruction or cancellation of the will which the deceased Philp had certainly made in favour of his widow. This topic need not be pursued, as we must take the case on the footing that the deceased died intestate, and that his executor is entitled to an accounting accordingly. Nor to the account which has been judicially given on that footing is there any objection by the pursuer, except with respect to (first) the profits of the publican business carried on by the widow and the defender between the date of Philp's death and the following Whitsunday; and (second) the sum which the defender received under his bargain with Logan in excess of (1) the value of the shop-fittings and stock in trade; and (2) the sum of £250 paid by the defender to the landlord.

The case is the simple one of a man dying intestate while carrying on the business of a publican in premises which were his own property. The title to the premises, with the right of immediate occupation, passed to the heir, while the executor had right to any personal property therein, with a title and duty to realise it, and dispose of it as intestate estate of the deceased. The nature, amount, and value of such personal property here was ascertained by an inventory and valuation made at the time, and the accuracy of which is, as I have stated, admitted. That the executor had no right to carry on business in the premises, or indeed to occupy them for any purpose, is clear. Then had he any right except a right to demand the personal property which was therein at the death of the deceased owner? In other words, would his right have been satisfied by handing over to him this personal property—that is, the fittings and stock specified in the inventory, or paying him their value if bona fide consumed?

The pursuer on the one hand contends that “the business,” or the “goodwill” of the business, which the deceased had been carrying on down to his death was part of his executry estate, and that if his widow or any other carried it on thereafter the profits must, as an accessory, be part of that estate, and also the price thereof if ultimately sold. The defender, on the other hand, disputes this contention and maintains that the pursuer had no right or title by himself or another to carry on business in the premises, which had passed to the deceased's heir, or to hinder the heir himself or any other, whether the widow of the deceased or a stranger, from doing so. The heir's right was, he contends, indisputable not only to carry on the business of a publican in the premises which had become his property, but to confer such right upon anyone he pleased, whether the widow of the deceased proprietor, or a stranger—the executor of the deceased having no right or interest in the matter entitling him to interfere beyond demanding possession of any property in the premises belonging to the executry estate, and to prevent, if he thought fit, the use of the deceased's name. He further maintains that the occupation and particular use of the premises—that is as a public-house—by the widow till her death, and thereafter by him—self, cannot be questioned by the pursuer, who had no right to any occupation or use thereof. With respect to his bargain or transaction with Mr Logan, the defender maintains that the import of it was that he should for a consideration agreed on between them successfully use his influence with the landlord of the premises to procure for Mr Logan a seven years' lease at a rent of £45, and hand over to him the fittings and stock which were on the premises at his entry or the date of the bargain. This, he says, did not on the one hand affect his obligation to account to the pursuer for the fittings and stock as ascertained to exist at Mr Philp's death, or on the other give the pursuer any right or interest in his bargain with Mr Logan, to which he was no party.

Philp's Executor
v. Philp's
Executor.

And first, with respect to the pursuer's claim for the profits. It is not averred, and we have no ground for assuming it to be the fact, that the widow in carrying on the business after her husband's death used the name of her deceased husband. She obtained a licence in her own name as soon as practicable, and there is no suggestion of any objection by the pursuer to the name in which the business was carried on either by the widow or the defender during the brief period that they carried it on. He was resident in the place and certainly had an eye on the premises where the business was carried on, for he opposed the widow's application for a licence and tried to procure one for himself. The incident is immaterial otherwise than as tending to shew (1) that the pursuer was cognisant of all that the widow did about the business, and (2) that so far from aiding her by goodwill he did what he could to hinder her. He could not fail to know that the widow believed that she was carrying on the business on her own account and not for him, and if he thought the belief erroneous he neither said nor did anything to undeceive her. Nor if her deceased husband's name was on the sign and allowed to remain unaltered (which we have no reason to believe), did he signify in any way that this was an invasion of his right or involved any liability to him. The business was originally hers, and if her husband's name was ever substituted for hers on the shop sign, I do not doubt that after his death she would on an intimation that the pursuer thought its continuance an invasion of his goodwill have restored her own. The notion that its continuance was any benefit to her on the one hand or detriment to the executry estate on the other does not commend itself to my mind. The pursuer's first communication regarding the business was in June after the widow's death, and when the premises and the business were in the hands of Mr Logan, who, I assume, used his own name in carrying it on. There is no averment to the contrary. I have therefore no occasion to consider whether or not the pursuer was entitled to object to the widow or any other using the name of the deceased. It was not used, so far as we know, and certainly no objection on this head was ever stated. But assuming that it was used in violation of the pursuer's right, I cannot hold that his remedy lies in a demand for the profits of the business. He might have put a stop to the use, and possibly claimed damages if he sustained any, but to stand by without objection or communication of any kind, and then after a lapse of time claim the profits on the footing that the business was being carried on for him, is a view of his right which I cannot assent to. Nor, in my opinion, can this claim to profits be supported by the fact that use was made of the fittings and stock specified in the inventory. The use was without title, but the things themselves were quite lawfully in the widow's custody and possession at her husband's death. We have no reason to impugn the integrity and good faith of her conduct on a doubt of the statement that she was ignorant of the destruction of the will in her favour, and without the will she had, jure relictae, the substantial beneficial interest in them to the extent of one half. The executor made no claim till after her death, and I have no difficulty in rejecting the proposition that his remedy for the use without title is a claim to the profits of the business. The only legal and equitable claim which he can make is that the things themselves or their value, as to which there is no dispute, shall be accounted for and made forthcoming. On this first head therefore—the claim to profits—my opinion is in favour of the defender.

Second, with respect to the pursuer's claim upon the bargain which the defender made with Mr Logan. The pursuer's case on this head is that he was in right of "the goodwill" of the business of the deceased John Philp; that he was at liberty to withhold or confer it on whom he pleased and on such terms as he pleased; and that the defender, having sold it to Mr Logan and so conferred it on him, must be assumed to have done so on his, the pursuer's, behalf, and so be liable to account to him for the price. The defender answers that the goodwill which he sold to Logan was the goodwill of the business which he succeeded to and took possession of as executor and universal legatee of the widow who was carrying it on at her death under a licence in her own name; that the substance and reality of his bargain with Logan was that he should procure from the landlord a lease of the premises to him for seven years at a rent of £45, Logan paying him £1400 if his influence and efforts to that end were successful; that he was not acting for or in communication with the pursuer, and did not bestow on Logan (which indeed he could not do) any right which the pursuer could give or withhold.

On this head also my opinion is in favour of the defender and against the pursuer. In the first place, I think it clear that the only goodwill which the pursuer had to dispose of was liberty to use the name of the deceased John Philp in carrying on the business of a publican. He might have sold his liberty to anyone who was willing to buy it, or had he found anyone who was willing to pay him for his influence and efforts to procure a lease of the premises from the landlord he might have transacted with him just as any other might whose services in such a matter were appreciated and sought for. But the only goodwill which as executor he was or is at liberty to dispose of is, as I have said, the right to carry on the publican business under the name of the deceased John Philp. It does not appear that hitherto anyone has thought this liberty worth buying, but if any such person shall hereafter turn up he must apply to the pursuer as the only one who can sell it.

I may add, in conclusion, that with respect to the pursuer's claim for profits the case would in my opinion have been the same had the widow, immediately on her husband's death, obtained a lease from the landlord for seven years from 7th December 1891 (the date of the death) at a given rent, and remained alive and carried on the business during the seven years, for no limit to the time during which the pursuer might have delayed his demand for an accounting on that footing occurs to me consistently with the view which he urges of his right, and the widow's liability as in legal estimation manager for him, although she had no intention of occupying that position or thought that she did. Again, suppose that towards the end of the seven years, or say after the lapse of two, three, or four years, she sold the goodwill of what both she and the purchaser from her honestly believed to be her own business, together with her successful influence with the landlord to procure for the purchaser a transference and prolongation of the lease in his favour, I am unable to see why the pursuer would not have been entitled to the price as on a sale of his property made by the widow as acting for him, if the arguments on which he rests his demands on the defender are well founded. Nor is there any speciality of importance in the fact of widowhood, for the case would obviously have been the same had a stranger to the deceased obtained a lease of the premises from the landlord, and carried on the business of a publican therein, or had the landlord himself entered on the occupation and taken up the business of a publican. The view of being, in the estimation of law, manager or agent of the executor, and liable accordingly, cannot be dependent on the circumstance of widowhood, or, so far as I am able to see, on the circumstance of the time that has elapsed before interposition by the executor being six months or six years.

Philp's Executor
v. Philp's
Executor.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The pursuer is the executor of the deceased J. H. Philp, who carried on within his own premises the business of a wine and spirit-merchant. He died intestate on 7th December 1891. He was succeeded in his heritage by his brother Arthur Philp.

On the death of Philp his widow carried on the business in the same premises till her death on 23d February 1892. Notwithstanding the opposition of the pursuer, the licence which her husband held was transferred to her, and the heir allowed her to continue in the occupation of the premises. After her death the defender, as her executor, carried on the business till 16th May 1892, when he sold the goodwill for £1400. He sold it in the belief that it belonged to him as the executor of Mrs Philp. He had no other title, and he sold in that capacity. But at the same time he undertook to obtain, and did obtain, for the purchaser a seven years' lease of the premises.

The pursuer says that the goodwill was a valuable part of Philp's executory estate, and he claims the benefit of the sale made by the defender. In other words, he claims the price, less £250, which was paid to the heir for the lease.

In my opinion the proposition of the pursuer is not true in fact. I do not think that he had any goodwill to sell, and if he had a right to anything which could be described by that name, I am satisfied that it had no value. We have high authority for saying that the goodwill of such a business goes with the house—(Ex parte Punnett, November 18, 1880, 16 Ch. Div. 226; Cooper v. Metropolitan Board of Works, November 24, 1883, 25 Ch. Div. 472). It is not what is called a personal goodwill; it is, as Lord Eldon said, "the chance that customers will continue to resort to the same place." The pursuer had no right to the house, and could give none. Indeed, he was not entitled to enter it save for the purpose of removing the effects of the deceased. He had not even a licence of which a purchaser might have got the benefit. I do not enter into the question whether the magistrates did right in preferring the claim of the widow. It is enough that he had no licence. In these circumstances I cannot see that the pursuer had anything to sell, or that he could assign a purchaser into any right.

In the course of the discussion the pursuer did not attach much or any value to the right which he claims. He relied chiefly on the fact that a sale of the goodwill was made by the defender, and he contended that as the business was his, he was entitled to adopt the sale to the effect of requiring the defender to account for the price.

I have already pointed out that the defender did not profess to sell anything

No. 92.

Philp's Execu-
tor v. Philp's
Executor.

that belonged to the pursuer. He sold the goodwill under his title as executor, and therefore as part of the executry of the widow. In other words, he sold the goodwill, if it formed part of that executry estate. He did nothing more. I doubt if he had anything to sell unless it might be his undertaking to obtain a lease from the heir, though the fact that the widow had been in possession of the licence might be of some value to the purchaser.

If this be so, I do not see how I can sustain the claim of the pursuer. I see no ground on which he has a right to adopt the sale. The defender sold what he believed to be his own, and he sold nothing unless the goodwill, which he professed to sell as part of Mrs Philp's executry estate. The pursuer cannot, I think, take benefit by the sale, which in the case supposed would be a sale of nothing.

The pursuer might have a claim if he could shew that he was injured by what the defender had done. He could appeal to the maxim, Nemo debet esse locupletior damno alterius. But he was in no sense injured. Nothing was taken from him. No right belonging to him was diminished or affected. He remained exactly as he had been, with the same power of sale, and with the same power of making the sale effectual if he had anything to sell. Consequently he is not seeking to recover a loss, but to make a gain, to which in my opinion he has no title.

I have been hitherto assuming that the business carried on by the widow was the business of her husband, and that the goodwill of that business fell into his executry. But I concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that not later than the transference of the licence the business was the business of the widow. The business of J. H. Philp necessarily perished because it could not be carried on by his executor, and the executor could not carry it on because he had no licence and no right to the premises. The widow in no sense represented her husband, and did not carry on the business on account of his executry estate. On the contrary, she opposed the pursuer's claim for a transference of the licence for the obvious purpose of excluding the pursuer and making the business her own. The proprietor allowed her to occupy the premises, and in the absence of any allegation to the contrary, I must hold that this permission was given to her for her own benefit. There is nothing to suggest that it was given to her as the servant of the pursuer, or for the benefit of her husband's executry estate. The pursuer could not have prevented the widow from carrying on the business on her own account. He could have withdrawn the stock in trade and fittings which belonged to her husband. But he could do nothing more. It is true that she made use of the stock, but that is of no importance except in so far as it may affect her obligation to account.

I am therefore of opinion that the business which existed at the widow's death was her own, and that any goodwill which attached to it formed part of her executry estate.

For these reasons, I hold that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred in Lord Rutherford Clark's opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary prefixed to this reclaiming note only expresses the result of the application of findings pronounced by him in his interlocutor of 21st January 1893. It is these findings which are now brought under review. No. 92.

The case before us is this—The late John Henderson Philp at the time of his death (7th December 1891) carried on business as a wine and spirit-merchant. He died intestate, and the pursuer is his executor qua next of kin. Mr Philp was survived by his widow, who immediately entered on possession of the premises occupied by her husband, and carried on the business which had been her husband's until her death on 23d February 1892 without any title, but having obtained a transfer of the licence granted to her husband to her own name about a week before, namely, on 16th February 1892. Mrs Philp left a settlement by which she appointed the defender her executor and universal legatee, who in that character sold the business and goodwill thereof. The questions now are—(1) To whom belong the profits derived from the business from the date of Mr Philp's death till it was sold; and (2) to whom does the sum received for goodwill belong?

Feb. 1, 1894.
Philp's Execu-
tor v. Philp's
Executor.

On the first of these questions the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the profits derived from the business, as carried on between the date of Mr Philp's death and the 16th February 1892, when the licence was transferred to the name of the widow, belong to the pursuer, but that beyond that date the profits belong to the widow, and the defender as her executor. The ground on which the Lord Ordinary proceeds is, that after her husband's death, and until the licence was transferred, the widow had no title to which to ascribe her possession: that the business was her deceased husband's business, and that the profits were earned by the employment of the deceased husband's stock in trade and other moveable property. I agree with the views so expressed by the Lord Ordinary, but I think on these grounds that the pursuer is entitled to more than the Lord Ordinary has awarded him. The transfer of the licence did not transfer the business: it gave the widow authority to deal in excisable liquors, but nothing more. Accordingly, what she did deal in after the transfer of the licence was nothing more nor less than what she had been dealing with before the transfer, and that was her husband's business, "stock in trade, and other moveable property," all then belonging and due to the pursuer as the husband's executor. In my opinion the whole profits derived from the business from the date of Mr Philp's death until the time when it was sold are due to the pursuer, having been derived solely from the employment of the late Mr Philp's estate. These profits are, of course, to be ascertained after making due allowance to the widow or others for services rendered in the business.

With regard to the second point, the disposal of the sums obtained for goodwill, I differ from the Lord Ordinary. I do not consider it necessary here to inquire whether the goodwill of a business falls to the heir-at-law or the executor, for that question does not really arise here. The heir-at-law has been settled with; he claims no more than he has got, and the pursuer does not question the heir's right to keep what he has got. But after the heir-at-law has been paid what is or is supposed to be his share of the goodwill, what becomes of the balance? The Lord Ordinary awards it to the defender as executor of Mrs Philp, because (1) he, the defender, in selling the business, did not sell on the pursuer's behalf; and (2) because on the transfer of the licence to the name of the widow, any goodwill which existed at the husband's death was necessarily extinguished. I do not think these reasons warrant the Lord Ordinary's conclusion. First, it is immaterial whether the defender in selling

the business sold it for the pursuer or not. The question is, whose property did he sell, not on whose instructions or authority did he sell it. If the business stock and fittings were the property of the deceased Mr Philp or his executor, then Mr Philp's executor is entitled to the price realised by the sale. The result is not affected by any consideration as to the seller's right or authority to sell. Now, that the stock and fittings were the property of the pursuer when sold is not, in my opinion, open to the slightest doubt. They were part of Mr Philp's estate admittedly at the date of his death—they never were transferred to or acquired by his widow—they remained therefore part of Mr Philp's executry claimable by the pursuer. The actual stock in the shop when Mr Philp died was of course different from that in the shop when sold. But the latter was the equivalent of the former, and was all bought and paid for out of the proceeds of the business. As to the goodwill, it attached either to the premises or to the business carried on in the premises, or partly to both. So far as it attached to the premises, the heir-at-law, the owner of the premises, has received it—what remains must attach to the business, for it was not an independent and separate right or asset in itself. Then if it was attached to the business, and went with the business, the price paid for it must go, just like the price of the stock and fittings, to the person to whom it belonged. The buyer of the business paid somewhere about £1500 for business, goodwill, stock, and fittings. Of that a certain proportion has been paid to the owner of the premises—rightly or wrongly. The balance, it appears to me, can belong to nobody but the person in titulo to the business, goodwill, stock, &c., and that is the pursuer. The transfer of the licence to the widow, whether granted to her in competition with the pursuer or not, could not diminish the estate of Mr Philp nor extinguish the goodwill any more than it could extinguish the business itself, nor could it transfer to her any asset belonging to her deceased husband. It did not make the business or the goodwill; it only enabled the widow to carry on lawfully the business her husband had left. I think, therefore, the pursuer is entitled to the amount realised by the sale of the business, including the goodwill, less the amount paid to the heir-at-law, and less the value of anything sold and included in the price (if there was any) which the widow had purchased after her husband's death out of her own funds.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur entirely in Lord Trayner's opinion.

Eeles.

THE REV. WILLIAM CARRUTHERS, South Queensferry, died on 23d June 1854, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 10th March 1846, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, in the second place, to pay the income to his wife, if she should survive him, and so long as she should remain a widow, she being bound to maintain and educate the children of the marriage while unable to provide for themselves. In the third place, in the event of his widow entering into a second marriage, the trustees were directed to apply part, or if necessary the whole of the income of the trust-estate in the maintenance and education of the children during their respective minorities, and while unable to provide for themselves. The trust-disposition then contained this clause,—“In the fourth place, after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, the trustees shall set apart as a debt the sum which they shall judge necessary to pay the education and maintenance of such of my children as shall then be under twenty-one years of age, until each respectively reach that age, or if daughters, shall be married, and the trustees shall pay over and divide the free proceeds of my moveable or personal estate and arrears or accumulation, if any, of the whole income of the trust-estate, to and among, and shall dispose, assign, and convey my whole heritable or real estate to and in favour of the said David Carruthers, Margaret Carruthers, James Smith Carruthers, and William Carruthers, being my whole children, and any other child or children who may be born of my body, equally, share and share alike, and the survivors and survivor equally, and that at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas immediately following the death of the survivor of my said wife and me, or the majority of my youngest child, whichever of these events shall last happen, on the following conditions: the share of the premises of each child shall be a vested right at majority, though not payable till the youngest reach majority; if any of my said children die before the said period of division leaving lawful issue, the latter shall succeed equally to the share of their parent.”

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

The testator was survived by his widow and by the four children named in the deed, of whom the youngest, William, attained majority on 11th January 1866.

The widow died on 25th March 1885, predeceased by the eldest son David, who had died 7th April 1879, survived by an only child Margaret. David left a trust-disposition and settlement giving his daughter a life-rent of his whole estates, and the fee to her children, with an ulterior destination.

At the time of his death the Rev. Mr Carruthers was heritable proprietor of and duly infeft in the pro indiviso one-third share of the lands of South Cobbinshaw, Midlothian. On 22d December 1888, Margaret Carruthers, David's daughter, made up a title by notarial instrument to one-fourth part of this pro indiviso third share, on the footing that her father, having predeceased his mother, had taken no vested right under his father's settlement, and consequently that one-fourth part of the one-third share of the said lands had vested in her. Margaret Carruthers thereafter granted a bond and disposition in security for £200 in favour of Francis Eeles over that one-fourth part of the one-third share.

On 7th March 1893 David Carruthers's trustee, who held a disposition to the one-fourth part of the one-third share, granted by the surviving trustee of the Rev. Mr Carruthers, brought an action against Margaret Carruthers and against Eeles for reduction of the notarial instrument and of the bond and disposition in security, on the ground that on a sound construction of the Rev. Mr Carruthers's settlement, David's share of his father's estate vested in him when he attained majority, and consequently that the one-fourth part of the one-third share of the lands of South Cobbinshaw had vested in him and passed to the pursuer as his trustee.

Eeles alone lodged defences.

On 28th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the defender, Francis Eeles, has produced the notarial instrument and the bond and disposition in security, dated, &c., for the sum of £200, granted by Margaret Carruthers in his favour, of consent holds the production so far as the said Francis Eeles is concerned, satisfied: Of consent also holds the preliminary defences lodged for the said Francis Eeles as defences on the merits: And having heard counsel on the closed record and considered the cause, sustains the reasons of reduction, and reduces, decerns, and declares, conform to the conclusions of the libel as against the said Francis Eeles: . . . Finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender, the said Francis Eeles, liable in expenses to the pursuer."*

* "OPINION.—This case takes the form of an action of reduction of certain titles made up on behalf of the defender, Miss Margaret Carruthers, but the only question which I require to decide seems to be this,—whether the share of the trust-estate of the late Rev. W. Carruthers, bequeathed to his son, the late David Carruthers, vested in the latter at majority? It appears that David Carruthers survived his majority, but died before his mother, the truster's widow. The question is, whether, upon the just construction of his father's settlement, vesting was postponed until the widow's death?

"There is undoubtedly some force in the view that the whole clause of bequest proceeds on the hypothesis that the truster and his wife have both died; or to put it otherwise, that there is no gift expressed except upon the condition that the donee shall survive both husband and wife. The clause certainly begins thus,—‘After the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, the trustees shall set apart,’ &c., &c. And Mr Clyde forcibly argued that these introductory words govern the whole clause; and that although the clause goes on to provide that vesting shall take place upon majority, that only means this, that assuming the widow to have predeceased, vesting shall not be postponed beyond majority by reason of the non-arrival of the period of payment, viz., the majority of the youngest child.

"I cannot say that I regard this reading of the settlement as necessarily inadmissible, but on the other hand I have to consider that the clause or trust purpose referred to contains an express provision to the effect that ‘the share of the premises of each child shall be a vested right at majority, though not payable till the youngest child reach majority.’ I have not, I confess, seen my way to qualify this express provision by implications, which, although plausible, cannot be said to be necessary. It may be that the truster intended that quali-

Eales.

LORD YOUNG.—The Rev. William Carruthers by his trust-settlement directed his trustees to give a liferent of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his wife, and on her death and the majority of his youngest child to pay and convey the fee and capital to all his children and the survivors equally, with a declaration, probably superfluous, that the issue of predeceasers should take their parent's share. By the law, as it has now for about thirty years been held to be settled and fixed, this imports vesting in the children (or the issue of predeceasers) existing at the date of distribution. This Court had erroneously thought and decided otherwise, but the error was corrected by a judgment of the House of Lords about twenty years subsequent to the date of the settlement of Mr Carruthers, which was in 1846, and about ten years subsequent to his death, which occurred in 1854.

It is by the fourth article of Mr Carruthers's settlement that the trustees are directed as I have stated. It, however, contains this clause, which I have not yet noticed,—“The share of the premises of each child shall be a vested right at majority, though not payable till the youngest reach majority; if any of my said children die before the said period of division leaving lawful issue, the latter shall succeed equally to the share of their parent.”

The question, and only question, which was argued to us is, what is the legal import of this clause? Assuming that without it (i.e., had it not occurred) the vesting would have been at the period of distribution, and of course in the children then surviving and the issue of predeceasers, what is the meaning and legal effect of this clause? It is not contended by either party that it is meaningless or inoperative, but they are in conflict as to its true meaning and operation. The defender (for only one has appeared) contends that it refers and applies only to such of the testator's children as may happen to survive the liferentrix (their mother), and must be read and have effect exactly as if the words had been,—“The share of the premises of each child who may survive the liferentrix shall be a vested right at majority,” the reason which he assigns being that this is the reasonable and just inference from the words “though not payable till the youngest reach majority,” and that had this inference and limitation not been intended, these words would either have been omitted or enlarged so as to read, “though not payable till the youngest reach majority and the death of the liferentrix.” The pursuer disputes this construction, and the reasoning in support of it, on grounds which, whether sound and conclusive or not, are sufficiently obvious. He says that the primary and leading words are too plain to admit of construction; that the testator's object manifestly was to enable each child after attaining majority to deal with his prospective estate fying words should be read in, drawn from the general scheme of the clause. But I think that if that were his meaning, he could easily have expressed it. On the whole, I prefer to construe the settlement literally, and I therefore propose to find that the share of the late David Carruthers vested in him prior to his death and passed to the pursuer as his trustee. I suppose it follows that I should pronounce decree of reduction in terms of the summons.”

as a vested right, so that those who came in his place at the time of distribution (if he did not survive) should take it, as he would himself have done, subject to his debts and deeds incurred or made after majority; that the words "though not payable till the youngest attain majority" are superfluous, meaning only "though not then payable." The Lord Ordinary favours the view of the pursuer, rejecting that of the defender, and I agree with him.

The facts of the particular case as they have occurred illustrate the pursuer's contention as to the true sense and meaning of the clause in question, and the purpose which the truster intended thereby to effect. He was survived by his widow for thirty years, and she survived the majority of the youngest child for nineteen years. That child was born some years before the father's death, and was over forty when the mother died. The eldest child (David)—the validity of whose deed is in question—had a daughter (Margaret) born to him in his mother's lifetime, and in 1877 he executed a trust-disposition and settlement primarily in her favour, but with trusts for her protection and an ulterior destination. He died in 1879, when the youngest child of his father was thirty-four years old, and he (the eldest) necessarily older. Now, it seems to me that the intelligible, legitimate, and indeed obvious purpose of the truster (the Rev. William Carruthers) in inserting the clause in question in his settlement was that such a deed as his eldest son executed after majority should have validity and effect upon his "share of the premises." I can conceive no other, and no other was suggested. But this purpose has no apparent connection with the accident whether the payment shall in the result be delayed beyond the time of a child's share becoming "a vested right" by the continuing minority of the youngest child or the prolonged survivance of the widow: It must of necessity, by the terms of the deed, be delayed till both events shall have occurred, and which of them shall first happen seems immaterial to the only purpose and intention which can reasonably be imputed to the testator.

I am therefore of opinion that David's "share of the premises" was "a vested right" in him at the time of his death, and that his deed must have effect upon it accordingly.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether under the residuary clause of Mr Carruthers's trust-disposition the benefit given to his children vested as they severally attained majority, or whether the vesting was postponed till the death of the widow.

The truster directed his trustees to divide his moveable and heritable estate among his whole children in equal shares, "and the survivors or survivor equally, and that at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas immediately following the death of the survivor of my said wife and me, or the majority of my youngest child, whichever of these events shall last happen." The parties did not dispute that if the question had to be decided by this clause alone, no interest could vest till the death of the widow. The reason is obvious. Nothing is given except through the division which the trustees are directed to make, and they can make no division until the death of the widow. And as it is settled that the survivorship clause must be construed by reference to the period of distribution, the meaning of the truster necessarily is that the trustees are to divide the residue among such of his children as survive that period. Under such a clause no other children could take benefit.

But the division was to be made on the following conditions:—"The share of each child shall be a vested right at majority though not payable till the youngest reach majority," &c. It is said that this declaration is absolute and unqualified, and that by virtue thereof the share of each child must vest when he attains majority. Such a reading is an abrogation of the survivorship clause. If we adopt it, we must hold that under a direction to divide a vested interest is conferred on a legatee who is not one of the persons among whom the division can be made.

Carruthers's
Trustee v.
Ecles.

It is our duty, if we can, to give a meaning to every clause of the deed. It may happen that there is an absolute inconsistency, and in that case the latest clause would prevail. But if the different clauses may fairly bear a construction which will give consistency to the whole deed, we must adopt that construction. Or if this be impossible, we must endeavour to reduce the inconsistency to its lowest limits.

There are two periods at which the division may take place, viz., the death of the widow or the majority of the youngest child. In stating the conditions the truster contemplates the latter only, but I think that he contemplates it as a period of division, or, in other words, he is referring to a time at which his wife is dead. For it is only on the supposition that that event has occurred that the period which he mentions is a period of division. I am disposed, therefore, to read the condition as merely accelerating the date of vesting after the death of the widow, but as doing nothing more.

I am aware that this construction does not give consistency to the whole deed. For the division is directed to be made on the occurrence of the last of two events, and a vested interest is given to a child who may not survive both. We must, however, give effect to the express declaration of the truster. I follow the rule of which I have previously spoken, and I do not carry the inconsistency further than the language of the deed necessarily requires.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am not prepared to adopt the view that the opening words of the clause under construction, viz., "after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife," &c., govern the whole clause. Fairly read along with the context, these words appear to me to be limited in their application to the first matter with which the clause in question deals. By the second trust purpose of the late Mr Carruthers's settlement his trustees are directed to give to his widow the liferent and free yearly income of his whole estate, out of which she is taken bound to educate and maintain the children of the marriage, with a declaration that in the event of the widow entering into a second marriage her liferent shall cease. The third purpose provides that, in the event of the widow entering into a second marriage, the trustees shall apply a part, or, if necessary, the whole of the annual produce of the estate in the maintenance of the children during minority or while unable to provide for themselves; and the fourth purpose (set forth in the clause in question) provides, that "after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife the trustees shall set apart as a debt the sum which they shall judge necessary to pay the education and maintenance of such of my children as shall then be under twenty-one years of age," until they reach that age or be married. Now, observe what these clauses come to: They are, so far as the children are concerned, provisions for three different sets of circumstances. First, if the widow does not enter into a second marriage she gets the liferent of the whole estate under burden of maintaining and educating the children of the marriage. Second, if the widow enters into a second marriage, she loses her liferent, and the children are to be provided for by the trustees. The position and necessities of the children are thus provided for during their mother's survivance, whether she enters into a second marriage or not. But another contingency had to be provided against, namely, the decease of the widow, and with regard to that the trustor provided (third) that after the death of himself and his widow the trustees shall provide for the children in minority or unable to support themselves in a certain way. This third contingency is, in my opinion, what the opening words of the fourth trust purpose refer to, and nothing else. The rest of the fourth purpose, although in form a continuation of the clause, is really a new provision relating to a totally different matter, namely, the vesting and distribution of the fee of the estate after the liferent for the widow or maintenance of children have been provided for, and need no longer be considered. I think therefore we proceed to the construction of the clause in question unembarrassed by the words with which it commences, and looking at the clause in that view, I reach the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary. The period of payment of the children's provisions is postponed until after the death of the widow and until the youngest child has attained majority, because the liferent of the one and the maintenance of the other render such postponement necessary. But postponement of the terms of payment does not per se postpone the period of vesting. Here the trustor has fixed the period of vesting, for he expressly declares that the benefits conferred on his children by his settlement are conferred "on the following conditions:—The share of the premises of each child shall be a vested right at majority, though not payable till the youngest reach majority," &c. It is pointed out to us that this assumes (although it is not expressed) that the widow must be dead when the youngest child attains majority, because until the widow's death the existence of her liferent would prevent the division of the estate. I agree that this must be so. Before payment to any child of his share of the estate the widow must be dead and the youngest child major. But the vesting is declared to take place as each child attains majority, and the vesting therefore, according to the trustor's express declaration, is not postponed until the period of payment. I do not think it admissible to fix a period of vesting as a result of mere construction different from that which the testator has fixed in precise and unambiguous language. I am therefore of opinion that the share of the late David Carruthers vested in him when he became major, and was consequently carried by his settlement to the pursuer.

Road—Burgh—Reparation.—Held (by a majority of seven Judges, dis. Lord Young) that the proprietor of a house in a public street within burgh, whose titles include the solum of the pavement in front of the house, is not relieved from the duty of maintaining the pavement in a safe condition for foot-passengers by the mere fact that the street is under the control and management of a public body, and that he will be liable in damages to foot-passengers who are injured through his neglect to fulfil this duty.

Road—Burgh—Reparation—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. No. 94. clxxiii.), secs. 289, 317, 326.—The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 289, enacts, —“Every public street, for the objects and purposes thereof, and of this Act, and the public sewers, . . . shall vest in the board, but it shall be lawful for the proprietors of lands and heritages adjoining any such street to construct cellars or vaults under the foot-pavement opposite such lands and heritages, where by their titles they have a right so to do.” Feb. 1, 1894. Baillie v. Shearer's Judicial Factor.

Sec. 310 enacts,—“Subject to the obligations hereinafter imposed on the proprietors of lands and heritages, the board shall make provision for maintaining . . . the public streets in a suitable manner. . . .”

Sec. 317 enacts that the Master of Works may, by notice given, require “any proprietor of a land or heritage adjoining . . . any public street . . . to form” . . . and from time to time to alter, repair, or renew to his entire satisfaction foot-pavements in such street opposite to such land or heritage as respects such proprietor, “except where the foot-pavements have been taken over by the board.”

Sec. 326 enacts that the board may direct defective pavements to be renewed by the Master of Works, “and the expense thereof” “shall be payable by the parties liable to maintain such foot-pavements, and be recoverable by the board as damages, and thereafter all such foot-pavements shall be maintained by the board as part of the public streets of the city.”

Held (diss. Lord Young and Lord Adam) that the owner of the solum of a pavement adjoining his house in a public street is liable in damages for an accident caused to a member of the public by the defective state of the pavement, unless the pavement had been taken over by the board of police in terms of sec. 326.

Right in security—Mails and duties—Reparation.—Held (by a majority of seven Judges, dub. Lord Trayner) that the creditor under a bond and disposition in security entering into possession of the security subjects under a decree of mails and duties and conducting himself as owner thereof, to the exclusion of the true owner, incurs the liabilities of an owner in questions with the public.

IN January 1893 Mrs Euphemia Baillie, widow of James Baillie, 2D DIVISION, engineer, Glasgow, brought an action of damages for personal injuries with three con- against James Hutton, C.A., Glasgow, judicial factor on the trust-estate Lord Kin- of James Shearer, wine and spirit-merchant there, conform to appoint- cairney. ment, dated 7th December 1892.

The pursuer averred that (cond. 1) the trust-estate upon which the defender was judicial factor included a postponed bond and disposition in security over property in Shamrock Street, Glasgow, including No. 11 Shamrock Street. “The defender, as judicial factor foressaid, is a heritable creditor in possession of said property by virtue of a decree of mails and duties by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, obtained on the 19th December 1882 at the instance of his predecessors, the said trustees of the late James Shearer. Under said decree of mails and duties Mr Shearer's trustees, and since 7th December 1892 the defender, as judicial factor, have, through house-factors appointed by them, taken and kept exclusive possession of said property, and continued to draw the whole rents and profits thereof, have carried out certain repairs, and have generally attended to said property and conducted themselves as proprietors, or at least as possessors thereof, to the exclusion of everyone else.” (Cond. 2) “About six o'clock on the evening of Sunday, 11th December 1892, while the pursuer was passing along Shamrock Street . . . at a point almost exactly opposite No. 11 Shamrock Street, . . . she was tripped up by a loose flagstone, and fell heavily to the ground.” (Cond. 3) “The said portion of pavement in front of No. 11 Shamrock Street had been out of repair for some time, and was, at the date of said accident to the pursuer, in an improper and dangerous condition, and not safe for the use of persons passing along said street. . . . the house-factors, representing the said trustees and the defender, that the said portion of pavement was out of repair. . . . Apart from such notice, it was the defender's duty to have and keep the said pavement in a safe condition for foot-passengers."

The defender admitted that under the decree of maills and duties founded on by the pursuer Shearer's trustees had, through factors appointed by them, drawn the rents of the property under obligation to account to the prior bondholder and to the proprietor; but he denied that either he or Shearer's trustees had conducted themselves as proprietors of No. 11 Shamrock Street, or excluded the proprietor or anyone else from the possession or management of the same.

The defender further founded on the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, particularly sections 289 and 317,* and averred,—(Stat. 9) "Both at common law, which is incorporated with the above statute, and under the express

Sec. 289 enacts,—“Every public street, for the objects and purposes thereof, and of this Act, and the public sewers for the drainage thereof, shall vest in the board, but it shall be lawful for the proprietors of lands and heritages adjoining any such street to construct cellars or vaults under the foot-pavement opposite such lands and heritages, where by their titles they have a right so to do.”

Sec. 317 enacts,—“The Master of Works may, by notice given in manner hereinafter provided, require the trustees of any bridge or of any turnpike road on which there is a bridge, or any proprietor of a land or heritage adjoining any other turnpike road within the city, or any public street, so far as not already done, to form in a suitable manner, with openings at convenient distances for fire-plugs, and from time to time to alter, repair, or renew to his entire satisfaction foot-pavements on such bridge as respects such trustees, or in such road or street opposite to such land or heritage as respects such proprietor, except where the foot-pavements have been taken over by the board.”

Sec. 321 states the particulars which are to be given in the notices, and sec. 322 provides for the disposal of objections to the notice by the proprietor.

Sec. 325 enacts that in case of failure to comply with the requisition contained in the notice, the Procurator-fiscal may apply to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to execute the work, and on the Dean of Guild fixing the cost thereof, obtain decree against the proprietor or proprietors for the amount of such cost.

Sec. 326 enacts,—“On a report by the Master of Works that the foot-pavement of any street, or of the streets within any district of the city, are in a defective and unsatisfactory state, the board may, after such examination or inquiry as they think fit, direct the foot-pavement of such street, or of the streets in such district, to be renewed by the Master of Works, of such width, and using such description and quality of pavement as they may fix, except in the principal thoroughfares of the city, where they shall be bound to use the best quality of Arbroath or Caithness pavement, with granite kerb-stones, and the expense thereof, as certified by the Master of Works, shall be payable by the parties liable to maintain such foot-pavements, and be recoverable by the board as damages, and thereafter, all such foot-pavements shall be maintained by the board as part of the public streets of the city.”

Baillie v.

Shearer's

Judicial

Factor.

With reference to the question under the Glasgow Police Act, it was at the bar admitted by the pursuer that Shamrock Street was a public street in the sense of the Act, and by the defender that the pavement of Shamrock Street had not been taken over by the Board of Police under section 326 of the Act.

It was further admitted by the defender, at the bar in the Inner-House, that the solum of the pavement in front of No. 11 Shamrock Street was within his titles.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, having suffered loss, injury, and damage, by or through the fault or negligence of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, is entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The defender having ousted the proprietor of the property after mentioned from all management of or interference therewith, and having taken the exclusive possession and management of the said property, of which No. 11 Shamrock Street, and the pavement in front of the same, forms part, it was his duty to keep and maintain the same in proper order for safe use by the public. (3) Under and in virtue of the 'Glasgow Police Act, 1866,' the defender is responsible for the repair and maintenance of said foot-pavement in a safe and proper condition for the use of the public.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevantly and incompetently laid against the present defender. (2) The defender, as holder under a postponed bond of a decree of mails and duties with respect to the property in question, and intromitter with the rents derived therefrom, under obligation to account as set forth in the record, is not liable to the pursuer for the condition of the property. (4) The defender not being responsible for the condition of the pavement mentioned on record, is entitled to be assolizied.

On 31st May 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first and fourth pleas in law for the defender, and assolizies him from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The question is whether in these circumstances the defender, as heritable creditor in actual possession of No. 11 Shamrock Street, was under an obligation to keep the pavement opposite that house in a safe condition for the use of members of the public passing along it. The question seems novel; at least no authority affording much assistance was referred to. The pursuer maintained that at common law an heritable creditor in actual possession of property covered by his bond, under a decree of mails and duties, incurred all the obligations and duties of the proprietor, whose place he assumed, and was under the same liability as an owner would be, if a member of the public, with right of access, suffered injury through the dangerous condition of his property. An owner would be liable in damages for such an injury in a certain limited class of cases, of which there are many examples in the books, such, for example, as Black v. Cadell, 9th February 1804, M. 13,905; Cleghorn v. Taylor, 27th February 1856, 18 D. 664; Mack v. Simpson, 17th February 1832, 10 S. 349, where a judicial factor on the estate was held so liable. The defender contended that in such circumstances an heritable creditor would not be liable. No case has been quoted in which such an action has been sustained against an heritable creditor in possession, but the pursuer referred to an early case, Hay v. Littlejohn, 16th February 1666, M. 13,974, where an action of damages for injury, caused by the insecure condition of a tenement, was sustained against an appriser of a liferenter's right, apparently because he was in possession. I am inclined to think that one who assumes the sole possession and management of a house or property, as the defender is alleged to have done, may be held also to assume the responsibility attaching to the condition of the tenement or property, and that, if it becomes unsafe through want of necessary repairs, he may be held liable in the consequences, especially if he be a creditor lawfully in possession, and if the repairs be such as he would be entitled to make and charge against the rents, and if I could think that this case depended on the principles of common law, I could not have sustained the defender's plea without inquiry. But I am of opinion that the decision of the case does not depend on common law, but on the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, and that the rights and obligations of the owner of a house opposite a public street in Glasgow, in reference to the street or pavement, are not common law rights and obligations, but such as are expressed in and depend on the Police Act.

"In considering the case as depending on the Police Act, I assume, as I have said, first, that Shamrock Street is a public street, and secondly, that the pavement has not been taken over by the board. I think with the pursuer, that under the interpretation clause, the word 'proprietor,' as used in the Act, includes one in the position of the defender as being 'in the actual enjoyment of the rents and profits of the lands' in question. But it appears to me that the defender is not in that sense proprietor of the street and pavement, but that the ownership of the street and pavement as such has been transferred to the board by the 289th section of the statute. That section provides that [quotes]. I think that the exception or proviso in this clause shews that the word 'street' as here used includes the pavement as well as the causeway, and in the statute generally the word 'street' is used as including both causeway and pavement where there is a pavement. The causeway and the pavement are in some respects differently dealt with, but each of them is regarded as part of the street. I think that in respect of that section the adjoining proprietor lost his control over the street.

"Section 298 empowers the board to convey a portion of a public street to the proprietor adjoining, a provision which assumes that the street—at least its surface—had been vested in the board. It is not in the least necessary to determine whether the rights of the proprietor in the subsoil below the site of the public sewers and gas and water pipes are affected. The Lord President in The Glasgow Coal Company v. The Glasgow City and District Railway Company, 20th July 1882, 10 R. 1291, expressed a clear opinion that they were not.

"Now, if a public street—both causeway and pavement—be vested in the board, the rights and duties of the proprietor of the land adjoining, over the surface, at common law must cease, and his rights and duties in regard to the causeway and pavement must be those conferred and imposed by the Police Act. The provisions of the statute in regard to the maintenance of streets and courts are contained in sections 310 to 327 inclusive. Section 310 provides for the maintenance of public streets by the board, and I read it as referring to pavements as well as causeways. The obligation imposed on the board is said to be 'subject to the obligations hereinafter imposed on the proprietors of lands and heritages.' Sections 315 and 316 regard the causeways of the streets and the release of proprietors of adjoining lands from liability for the future maintenance or renewal of the causeway. Had this accident happened through defect of the causeway it is quite clear that the defender would not have been liable.

or house property, in possession of the property and drawing the rents, was bound to maintain it in a safe condition, and if in consequence of its unsafe condition, through the proprietor's negligence, anyone having a legitimate interest to be on the property was injured, the proprietor would be liable to such person.¹ But the mere fact of proprietorship would not infer liability, if the proprietor had been practically ejected from his position of proprietor by someone having a title to do so, the bare radical right of property alone remaining in him, for in such case there could be no negligence on his part.² Such was the position of the owner of this property, for the defender (or at least his authors, for whose actings as judicial factor he was responsible³) had entered into possession of the property, drawn the whole rents, accounted therefor to the parties

The pavements are treated somewhat differently, and they are dealt with in the 317th and following sections, and chiefly in section 317 and 326, and it appears to me that the obligations of the defender must be found in these two sections.

"Section 317 is clumsily expressed, but so far as it relates to the pavements of streets, it provides as follows

"The provision here is that notice is to be given to form pavements, and also that notice is to be given to alter, repair, or renew them, and the defender contends that his obligation to repair arises only when he has received a notice from the Master of Works requiring him to do so. The exception at the end of the clause means only that when the pavements are taken over by the board the proprietors shall not be subject to any such notice or requirement. . . .

"Section 326 provides that foot-pavements may, after certain procedure, be assumed by the board, 'and thereafter all such foot-pavements shall be maintained by the board as part of the public streets of the city.'

"It has not been contended by the defender that section 326 applies to Shamrock Street. If it had applied, the pavement would have been precisely in the position of a completed causeway, and the proprietors would have been no longer liable to be called on to repair it. If section 326 had applied to Shamrock Street there could have been no case against the defender. But the only difference between a pavement to which section 317 applies, and a pavement to which section 326 applies, is that in the former case the proprietors are liable to execute or pay for such work as the Master of Works requires, and in the latter case they are not liable to pay anything, but the whole expense of repair is thrown on the rates. But section 317 imposes no duty on the proprietor except what the notice of the Master of Works imposes, and if, as I think, the proprietor was under no antecedent duty, I do not see from what his duty to repair the pavement can be deduced. Prima facie, a mere adjoining owner would not have right to renew or alter the pavement at his own hand, and I do not see that he has the right or the duty to exercise his discretion in repairing it. . . .

"I am therefore of opinion that the contention of the defender is well founded, and that in the absence of any notice by the Master of Works the defender had no duty to repair this pavement, and has therefore incurred no liability on account of its defective condition. . . .

"I have not in this case to consider whether the magistrates would be liable or not, and it would not be right to indicate any view on that subject.

"With regard to the liability of magistrates to keep the streets of a burgh in repair, reference was made to the following cases:—Innes v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1798, M. 13,189; Threshie v. Magistrates of Annan, 11th December 1845, 8 D. 276; Dargie v. Magistrates of Forfar, 10th March 1855, 17 D. 730; Stephen v. Magistrates of Thurso, 3d March 1876, 3 R. 535; *Harris v. severally interested therein, made repairs on the property, as he was entitled to do,¹ and generally conducted himself as owner to the exclusion of his debtor, the true owner. If, then, the defender was not liable, no one was, unless, indeed, a case of liability against the magistrates could be established; but at common law, at anyrate, the magistrates were not liable, the solum of the pavement being, as was admitted, the property of the defender's debtor and within his bond. But (2) a heritable creditor in the position of the defender was liable, if through his negligence in the management of the property of which he had assumed the rights of owner another was injured.² (3) The last question was, Had the Glasgow Police Act removed this liability? It had not. The vesting clause, sec. 289, of the Act had not done so. That section merely vested streets in the Board of Police "for the objects and purposes of the Act"; and of the objects and purposes relating to pavements the most important were to be found in section 326. That section shewed that until a pavement had been taken over by the board the liability of the owners of houses remained.

Argued for the defender;—(1) At common law the magistrates of a burgh, as custodiers of the public streets within the burgh, had the duty to the public of seeing that the streets were kept in proper repair, and were liable in damages if a member of the public was injured through neglect to keep a street in repair.³ (2) In any case, the defender, as heritable creditor in possession, was not, as in the present question, in the position of owner of the subjects. He was owner as in a question with the tenants, so as to give him right to collect the rents, but quoad ultra he was not owner.⁴ (3) In any event, under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the defender was not liable. Shamrock Street was a public street, and under section 289 of the Act all public streets were vested in the Board of Police, upon whom, under sections 279 and 310, lay the duty of seeing to the maintenance of such streets, subject only to "the obligations hereinafter imposed on the proprietors of lands and heritages." These obligations in regard to pavements were to be found in sections 317 and 326; and the sound construction of these sections was, that until a pavement was taken over the adjoining proprietor was under certain pecuniary obligations, on receiving notice from the Master of Works, to see that the pavement was maintained in a proper state of repair. But until he received such a notice the proprietor had neither the right nor the duty to interfere with the pavement. The Board of Police, being charged with the duty of seeing that the pavement was properly maintained, were alone liable, as in a question with the public, for the safety of the pavement.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages for personal injuries from a fall on the pavement in Shamrock Street, Glasgow. The pursuer alleges that the fall was caused by the pavement being in a condition dangerous to foot-passengers. She says that the defender is liable because the pavement in ques-

That relation was that the defender, being a bondholder, had in virtue of his bond entered into possession, to the exclusion of the owner, and was exercising all the rights of proprietor. Proceeding, as she does, at common law, the pursuer alleges that the ordinary liabilities of a proprietor are incumbent on a person so acting, not of course by reason of the bond but by reason of the exercise of rights under the bond. The liability alleged is for damages owing to the defender having neglected to keep the footway in safe condition for foot-passengers, who admittedly had a right to go over it.

Factor.

So viewed, I consider the case of the pursuer to be well laid, and the question seriously in dispute is whether the Glasgow Police Act of 1866 has not relieved the proprietors of all ground now forming part of the pavement of any public street in Glasgow of liability for its dangerous condition as a footway. This depends on the terms of the statute. It may be freely conceded to the defender that it would have been a natural enough thing for the statute to have done what they say it does,—that it would be much simpler to have the municipality liable for all pavements, rather than only for some, especially where the alternative obligants may be a number of proprietors. On the other hand it is of course clear that, unless the statute effects a transfer of liability, the common law liability remains.

The section which at first sight supports the defender's argument is the 289th—the vesting clause. But this section bears at the outset the qualifying words “for the objects and purposes thereof” (which must mean of the street) “and of this Act,” and, especially in relation to roads and streets, such words are not too readily to be assumed to effect a transfer of all the rights or liabilities of property. Their effect seems rather to be to give so much of a title to the board as is necessary to get over legal difficulties which might otherwise arise in the way of their effectuating the powers specifically conferred upon them.

The section which most directly treats of the subject in dispute is the 326th, and I consider it to be practically decisive. It deals with pavements in public streets—which is exactly what we have to do with in this case. If any such pavement is in bad order, the board is authorised to put it in thorough good order; the cost of this work is to be recovered from the parties liable to maintain such pavement; and, once this is done, the pavement is to be maintained by the board as part of the public streets of the city.

Now, two things are here made clear,—first that, where the pavement in a public street is bad, the liability to repair it is (apart from the procedure here contemplated) on certain parties, other than the board; second that, after the prescribed procedure, the pavement, which theretofore had been repairable by those parties, is to be maintained by the board. The implication of the latter part of the section confirms (had that been needful) the assertion of the first part; and the result is that the board are not liable until the prescribed procedure has been adopted, and that until the board so becomes liable, the liability remains where it was originally.

Applying the clause to the case in hand, when the accident occurred, this street had not been renewed by the board, and therefore the event had not occurred after which the board is declared liable to maintain it; the duty of maintaining was therefore not on the board but on the “parties” referred to in the section, and no other party can be suggested as liable but the proprietor.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the defence on the Glasgow Police Act fails, and that the pursuer has a good case to go to trial.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action of damages, based on alleged culpable neglect by the defender of his duty to repair the foot-pavement of a street in Glasgow called Shamrock Street, in consequence of which the pursuer, while walking on it, was tripped by a loose flagstone, fell, and was hurt. The position of the defender inferring the duty which he is thus sued for neglecting, to the pursuer's damage, is, that he was at the time of the accident, and had been for about four days before it, judicial factor on a trust (the trustees having failed); that an item of the trust property consisted of a debt of £4500 secured by a bond and disposition in security over a tenement in Shamrock Street adjoining the defective pavement; and that the creditor in the debt and holder of the security having entered on possession (many years ago), the tenement was occupied by tenants under him and his successors—trustees or judicial factors—the defender being such factor at the date of the accident.

The defender says in his defence that Shamrock Street is a public street, vested by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, in the Board of Police, to whom and their subordinates is committed the duty of seeing that it is kept in proper repair, and thus safe for public traffic. He admits that, under the provisions of the Police Act, the board might have required him, at any time after his appointment as judicial factor, to execute such repairs on the pavement opposite the tenement as they pointed out and specified in their notice as necessary or proper in their judgment, and that neglect to obey such requisition would have been neglect of duty on his part, involving responsibility for the consequences, including liability in a penalty under the Act. But he maintains that it was the duty of the Board of Police, and their officers appointed for the purpose of performing it in the public interest, to observe the effects of the constant tear and wear of the street, and of damage that might from time to time be done to it, whether accidentally or mischievously, and to judge when repairs were necessary or proper to be executed; what these were, and at what times (with due regard to the convenience of the public traffic) they might be executed; that it was not his duty to give his attention to the condition of the street, or to employ others for that purpose; or to judge when repairs were needed, what they were, and when it was proper to execute them. He maintains that there was no common law duty upon him to repair the pavement in question, and that no statutory duty to do so existed except on a requisition by the board, or its proper officer, which admittedly was not made.

The Lord Ordinary took this view of the defender's position, and the consequent absence of any duty on his part, without notice and requisition by the police officials; and in his opinion to this effect, with the reasons given for it in his note, I concur.

I have not collected from the judgments just delivered by your Lordship in the chair and the Lord Justice-Clerk that you are of opinion that any duty to repair is imposed by the statute (the Glasgow Police Act, 1866), on the defender or any other who is, by the definition clause of the Act, to be regarded as a proprietor of lands and tenements adjoining a public street, in the absence of notice and requisition by the police authority. Your Lordships' opinion, as I understand it, is, that by the common law, irrespective of the Act, a duty to keep in a safe state of repair the foot-pavement of a public street is upon anyone who is infest in the solum thereof, whether as proprietor or in security of debt, if, in the latter case, he has entered into possession on his security, and that the statute has not removed this common law duty, or affected the common law liability for neglecting it. And if such duty exists at the common law, I should not differ from your Lordships in holding that it is not removed by an enactment in the statute that the police authority may, in case of neglect, require it to be performed. But I know of no authority for the proposition that it exists. The statutory duty to repair, on notice and requisition from the public authority in charge of the street, is not imposed on the proprietors of the solum of the street or pavement, but on the proprietors of the lands and houses "adjoining," whether they are proprietors of the solum of the street or not. Indeed, the language of the statute shews clearly enough that private property in the solum of the street itself is not a thing which was contemplated, or, if of possible existence (which I doubt), regarded as a matter of any account or materiality. Nor is this surprising when the fact is considered that the streets dealt with are public streets, of which private proprietors (if such exist) of the solum could make no use whatever except as members of the public, and in common with all other members of the public.

Baillie v.

Factor.

As I understand the opinion of common law duty and liability, which I am now examining, the property which is regarded as the foundation of that duty is property in the solum of the public street, which may not be in the proprietor of the adjoining lands and tenements, and frequently is not. When it is not, would the proprietor of the adjoining tenements, executing repairs on the requisition of the police authority, or paying for them, have relief from the proprietor of the solum of the street or pavement, on the ground that he was liable at the common law, and his liability not affected by the Act? Or supposing the repairs so executed, according to the specification and under the supervision of the police authority, were inadequate, and left the pavement in an unsafe condition, would the party with sasine in the solum be liable at the common law for the consequences?

But is it a true proposition that the proprietor infest in the solum of a public road or street vested in, and in charge of, a public body, possibly not as property, but as a public road or street, is under a duty at the common law to keep it in repair, and, in the public interest, to give attention to its condition? That a private owner shall be obliged, at the common law, to see to the state of his property, and to take care that it shall not fall into dilapidation, by which the safety of those who are legitimately on it or in its neighbourhood shall be endangered, is a true and reasonable proposition; but that it applies to anyone who has an infestment in the solum of a public road or street in charge of a public authority is, in my opinion, unreasonable and untrue.

I should, but for the opinions of your Lordships, have thought it clear that the public streets of Glasgow, when vested in the Board of Police, were entirely removed from the possession of all private persons, whatever their feudal title in the solum, assuming that any such title could for any practical purpose survive the statutory vesting in the board. Such proprietors could thereafter exercise no proprietary right in the solum of the street, or take any possession or use of it other than was enjoyed by the public at large. The streets, whether foot-pavement or causeway, thus stand in marked contrast to the lands and tenements adjoining, which are not vested in the board, and remain in the possession, for use and occupation and all purposes, of the private owners exactly as before. The Police Act seems to take account of this when it puts the duty of obeying the board's orders for repairs and alterations, and paying the cost of them, not on the owners of the solum of the streets to be altered and repaired, but on the owners of the adjoining lands and tenements, who, as such, are certainly under no common law duty in the matter.

What I have said regarding the impossibility of private possession of public streets, or any possession of them other than use by the general public, is, I think, usefully illustrated by the case before us. The defender is judicial factor on the estate of a creditor for lent money secured by a bond and disposition in security on property situated in a public street. Now, it is admitted, and clear without admission, that a creditor with heritable security incurs no liability with respect to the subject of the security unless he shall enter upon the actual possession and occupation of it. The creditor here, or those in his right, did enter upon the possession and occupation of the tenement of houses, which they let to tenants, and so incurred liability accordingly with respect to it. But did they enter upon the possession and occupation of the public street, whether pavement or causeway? I assume that the title and infeftment of the debtor who granted the security extended over the solum of the street which his tenement adjoined, but he was either never in possession of the street itself, or was deprived of it so soon as it was vested in the Police Board as a public street, and so could give no right to his creditor to take possession of it. Now, what did the creditor, or anyone in his right, do in the matter of entering upon possession of the subjects of the security which was not according to his right, whether or not his debtor's title and infeftment included the solum of the street, and whether or not the security extended to that solum? Nothing whatever, for to enter upon the possession and occupation of that solum was impossible. The proposition, then, regarding the common law duty and liability in question in the case of a creditor who accepts a security over a house in a public street seems to be this, that he will incur that duty and liability if his security extends over the solum of the street, and otherwise not, so that he may avoid it without any diminution of or prejudice to his security if his man of business is wary enough to see that it does not, which is, of course, easily enough done. The proposition that the incurring or avoiding of a very serious responsibility and liability depends upon a conveyancing technicality of the flimsiest character, I cannot assent to.

I had, I confess, thought that all highways in this country, including public streets in burghs (which are highways), are vested in public bodies on behalf of the public, to the exclusion of all proprietary rights therein, so long as they continue to be highways. I do not refer to the possibility of underground rights, and indeed have no occasion to notice them. A proprietor of adjoining land, built on or not, may think, and justly, that the road or street opposite his ground is in a dangerous condition, but he can do nothing more, as of right, than call the attention of the proper public authority to the matter, and possibly take legal proceedings to compel such authority, if negligent, to do its duty. Such proprietor has, I think, clearly not only no duty, but no right, at his own hand to meddle with the road or street. He may, no doubt, do so in the confident belief that the public authority will make no objection to what he does, but this is not right or duty.

It was argued to us that there is a distinction between pavements which have been "taken over" by the Board of Police, and those which have not, and there is a distinction no doubt, but, I think, clearly not with respect to the question I am considering. Any public board charged with the duty of seeing that streets are kept in good repair for public traffic must be furnished with the means of executing that duty, and whether this is done by giving them the power to command the requisite work and labour without payment, or to raise money to pay for it has no bearing that I can see on the common law duty and obligation of persons having sasine in the solum. To the public body is committed the duty of attending to the condition of the street, and seeing that such repairs as they judge to be needful are executed, whether by their own contractors or those whose work and labour they are authorised by the Act to command. The circumstance of being taken over or not does not affect the character of the streets and pavements as vested in them on behalf of the public and devoted to public traffic, to the exclusion of every private proprietary right, as I think, and certainly to the exclusion of any conceivable exercise of such right. Who may be called upon to execute or pay for the work which they specify as in their judgment proper to be executed, is matter of statutory enactment, and is independent of any rule of the common law.

Baillie v.
Shearer's Judicial Factor.

The action is, as I have pointed out, laid upon culpable neglect of duty by the defender, and must go to trial, if we sustain the relevancy, upon an issue of such culpable neglect of duty. His only duty was as a judicial factor appointed by this Court. He belongs to a profession from which we generally or frequently select persons for such an appointment, and the neglect of duty attributed to him is, that, unwarrantably relying upon the watchfulness and judgment of the Board of Police and their subordinates, and that they would duly inform him whenever the pavement in question needed repair, and they thought proper to sanction operations on it (which they alone could do), he failed, immediately on his appointment, to satisfy himself that it was in good repair, and to call the attention of the board to the fact that it was in disrepair if he found it to be so, and to request their authority to repair it. This seems, on the statement of it, to be a practical enough and commonplace enough matter, and I doubt if any sensible and experienced member of the defender's profession would on that statement impute neglect of duty to him. Should a jury, under the direction of a Judge, think otherwise, and find that he did culpably neglect his duty, and so must pay damages to a sufferer from his neglect, I more than doubt whether he would not have to bear the consequences himself. I do not, at least at present, see how damages paid by a factor for actionable neglect of his duty could be sustained as a fair and proper charge in his factorial account. To sustain the relevancy of the action, and send it for trial on some other ground than neglect of duty by the defender, seems to me impossible. The estate which this Court has entrusted to the management and administration of the defender may be liable to make good the consequences of the misconduct or neglect of some other than himself, as, for instance, the owners of that estate. But no such case is averred. It is well settled that the mere fact of ownership without violation or neglect of an owner's duty will not support an action of damages. Again, the estate in the defender's hands may be liable for some actionable neglect or wrong by persons properly employed by him in its management, say, house factors. But such a case would require to be distinctly averred. House factors may possibly be regarded as carrying on a distinct independent business, as much so as, say, cattle-drivers, so that they, and not their employers, are responsible for their misconduct or neglect in the course of their business. Nor could I countenance the notion that house factors employed to collect rents and attend to the condition of house property are to be held as undertaking to see to the condition of the public streets in which the houses stand, and to take care that they are kept in repair, so as to be safe for public traffic. They may be, and I think are, bound to receive and pay due attention to notices and requisitions from the public authorities under the Police Act, but this is by statute, and not by the common law.

I think the action, if the pursuer has a good ground of claim, which possibly she has, is directed against the wrong party, and that the Lord Ordinary's judgment dismissing it ought to be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

I do not attribute any importance to the fact that the defender was appointed only a few days before the accident. It was not alluded to in the argument from the bar, and I am not surprised. The defender represents his predecessors the trustees, and up to the value of the factory estate he incurs the same liabilities.

I need hardly say that I assume that the footway is within the title of the defender. If it be not there is an end of the case. But I understood from the bar that they were satisfied of the fact, and that their argument proceeded on the assumption of its truth. I concur with your Lordship in holding that the trustees and the defender as their representative were bound by the common law to keep the footway in such a condition as should be safe for those who used it.

LORD ADAM.—I understand that it is not disputed that the street in question in which the accident happened is a public street in the sense of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866.

Now, it is provided by the 289th section of that Act that every public street, for the object and purposes thereof, and of that Act, shall vest in the board, that is, on the passing of the Act.

It appears to me that one of the objects and purposes of the Act was the maintenance of the public streets by the board, and accordingly the Act provides for the appointment of an officer, the Master of Works, whose duty under the 279th section of the Act is, inter alia, to enforce the provisions of the Act with respect to the maintenance of the streets, including foot-pavements, and that, no doubt, includes the duty of seeing that the streets are kept in proper repair.

I do not doubt that, prior to the passing of the Act, the duty of maintaining the foot-pavements in proper repair lay upon the adjoining proprietors, and if any accident happened in consequence of their failure to perform that duty, they would have been liable in damages to the person injured. But if, as I think, the Act has vested the duty of maintaining the streets in the board, I think the effect of that is to divest the adjoining proprietors of that duty. I do not think that it was the intention of the Act that the board and the adjoining proprietors should both be charged with the same duty.

I think, therefore, that but for the subsequent clauses of the Act, the proprietors would have been, after the passing of the Act, under no obligation or duty to maintain or repair the foot-pavements adjoining their lands.

Having thus, as I think, laid the duty of maintaining the streets upon the board, the Act, section 310, provides that, subject to the obligations thereafter imposed upon the proprietors of lands and heritages, the board shall make provision for maintaining the public streets in a suitable manner.

The Act, therefore, lays upon the board the duty of maintaining the streets in a suitable manner, subject only to certain statutory obligations imposed upon the proprietors.

The first of these is to be found in the 317th section of the statute, which enacts that the Master of Works may, by notice given as therein provided, require any proprietor of land or heritage adjoining any public street from time to time to alter, repair, or renew to his entire satisfaction foot-pavements in such street opposite to such land or heritage, except where the foot-pavements have been taken over by the board; and the second of these obligations is to be found in the 326th section, which enacts that on a report by the Master of Works that the foot-pavement of any street is in a defective and unsatisfactory state, the board may direct that the foot-pavement of such street be renewed by the Master of Works, and that the expense thereof should be payable by the parties liable to maintain such pavements, and be recoverable by the board as damages, and that thereafter all such pavements be maintained by the board as part of the public streets.

The result, in my opinion, is this, that after the passing of the Act, the duty of maintaining the streets in a suitable manner,—that is in a proper state of repair,—was imposed upon the board; and that the only duty or obligation which thereafter lay upon the adjoining proprietors was the statutory duty of from time to time altering, repairing, or renewing, or, in other words, maintaining the foot-pavements when called upon by the board, and of paying the cost of renewing the foot-pavements when the street was finally taken over by the board.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

But if I am wrong in my view of the statute, then I think that the defender is liable at common law.

LORD KINNEAR.—There were only two questions which we were asked to consider in the argument before us, in which the relevancy of the action was challenged on two grounds. In the first place, it is said that as the defender represents heritable creditors he is not liable for this accident as being the proprietor of this pavement, assuming that as proprietor he would have been liable. Then, secondly, it is said that any liability which might have attached at common law has been dissolved, or has been transferred to the Glasgow Board of Works, by the operation of the Glasgow Police Act. In considering these questions, I assume that the pavement on which the accident happened is part of the property held by the defender under his title. I understood that that assumption was conceded in the discussion of the case before us.

I do not understand that any claim is made against the defender personally in respect of any neglect committed by him after the date of his appointment as judicial factor. The date of the appointment was 7th December 1892, and the accident took place only a few days afterwards on the 11th December, and it is not suggested that anything done or omitted to be done by him during that interval contributed to the accident. But the argument of the pursuer is founded on the averment that the trustees whom the defender represents were in possession of the subjects under a decree of maills and duties since June 1882. If that be so, I do not think that the fact that the defender possessed as a heritable creditor affects his liability, if the liability of the owner is well founded otherwise. The liability of the owner of property to maintain the property in a safe condition does not, in my opinion, depend on his mere title as owner, but on his possession of the property on the footing of an owner, and, accordingly, I think that a heritable creditor is not put in the position of being liable to maintain the subjects disposed to him in security merely by recording his bond. But the case with which we have here to deal is that of a heritable creditor who in virtue of a decree of mails and duties is in possession of the subjects, and is in the enjoyment of the rents and produce to the exclusion of the titular owner. I think therefore that the defender is liable on the footing of being the owner of these subjects.

The next question is, whether, if the owner of the property is liable at common law to maintain it in safe repair that liability is determined or transferred by the operation of the Glasgow Police Act. On this question I agree with your Lordship. It does not appear to me that the vesting clause of the Act either determines the liability previously existing on the owner or transfers that liability to the Board of Police. It does not transfer the pavements or streets, so far as they are private property, to the board; it transfers to the board all rights and powers which are required for the due execution of the purposes of the Act, and accordingly it is necessary to see what are the purposes of the Act and the duties which it imposes on the Board of Police. In order to determine this I think that we must look at the subsequent sections of the Act which settle what are the duties of the Board of Police, and also those which fix the conditions on which liability is transferred.

Now, the 317th section certainly does impose a duty on the Police Board of seeing that the owners of property maintain the foot-pavements opposite their property in a proper state of repair. But we must here assume that the person who is thus under the duty of repairing the pavement is already subject to a common law liability to keep that pavement in repair. I do not question that there may be owners of property who are not under such a liability, because their titles may not include the pavement. But the question here is whether the Act, by conferring a title on the Board of Police to see that the owners of property keep the pavement in repair, has the effect of relieving the owners from their common law liability in damages to persons who have been injured through neglect to keep the pavement in repair. Now, I cannot see that an active title in a public body to compel a person to perform his duty is inconsistent with the continuance of liability in that person to those who may have been injured through the neglect of that duty. On the contrary, the coexistence of the two rights appears to me to be perfectly consistent.

Therefore, in order to see whether the Act determines the liability of owners to persons injured at common law or transfers it to the Police Board, I think that we must go further, viz., to the section which prescribes the conditions on which liability to keep a pavement in repair is to be transferred to the board. That section is the 326th. It provides—(His Lordship read the section). It appears to me that that clause expresses two things, and that with very reasonable clearness. The first, that liability to maintain a pavement is transferred to the board after the pavement has been put into a state of proper repair in accordance with the terms of the clause, but not sooner; and secondly, the clause assumes a liability attaching to the owners to keep the pavement in repair previous to the date at which the pavement is taken over in terms of the Act. It appears to me, therefore, that, as the pavement in question was not put into repair in the sense of the 326th section, it has not been taken over by the Board of Police, and consequently that the defender has not been relieved of his common law liability to maintain the pavement in repair, or of his liability to damages to the pursuer if she has been injured in consequence of his neglect to perform his duty of keeping the pavement in repair.

LORD TRAYNER.—The difficulty I have felt in this case arises from the defender's peculiar relation to the property in question. I hesitate to affirm that a heritable creditor lawfully entering into possession of his debtor's subjects, in pursuance of his rights as heritable creditor, thereby renders himself liable in a proprietor's obligation quoad the subjects possessed. I take it for granted that the mere obtaining of a decree of mails and duties, and exercising the rights which such a decree confers, would not impose on the heritable creditor the owner's obligations. It is said the defender here has done more—that he has extruded the owner and taken entire possession of the subjects as if they were his own. But if the defender in this case has done more in the way of possessing or managing the property than he could or should have done under his decree of mails and duties, he may be responsible to account therefor to the owner of the subjects. I doubt whether he incurs any other responsibility. I do not, however, on account of the doubt which I entertain, dissent from the result which your Lordship in the chair has reached.

On the import and effect of the clauses in the Glasgow Police Act as bearing upon the question at issue, I concur in the opinion of your Lordship.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to his Lordship to proceed.

Right in security—Pledge—Agent and Principal—Ship—Bill of lading.—Page & Company obtained an advance from a bank, upon the security, by way of pledge, of certain merchandise then afloat, and handed the bill of lading to the bank, blank indorsed, it being agreed that the bank should have immediate and absolute power of sale of the merchandise. Subsequently the bank returned the bill of lading to Page & Company (without further indorsation or other marking to shew that the bank had any interest in the bill), with a letter bearing that the bank transferred to Page & Company, as trustees for the bank, the bill of lading, and authorising Page & Company to obtain delivery of the merchandise on arrival and to sell it on the bank's behalf. Page & Company sold the merchandise upon a contract in their own name to Cross & Company, and handed them the bill of lading. Cross & Company having paid part of the price, Poynter & Company, creditors of Page & Company, arrested the balance in the hands of Cross & Company upon the dependence of an action against Page & Company in which decree in absence was ultimately pronounced.

In a competition between the bank and Poynter & Company for the balance of the price, held (diss. Lord Young) that the bank by retransferring the bill of lading to Page & Company, the owners of the merchandise, lost their real security over the merchandise, which thus became the unburdened property of Page & Company ; and consequently that Poynter & Company having arrested the balance of the price for a debt due to them by Page & Company, were entitled to be preferred.

ON 1st April 1892 Charles Page & Company, merchants, Liverpool, applied to the North-Western Bank, Limited, Liverpool, for an advance of £5000 "upon security by way of pledge of 3455 tons phosphate rock" then on board the ships "Cyprus" and "Storra Lee," and represented to be of the nett value of £6733.

The bank agreed to make the advance upon the following conditions, as embodied in a letter by them to Page & Company, dated 4th April :—
"We now beg to put in writing the conditions on which we advance to you the sum of £5000, say five thousand pounds, repayable by you on or before 1st June, on the security of the undermentioned merchandise [the two cargoes], which you pledge to us and warehouse in our name.

"It is distinctly agreed that we are to have immediate and absolute power of sale, and under that power we authorise and empower you to enter into contracts for the sale of the merchandise, on our behalf, in the ordinary course of business, and we expressly direct you to pay to us from time to time the proceeds of all such sales immediately and specifically as received by you, to be applied towards payment of the said advance, interest, commission, and all charges.

"You are at any time at our request to give to us full authority to receive all sums due or to become due from any person or persons in respect of any sales of the merchandise so made by you on our behalf.

"You are to insure the merchandise against all fire risks on our behalf, and you undertake to keep it fully covered, to hold the policy in trust on our account, and in case of loss, to collect and pay the insurance money to us in the same manner as proceeds of sale."

Page & Company assented to these conditions, and in pursuance of the agreement thus concluded sent the bills of lading for the phosphate rock to the bank blank indorsed.

The "Cyprus" (to which alone the action to be mentioned related) was destined for Glasgow as her port of delivery, and was expected to arrive there on or about 12th April.

On 12th April the bank wrote to Page & Company,—
"In consideration of your undertaking to deal with the merchandise in the manner hereinafter specified, we transfer to you, as trustees for us, the bill of lading, &c., for 1629 tons phosphate rock per 'Cyprus,' marked , which we now hold as security for payment of the advance specified at foot, and we request you to obtain delivery on our account of the merchandise referred to in such bill of lading, and warehouse the same in our name, you paying the freight and expenses of discharge. We further authorise and empower you to enter into contracts for the sale of the merchandise on our behalf, in the ordinary course of business, and we expressly direct you to pay the proceeds of all such sales from time to time to us immediately on receipt thereof, in order to be applied towards retirement of such advance." The letter then concluded in terms identical with those of the two last paragraphs of the letter of 4th April above quoted.

Page & Company on the same day replied,—
"We have sold for you 1629 tons phosphate rock ex 'Cyprus' in your name, and held by you by way of pledge for phosphate advance No. 7, for £5000, and for which b/lading has been handed to us for the purpose of enabling us to complete the sale which we have contracted for on your behalf with Messrs A. Cross & Sons, Glasgow ; and in consideration thereof we hereby undertake to pay to you the proceeds of said sale, payment expected about 5th

May, immediately and specifically as received, in accordance with the directions contained in your letter of April 4th." No. 95.

Some months prior to the arrangements with the bank for the advance Page & Company had sold to A. Cross & Sons, mentioned in the preceding letter, about 1600 tons of phosphate rock, almost the same quantity as that on board the "Cyprus" (1629 tons). This sale was effected through John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, who had for several years been Page & Company's agents in Glasgow. The sale-notes, which were dated 23d September and 19th November 1891, and did not specify any particular lot of phosphate rock, bore that the sale was a sale to Cross & Sons by Page & Company "per John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds."

Bank,

Poynter, Son,
& Macdonalds.

Immediately on receiving the bill of lading for the "Cyprus" cargo back from the bank Page & Company forwarded it to Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, with instructions to hand it to Cross & Sons on arrival of the vessel. This Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds did; and on the bill of lading and their contract of sale with Page & Company, Cross & Company took delivery of the cargo, and by cheque dated 13th April in favour of Page & Company, they paid £1000 to account of the price.

On 3d May Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds arrested the balance of the price (£1039, 7s. 5d.) in the hands of Cross & Sons, on the dependence of an action by Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds against Page & Company, in which decree in absence for £2011, 10s. was subsequently pronounced.

On the same day, but after the arrestments had been laid on, the bank intimated to Cross & Sons that they claimed payment of the balance of the price, on the ground that the phosphate rock had before the sale been their property, and had been sold on their behalf.

The bank then raised a multiplepoinding in name of Cross & Sons in the Sheriff Court, Glasgow, the fund in medio being the balance of the price.

The bank and Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds each claimed the whole fund in medio.

The bank pleaded;—(1) The sale to Messrs Alexander Cross & Sons having been made by Messrs Charles Page & Company on behalf of the claimants, the claimants are entitled to be preferred in terms of their claim. (4) The transfer of the bill of lading to the claimants, the North-Western Bank, having operated a conveyance ex facie absolute to these claimants, they were entitled to retain the goods represented by the bill of lading till repayment of all advances by them to the common debtors at the date of the transfer of the bill of lading and subsequent thereto, and they are entitled to be preferred to the fund in medio as a surrogatum for said goods.

The bill of lading, as redelivered by the bank to Page & Company, bore no indication that the bank had any interest in it, and neither Cross & Sons nor Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds knew anything about the connection of the bank with the bill of lading until after the arrestment.

On 18th April 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), after a proof, which was mainly directed to points in the case not now reported, ranked and preferred Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds to the fund in medio.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The effect of Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds' arrestment is the only remaining question, and here the case is very similar to Tod & Son v. Merchant Banking Company, 1883, 10 R. 1009. It differs perhaps in so far as the nature of the transaction on which the bank founds is here defined ab ante by the bank's letters of 1st and 4th April, but I doubt whether that is a material difference. Now these letters give the bank right to do that very thing which, according to the opinions in Tod's case, would have

The bank appealed, and argued ;—The transfer of the bill of lading by Page & Company to the bank transferred the property in the phosphate rock to the bank.¹ If, then, the bank, in the exercise of the power of sale which their contract with Page & Company gave them, had handed given the Merchant Bank a preference over the arresting creditor, namely, to require buyers of the hypothecated goods to pay the price to the bank. Lord Shand says (page 1020) 'The bank had their security in such a shape that they might have refused to allow delivery of the goods till they got bills or other obligations for the price. . . . Having waived this right they were simply in the position of having parted with their security over the goods which had been sold by the owners,' &c. These words are applicable, mutatis mutandis, to this transaction in phosphate rock. Page & Company were the owners of it in any view which can be taken, for, on the face of it, the bank's right is just a security. The bank no doubt was ex figura verborum their principal, as a pledgee with an immediate power of sale, and they were in the same way agents for the bank. I do not understand, whatever may be the effects of the documents devised for the protection of the bank, that Page & Company were agents in selling for the bank in the sense intended by the Lord President in the case cited (p. 1018), when it is clear that agents selling for a principal having an absolute property title are intended. Nor is it clear from the opinions what the result would have been if Messrs Bryant had stood in such a position to their creditor.

"The difference between property and security titles in questions of this kind is very important. You may have the possession separated from the property, so that the possessor has a subordinate title flowing from the proprietor, e.g., there may be a bona fide sale to A B, who may lease the thing sold to the possessor. The right of property remains in A B. But you cannot have a security over moveables constituted by a written contract without delivery. The higher right of property may be vindicated although possession has been given to a hirer or lessee ; but the lower security title cannot be maintained without possession. There is no pledge without possession. If a pledgee delivers up the goods and titles to the owner his security ceases, and no written agreement validates such a security without possession. If the owner being in possession of goods, and/or titles, sells in his own name, then, although he may be bound to account to the security-holder, the price is due by the buyer to the owner, and not to the security-holder. The latter cannot, as in the case of a true principal and agent, disclose himself and claim the price in a question with the owner's creditors.

"Whatever may be the effect of the pledge or hypothecation to the bank, it is a pledge of the phosphates, and no attempt has been made in argument to maintain that it affects the price. Indeed the power reserved to the bank to require payment of the price direct to itself indicates that they knew that that was necessary to their complete security, just as was held in Tod v. Merchant Banking Company. They therefore fail to prove that Messrs Cross & Sons at the date of the arrestment were debtors, not to Page & Company, the common debtors, but to them. The money was due to Page & Company, and was subject to no lien or burden in favour of the bank, Messrs Cross & Sons not having undertaken and not being called upon or bound to pay to the bank. If in truth and reality, or even in title, the bank had been owners of the phosphate cargo, I do not doubt that they could have demanded payment from Messrs Cross & Sons direct, subject to any equities which they as buyers might have against Page & Company. But an arrester in the hands of Cross & Sons has no greater right than Page & Company themselves. He stands in their shoes, and can succeed only by shewing that they and not the bank are true creditors of Cross & Sons. That I think Messrs Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds have done."

the bill of lading to an independent agent, empowering him to sell the goods, it was clear that they could have vindicated the price, even although at the date of the sale they were undisclosed principals.¹ It made no difference that the bank employed Page & Company as their agents instead of an independent person. The contract under which Page & Company got redelivery of the bill of lading and effected the sale was a perfectly legal contract of trust or agency, and would have been effectual had the question arisen with a trustee in bankruptcy of Page & Company under the Act 1696, cap. 5.² There was no principle upon which a pledgee, making the pledgor his agent to sell the goods,—handing them to him for that purpose,—must be held to have thereby lost the benefit of his pledge. Page & Company's only title to receive the money was their contract of agency with the bank, and having thus got the bill of lading and received the money for a specific purpose, the money was distinguishable from their own private funds, and was not open to the diligence of their creditors.³ Tod v. The Merchant Banking Company was distinguishable. In that case Bryant, Ridley, & Company, who corresponded to Page & Company here, did not, like Page & Company, occupy the position of agents of the pledgees, and the case of their being such agents was distinguished from the actual case before the Court.⁴ If Tod's case was intended to rule the case in which the pledgor received back the subject of the pledge as the agent of the pledgee, then the decision ought to be reconsidered.

Argued for Poynter, Son, and Macdonalds;—The contract of pledge depended on the possession, actual or constructive, of the goods pledged, and if the pledgee parted with the goods to the pledgor, his real right of pledge determined, and his remedy, if he had any, was a personal right of action against the pledgor.⁵ Therefore, by retransferring the indorsed bill of lading to Page & Company the bank parted with their possession of the goods to the pledgors, and so lost their right of pledge. It was said, however, that the transfer of the bill of lading to the bank by Page & Company passed the property in the goods to the bank. If that were so, then the retransfer by the bank to Page & Company must have retransferred the property to Page & Company. But it was a mistake to say that the transfer of a bill of lading passed the property in the goods represented by it. The authorities which were founded on to shew that it did were English authorities, and meant no more than that the "special property," as it was called, passed. It was clear that the transferee of a bill of lading did not become proprietor of the goods to all intents and purposes; he was not, merely as transferee, liable in an action by the shipowner for freight.⁶ [LORD TRAYNER referred to Craig & Rose v. Delargy, July 15, 1879, 6 R. 1269, and observed that it was a case of doubtful authority.] It depended on the contract upon which the bill of lading was transferred whether the property in the goods in the full sense passed. If it was sale it did. Here it was pledge. The transfer of the bill consequently merely transferred such possession to the bank as was necessary to sustain their right of pledge; and the retransfer of the bill of lading terminated that possession, and with it the right of pledge. When, then, Page & Company sold to Cross & Sons they sold

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Charles Page & Company in April 1892 obtained a loan from the North-Western Bank, Liverpool, giving by way of pledge two cargoes of phosphate rock then on the sea, one in a vessel the “Cyprus,” which alone is in question here. Page & Company handed the bill of lading blank indorsed to the bank. The bank stipulated for absolute power of sale, and authorised Page & Company to sell the pledged goods on behalf of the bank. About a fortnight after the transaction the bank transferred the bill of lading for the “Cyprus” cargo back to Page & Company, “as trustees for us,” in consideration of their undertaking to deal with the merchandise as stipulated, the stipulation being that Page & Company were to sell “on our behalf,” and that the bank should have the same rights to the price obtained as under the previous letter.

Page & Company forwarded the bill of lading to Poynter & Company, who were their regular agents in Glasgow. These gentlemen had some months before sold for Page & Company 1600 tons of phosphate rock, being just about the “Cyprus” cargo. On Page & Company receiving the bill of lading from the bank they forwarded it to Poynter & Company to be handed to Cross & Company on the arrival of the “Cyprus.” Cross & Company took delivery of the cargo. Page & Company were largely indebted to Poynter & Company, and Poynter raised an action, and on the dependence arrested a sum due by Cross for the cargo of the “Cyprus.” Both the companies of Poynter and Cross were ignorant of Page’s transaction with the bank.

The competition here is between the bank and Poynter & Company. The bank maintain that the bill of lading, being indorsed and delivered, constituted a deposition of the goods, and that is so. But it is so only to the effect contained in the contract between the parties. The bank did not become owners of the goods, but only pledgees, stipulating that they should have power of sale, and that Page & Company should in selling sell for them and pay them the proceeds. The bank’s case is that they were in the ownership of the goods, and that Page & Company in selling were only their agents selling to Cross & Company. But this can only be maintained if the written contract is ignored. Its express words indicate that the bank receive the bill of lading as a security only for an advance. The property therefore remained with the pledger, and was only burdened with the bank’s right under their contract. The real question is, what is the effect of the bank parting with the bill of lading, as the symbol of the goods afloat, to Page & Company the owners? Did they or did they not thereby part with the security they had received? I think they did, and I do not think it matters that they did so on the statement that Page & Company received “in trust.” It was the bank’s pledge that they parted with, and Page & Company, the owners, having sold to a third party, I hold that Page & Company sold their own property, and did not in doing so act as agents for the bank. The bank therefore cannot claim the fund in medio as being part of the price of their property sold to Cross & Company. They had a security only, and they parted with that security. They had ceased to have possession to validate their security. They therefore are not in a position to shew that at the date of Poynter’s arrestment Cross & Company, the buyers, were debtors to them and not to Page & Company. Not having possession, they are therefore just in the same position as other creditors of Page & Company, and Poynter & Company having secured a preferable right by arrestment of this balance of the price of Page's goods, are entitled to prevail. I consider it clear that this question has already been conclusively decided. I am quite unable to distinguish this case from that of Tod (10 R. 1009), and I am therefore in favour of sustaining the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

North-Western Bank,
Limited, v.
Poynter, Son,
& Macdonalds.

LORD YOUNG.—The fund in medio consists of the unpaid balance of the price of certain quantities of phosphate rock sold by Page & Company of Liverpool to Cross & Sons of Glasgow, the nominal raisers of the multiplepounding. The sales were made on 23d September and 19th November 1891 before the goods were shipped from abroad to this country, and so were not at first sales of specific goods. They were eventually shipped per "Cyprus," and the bill of lading was sent by Page & Company to Cross & Company on 12th April 1892, and delivery thus made to the buyers, who thereafter paid the price except the balance of £1039, which is the fund in medio and the subject of competition.

The competitors are the North-Western Bank, Liverpool, and Poynter & Company, Glasgow. The claim of the former (the bank) is based on a transaction between them and Page & Company on 1st and 4th April 1892, before the arrival of the "Cyprus," but when the bill of lading was in Page & Company's hands, the terms of which are fully and distinctly stated in their condescendence and claim. The truth in point of fact of the statement is not disputed, nor I think disputable, on the documents which are produced and printed in the appendix. The import of the transaction is twofold, viz., first, that the goods specified in the bill of lading were pledged to the bank for a present advance of £5000 by delivery of the bill of lading; and second, that the bank appointed Page & Company to be their agents for the sale of the goods, and delivered the goods to them as such agents by delivering to them (handing back) the bill of lading with instructions, which they undertook to execute, to sell on their account and pay them the price.

In pursuance of this second head of the transaction Page & Company sent the bill of lading to Cross & Company in implement of the general sales of September and November preceding which I have already noticed, of the same date writing to the bank the letter informing them of the fact. The price, except the balance now in medio, was paid by Cross & Company to Page & Company, and remitted by them to the bank according to their undertaking. They subsequently became embarrassed and made a settlement with their creditors—all we know of the settlement being that it does not affect the competition for the fund now in medio.

The North-Western Bank claim it as the price of goods pledged to them and sold on their account by their agents for sale.

Poynter & Company, on the other hand, claim it as assets of their debtors Page & Company, attached by them by the arrestment of 3d May 1892, proceeding on a depending action in which they obtained decree on 21st June 1892.

There is no fact in dispute between the parties, the competition between them depending on the legal question whether the unpaid balance of price in the hands of Cross & Company is estate and assets of Page & Company, available for the payment of their general debts, and attachable by their creditors accordingly. If it is, then Poynter & Company, whose debt and arrestment are admitted facts, must prevail, and otherwise not.

This, the only question in the case, turns upon the legal validity of the contract between Page & Company and the North-Western Bank. As to the original validity of the first part of it, viz., that by which the goods were pledged to the bank with delivery and power of sale, there is I understand no dispute, and certainly, in my opinion, no room for dispute. But it is maintained by Poynter & Company that this was destroyed, and the pledge thereby constituted annihilated by the second head of the contract and what followed upon it, viz., the redelivery of the goods to Page & Company as the bank's agents for sale. It is contended that Page & Company were thereby restored to their original position of owners in possession, freed of the pledge, which could not survive after the pledgees parted with possession. The conclusion of course is that the second, the agency part of the contract, is invalid and inoperative except only as effecting utter destruction of the first, and so leaving the parties exactly as if there had never been any contract between them regarding these goods.

The Sheriff adopts this view as sound in law. He says,—“There is no pledge without possession. If a pledgee delivers up the goods and titles to the owner his security ceases, and no written agreement validates such security without possession. If the owner being in possession of goods or titles sells in his own name, then, although he may be bound to account to the security-holder, the price is due by the buyer to the owner, and not to the security-holder. The latter cannot, as in the case of a true principal and agent, disclose himself and claim the price in a question with the owner's creditors.”

These observations assume, or rather perhaps assert, as a true proposition in law, that a pledgee cannot legally appoint the pledger his agent for the sale of the subject of the pledge, or at least not with the same effect and consequences as he may a stranger. Is this a true proposition? If it be, it is certainly important that it should be authoritatively announced, for the occasions must be of frequent occurrence in which it is expedient to select the pledger as such agent. What is the objection to it in principle or expediency? So far as the parties who agree to it and so contract are concerned, there is plainly none. Nor, so far as I see, can it possibly concern the purchaser whether the agent who sells to him and gives him delivery is the pledger or a stranger. He gets all he can claim equally in either case, and incurs no liability or risk in the one case more than the other. The only other parties who can be suggested as possibly interested are the pledger's general creditors. But it does not occur to me how they can be prejudiced by the pledgee selling the goods and making delivery to a purchaser through the pledger rather than through a third party acting as his agent. The goods immediately in question would have been sold and delivered to Cross & Company through a stranger agent employed by the North-Western Bank just as they were by Page & Company. How are the creditors prejudiced by the employment of Page & Company for this purpose so that the law should, from regard to their interests, deny (to the prejudice of the bank) the ordinary consequences and effects which would have attached to a similar employment of a stranger to do precisely the same thing, and doing precisely the same thing?

I must therefore reject the view that a pledgee with possession and power of sale is hindered by any rule of the common law from selecting and employing the pledger as his agent for sale with the same safety to his own interests as if he so employed a stranger. The common law has on the one hand such regard for the legitimate interests of general creditors that it will not sanction any contract or proceeding to their prejudice, but will not I think, on the other, favour a subtle argument against a fair and reasonable transaction only to give them an advantage by reason of its not being made in another form. Here the North-Western Bank are seeking nothing which they might not admittedly have attained by employing a stranger agent, and as the creditors of the pledger to them suffered nothing and were exposed to no risk whatever, by their so employing the pledger, I can find no reason—none in the fair interest of the creditors—for denying the ordinary legal effect to that employment and what was done under it. I am therefore of opinion that the contract between the North-Western Bank and Page & Company ought to have effect according to its terms, which are clear and, I think, reasonable, and involving no prejudice whatever to others.

North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds.

The result of these views, if sound, is that the unpaid price of the goods in question is not estate or assets of Page & Company. It is of course true that an agent for sale entrusted with possession of the goods or document of title, whether so appointed and entrusted by the owner or by a pledgee, is thereby put in a position to dispose of the goods exactly as if he were himself the owner, and so to give a good title to a third party dealing with him onerously and in bona fide as the owner, and such third party will not be prejudicially affected by the fact of the terms of the agency of which he is ignorant. Such agent with possession may, and I rather think generally does, transact with third parties in his own name just as if he were owner and principal. But the notion that goods so delivered to an agent at once become estate and assets of his, which will as such pass to his trustee in bankruptcy for behoof of his creditors, or be subject as such to the diligence of individual creditors, is, in my opinion, unfounded. Again, if he sell and deliver to a purchaser, it follows, I think, clearly, that the price is not estate and assets of his any more than the goods themselves were before the sale. The buyer is in safety to pay the price to him, and he may possibly appropriate it unwarrantably to his own use to the prejudice of his principal. But with a written contract of agency under which he admittedly received and disposed of the goods, it is impossible to say that he had no principal and was not an agent. The case before us does not involve any question of the buyer's right to withhold payment of the price on a claim of retention, or otherwise on the footing that he had dealt with the seller as a principal holding the document of title, and was not to be prejudiced by the subsequently disclosed fact that he was only an agent. No question of that character can arise with a trustee in bankruptcy or an individual arresting creditor.

Here it is not doubtful that Page & Company meant to act under their contract of agency with the bank, and did so in fact and avowedly—remitting the price so far as paid to their principals. Suppose that the balance (now in medio) had been paid to them also, and that, abstaining from the wicked and indeed criminal act of appropriating the money to their own use, and from the irregular and reprehensible act of mixing it with their own funds, they had paid it into an account in bank opened by them for the reception of the price of goods sold by them as agents for the North-Western Bank, in that case would the money in this account have been regarded as their estate and assets, and so open to the diligence of their general creditors? But in the hands of Cross &

No. 95. Company the money is as clearly ticketed and identified (indeed more so) as the price of goods sold by them as agents for the North-Western Bank.

North-

Bank,
Limited, v.
Poynter, Son,
& Macdonalds.

The Sheriff has decided the case upon the footing that there is nothing in the position of Poynter & Company to distinguish them from any other general creditor of Page & Company, and giving them an interest in the fund in question, and right to arrest it, not possessed by the others, and in this I entirely concur with him. The case was, I think, properly argued on that footing. Poynter & Company had no contract or dealing with Page & Company regarding the goods sold, except only acting as their brokers in the sales and delivery to Cross & Company. As regards their debt, for which they used arrestment, these goods have no other part in it than this—that their charge for brokerage or commission for the sale of them is an item, and a trifling one, in the general account on which it stands.

I appreciate the difficulty which the Sheriff expresses of distinguishing this case from that of Tod & Son (10 R. 1009)—although the circumstances in Tod's case are not so clear and simple as those here. But I am unable to regard that decision as a conclusive authority either for the general proposition that a pledgee cannot deliver the subject of the pledge to the pledger on any lawful special contract without the destruction of the pledge—or for the more limited proposition that such delivery on a special contract of agency for sale will operate such destruction. A contract of agency for sale is in itself as lawful as any other—as lawful for example as a contract for use, such as hire or lease, or the execution of repairs or other work, or a contract for carriage. There are settled rules of law, founded on sound principles, for the protection of third parties dealing onerously and in bona fide as to property with the party in possession of it, although he may be only an agent or trustee, and to these I have sufficiently adverted. A pledgee will be exposed, just as an owner will, to all the risks which these rules may bring upon him, but I see no ground for thinking that the risks are greater in his case, and indeed no reason for thinking so has been suggested, except the assumption that he cannot give possession to the owner upon any contract however lawful without the destruction of the pledge, and this, holding the opinion which I have expressed, I must reject.

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action of multiplepounding raised by Cross & Sons, the fund in medio in which consists of a sum slightly exceeding £1000. There are two claimants for this fund—The North-Western Bank, Limited, Liverpool, and John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, of Glasgow. The question debated before us, and the only question to be now determined is, which of the claimants is entitled to be preferred to the fund in medio. The material facts out of which the question arises are not in dispute.

On 1st April 1892 Charles Page & Company, of Liverpool, applied to the North-Western Bank for an advance of £5000 “upon security by way of pledge” of two cargoes of phosphate rock belonging to them, and then afloat, represented to be of the nett value of £6700. One of these cargoes was on board the ship “Cyprus,” and it is with it only that we are here concerned. The bank agreed, by letter dated 4th April 1892, to make the advance required, on these conditions,—that the advance was to be repayable on or before 1st June; that it was made “on the security” of, inter alia, the cargo on board the “Cyprus” “which you pledge to us,” and that the bank should have immediate and absolute power of sale. In respect of that power the bank by the same letter authorised Page &

Company to enter into contracts for the sale of the pledged goods "on our behalf," and directed them "to pay to us from time to time the proceeds of all such sales immediately and specifically as received by you to be applied towards payment of the said advance," &c. The bank further stipulated that Page & Company should at any time on being required give the bank full authority to receive all sums due or to become due from any person in respect of any such sale. No such request was ever made.

Poynter, Son,
& Macdonalds.

In pursuance of the arrangement thus made between the bank and Page & Company, the latter delivered to the former the bill of lading blank indorsed for the cargo on board the "Cyprus."

Some months prior to the date of the arrangement with the bank for the advance of £5000 Page & Company had sold to Cross & Company, of Glasgow, about 1600 tons of phosphate rock, which was as nearly as possible the quantity of the cargo on board the "Cyprus." This sale was effected through Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, who were then, as for years previously they had been, the agents in Glasgow for Page & Company, and the sale-notes bore that the sale to Cross & Company was a sale by Page & Company, "per Messrs John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds." The "Cyprus" was destined for Glasgow as her port of delivery, and was expected to arrive there on or about 12th April 1892. On that date the bank wrote to Page & Son in the following terms:—"In consideration of your undertaking to deal with the merchandise in the manner after specified, we transfer to you as trustees for us the bill of lading, &c., for 1629 tons phosphate rock per 'Cyprus,' which we now hold as security for payment of the advance specified at foot," i.e., the advance of £5000. The letter goes on to authorise Page & Company to sell the cargo "on our behalf," and makes the same stipulations as to their right to the price, &c., as expressed in the letter of 4th April to which I have already referred. The bill of lading thus returned by the bank to Page & Company was immediately forwarded by them to Poynter & Company, with instructions to hand it "to Cross on arrival of the vessel." Poynter & Company did so, and on that bill of lading and their contract of sale before mentioned Cross & Company took delivery of the cargo. They paid part of the price by cheque dated 13th April 1892 drawn in favour of Page & Company. The balance of the price forms the fund in medio.

Page & Company being largely indebted to Poynter & Company, the latter (having reason to doubt the pecuniary position of Page & Company) raised an action against Page & Company, and obtained decree against them for a debt of over £2000. On the dependence of this action they arrested the balance of the price of the "Cyprus" cargo in the hands of Cross & Company on 3d May 1892. It only remains to be noted that at no time prior to the date of the arrestment had Poynter & Company or Cross & Company any knowledge of the transaction between Page & Company and the bank, or of the pledging of the cargo to the latter in security of their advances to Page & Company. The bill of lading sent by Page & Company and delivered through Poynter & Company to Cross bore no indication of the bank having interest therein.

In this state of the facts the legal question arises, whether the bank, as pledgee of the cargo, or the arresting creditor of the pledgor is to be preferred in competition to the balance of the price of the cargo still in the buyer's hands. The answer to this question seems to me to depend in a great measure upon the view which is taken of the bank's rights in or to the cargo of the "Cyprus." If the property in that cargo was vested in the bank, and that cargo was sold for them by their agent to Cross, the bank must prevail. The fund in medio is in that case part of the price of the bank's property. If the property of the cargo was not in the bank it was in Page & Company (it could only be in one or other of them), and the fund in medio due to Page & Company was well attached by the arrestment of their creditors. Accordingly, the first thing to be considered is, what right in the cargo in question was conferred on the bank by the transaction between it and Page & Company? Now, there is no room for doubt as to what the contract between the bank and Page & Company was. It was an advance of money on the security of a pledge. "We advance to you," wrote the bank on 4th April 1892 to Page & Company, "the sum of £5000 repayable by you on or before 1st June on the security of the undermentioned merchandise which you pledge to us." To make the right of the bank effectual "the merchandise" had to be delivered to them, which could not actually be done, the merchandise being then afloat. But the bill of lading for the goods was indorsed and delivered, and that was equivalent to the delivery or depositation of the goods which it represented. It was maintained in argument before us that the indorsation and delivery of a bill of lading transferred in all cases the property in the goods to the indorsee. But this is clearly not so. The delivery of an indorsed bill of lading is in all cases equivalent to delivery of the cargo or goods to which it refers, but the right conferred by such delivery depends upon the contract under which it is delivered. Accordingly, if one buys a cargo afloat, the indorsation and delivery of the bill of lading is equivalent to delivery of the goods sold, and passes the property therein to the buyer. If the contract, however, be pledge, not sale, then the delivery of the indorsed bill of lading completes the contract just as if the goods themselves had been deposited with the pledgee, but gives the pledgee no greater or higher right to the goods than delivery of the subject of pledge to the pledgee gives him. That being so, the right which the bank acquired by the indorsation and delivery of the bill of lading in question was the right of a pledgee and nothing more. According to the law of England, as I read the authorities, the delivery of goods in pledge confers on the pledgee what is called a special property therein, while the general property remains in the pledgor. We have no such distinction in Scotland, at least in terms, but the rights of a pledgee in the subject of the pledge seem to be very much the same in the two countries. In both the contract of pledge can only be completed by delivery of the subject of the pledge to the pledgee; the pledgee's right is to hold that subject against all concerned until the advance or debt, of which it is the security, shall have been paid, but the property of the thing pledged (in the proper sense) remains in the pledgor. That the property of the pledge remains vested in the pledgor is clear from this fact, among others which might be mentioned, that he may sell the pledge to anyone he pleases, and on any terms, subject to the burden of the pledgee's right. The pledgee cannot prevent or object to such a sale. Nor can the pledgee sell the pledge (at least in Scotland) at his own hand. The subject is not his, it is the pledgor's, and therefore the pledgee cannot exercise the right of an owner by selling; to sell the pledge he must have judicial authority. The right of the bank therefore was not a right of ownership. It was only a burden on the owner's right. It follows that the bank cannot claim to be preferred to the fund in medio on the ground that it is the price of the bank's property.

Does the bank's right as pledgee entitle them to be preferred? is the next question. I have already pointed out the character and extent of the pledgee's right, and have now to consider how that right is preserved or lost. On this question the Sheriff-substitute in the judgment under review says,—“ There is no pledge without possession. If a pledgee delivers up the goods and titles to the owner his security ceases, and no written agreement validates such a security without possession.” I agree with that statement of the law. It is in strict accordance, I think, both with the law laid down in our text writers and in our decisions. Of the former I may cite Erskine, iii. 1, 33, and Bell’s Comm. (7th ed.) ii. 22, and of the latter the case of Tod & Son, 10 R. 1009. The question was raised in the course of the debate before us, whether the pledgee could not part with the subject of the pledge temporarily for any necessary purpose, or put it into the hands of some other person for safe custody, without the loss of his right, and if so whether the pledgee in this case had lost his right by handing over the pledge to the owners in order to its realisation and consequent repayment of the advance due to the pledgee. I do not find this question attended with any difficulty. That a pledgee may part with the pledge temporarily for a necessary purpose or for safe custody without the loss of his right may be admitted, provided he has not so parted with it to the owner. If he parts with it to a third party, the temporary possession of the latter is possession for the pledgee; he has no right in or to the subject except that which the pledgee gave him and which the pledgee may at any time take away. But if the pledgee parts with the pledge to the owner the result is that the owner resumes possession of his own property freed from the security burden; the owner acquires no new right, but the pledgee’s right as a real right flies off, leaving him only his personal right against his debtor. This distinction between the delivery of the subject of pledge to a third party and to the owner is recognised in the passage in Bell’s Commentaries which I have already cited.

North-

Poynter, Son,
& Macdonalds.

I do not think it really affects the case to say that the bank gave back the subject of pledge to Page & Company “ in trust ” for the bank. The bank could only give in trust what it had to give. It had no right of property or ownership to give “ in trust.” It could only make Page & Company its trustees for the security right. But when Page & Company sold the cargo they sold their own property, under an obligation no doubt—a personal obligation—to account to the bank for the security right or its value in cash. But having sold what was their own the price was theirs, and if theirs then subject to the diligence of all their creditors, the bank included. In like manner I can see no ground for recognising Page & Company as the mere agents of the bank in the sale of the cargo. An agent sells for his principal the property of the principal. But here the alleged principal had no property to sell. His only right, after parting with his real right, was a personal claim for debt. The supposed agent did not sell either the one right or the other. To support the claim of the bank in this case would really be to recognise a security over moveables, the possession of which was with the debtor. Such a mode of security our law does not recognise as effectual.

The case therefore comes to this : The bank had no right of ownership or property in the cargo in question, and therefore cannot claim the fund in medio as the price of their property ; they lost their real right of pledge by giving up the subject of the pledge to the owner of it ; by surrendering their real security they retained only their personal right to demand payment of their advances from their debtor or his estate, but other personal creditors (namely, Poynter &

No. 95. Company) of the same debtor have secured a preferable right to that part of the debtor's estate which is in medio by arrestment.

North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment appealed against should be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that by sale-notes dated 23d September and 19th November 1891 Charles Page & Company, Liverpool, sold to Alexander Cross & Sons, Glasgow, a cargo of phosphate rock on the terms therein mentioned; (2) that the said cargo, or part thereof, was shipped on board the s.s. 'Cyprus,' and that a bill of lading was granted by the master of said steamer therefor, and that the same was held by the said Charles Page & Company; (3) that on 1st April 1892 Charles Page & Company applied for an advance of £5000 from the North-Western Bank, Limited, on the security by way of pledge of, inter alia, the cargo per the 'Cyprus,' and that on 4th April the said bank agreed to give, and did give, the advance asked for in the terms contained in the letter; (4) that the said Charles Page & Company delivered said bill of lading to the North-Western Bank, Limited, blank indorsed, and thereby pledged the said cargo to the said bank; (5) that on 12th April 1892 the said bank redelivered the said bill of lading to Charles Page & Company without any indorsation by the bank by the letter No. 13/5 of process, and that on same date Charles Page & Company forwarded said bill of lading to the claimants John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, for delivery to the buyers, Alexander Cross & Sons, on arrival of the 'Cyprus'; (6) that the said Alexander Cross & Son duly received said bill of lading and took delivery of said cargo, and made payments to account thereof, and that the balance of the price due by them amounted, as at 3d May 1892, to £1039, 7s. 5d., being the fund in medio; (7) that on 3d May 1892 the said sum of £1039, 7s. 5d. was validly arrested in the hands of the said Alexander Cross & Sons by the claimants John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds, who were lawful creditors of the said Charles Page & Company to the amount of £2011, 10s., with interest and expenses, conform to decree in their favour; and (8) that at the date of said arrestment John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds were ignorant of the transaction between Page & Company and the bank above mentioned: Find in law that at the date of said arrestment the said sum of £1039, 7s. 5d. was a debt due by Alexander Cross & Son to the said Charles Page & Company, and was therefore liable to the diligence of the lawful creditors of the latter, and that the claimants, the North-Western Bank, Limited, by delivery of said bill of lading on said 12th April 1892, lost their rights as pledgees of said cargo, and had no preferable right of property therein entitling them to payment of said sum as in competition with the arresting creditors, the said John Poynter, Son, & Macdonalds: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor appealed against," &c.

Ship—Charter-party—Charterer's right to freight earned for deck cargo.—Where a charter-party binds the shipowners to carry a full and complete cargo for a lump sum, the charterer is not entitled to any freight which the ship may earn by goods stored on deck.

ON 1st February 1893, by a charter-party, of which the material portions are quoted below,* G. H. Wills & Company, shipowners, of ^{2D DIVISION.} ^{Sheriff of} Lanarkshire.

* "It is this day mutually agreed between G. H. Wills & Company, of the good steamship called the 'Castro,' of the measurement of 725 tons nett register or thereabouts, bound Stockton, now 'Elba', guaranteed 1400 tons d. w. cargo outwards, and 1550 tons d. w. cargo homewards if d. w. cargoes provided, and Burrell & Son, of Glasgow, merchants.

"That the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Glasgow, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load, from the factors of the said merchants, a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise, which the said merchants bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture: and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Trinidad and Demerara, to discharge and reload at Demerara and/or Trinidad to London, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there deliver the same on being paid freight, as follows:—Lump sum fourteen hundred and twenty-five pounds (£1425) for the round voyage, charterers paying all expenses on the round, excepting coals, wages, stores, victualling, and insurance, ship giving use of winches, winchmen, and maintaining steam. All repairs, damage, &c., to steamer for owners' account.

"The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, strandings, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners.

"Ship not answerable for losses through explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or any latent defect in the machinery or hull, not resulting from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship, or any of them, or by the ship's husband or manager.

"The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchants' risk and expense.

"Steamer to have liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations, and to call at any port or ports for coals, and for other necessary supplies.

"Average, if any, to be settled according to York-Antwerp rules. The master to sign bills of lading, including negligence clause, at any other rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter. The freight to be paid as follows,—say £500 advance fourteen days after sailing, balance in cash on delivery of the cargo in London.

"Steamer to be loaded and discharged at all ports in thirty days (Sundays and holidays excepted), except in case of strikes, accidents to machinery, or other causes beyond charterers' control preventing the loading or unloading, and any days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at eighteen pounds per day, to be paid day by day as the same shall become due, it being agreed, that for the security and payment of all freight, dead-freight, demurrage, and all other charges, the said master or owners shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo.

"Charterers to have option of sending steamer into Barbadoes on outward voyage, paying £20 extra, also option of sending steamer into Barbadoes, Grenada, or St Vincent, after loading at Trinidad on homeward voyage, paying

 Feb. 2, 1894.
 Wills & Co. v.
 Burrell & Son.

The "Castro" performed the voyage and earned the stipulated freight of £1425. This sum Burrell & Son paid to Wills & Company, with the exception of a sum of £76, 18s. 11d., being the nett amount of the freight received by Wills & Company for carrying a quantity of pineapples which the master of the "Castro" had taken on board and stowed as a deck cargo at St Michael's, where the "Castro" had called to load bunker coal on the voyage home to London. Burrell & Son maintained that it was an implied condition of the charter-party that they should have the exclusive use of the ship for cargo during the voyage, and, consequently, that they were entitled to credit for this sum of £76, 18s. 11d.

Wills & Company thereupon brought an action against Burrell & Son, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, for payment of £76, 18s. 11d.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having, in terms of said charter-party, earned freight, they are entitled to decree against the defenders for the sum sued for as restricted, being the balance still due to them, with expenses. (5) The defenders having no power to load cargo at St Michael's; and, in any case, the freight for the pineapples having been earned through the labours of the pursuers, the pursuers are entitled thereto.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The freight collected by the pursuers for the St Michael's cargo having been earned for and on behalf of the defenders, they are entitled to credit therefor.

The defenders also had averments and pleas to the effect that they had suffered damage to at least the amount sued for by reason of the pineapples having been shipped on board, but this part of their defence was not seriously pressed, and there was no proof. They admitted that the pursuers had carried passengers on board during the voyage, and had received the passage-money without objection on their (the defenders') part.

On 23d October 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the true meaning and intention of the charter-party, the freight paid for the carriage on deck of the 'Castro' of pineapples from St Michael's, on the homeward voyage, is due to the shipowners and not to the charterers. Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders for the restricted sum of £76, 18s. 11d." &c.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—It was not maintained that under this charter-party there was a demise of the ship. The position of the defenders was that they had hired the whole of the ship, and were consequently entitled to her whole carrying capacity. What was here called freight was in reality a sum paid for the use and hire of the ship.¹ The defenders therefore might have loaded a deck cargo had they chosen. They were not bound to do so. A charterer who had hired the whole of a ship might load as much or as little cargo as he pleased, subject only to this qualification, that he must load as much as would enable the vessel to perform her voyage in safety.¹ The fact that the charterer had left some cargo space unoccupied did not give the master right to fill up the unoccupied space unless that was necessary for the safety of the ship. If the master did fill up the unoccupied space with other cargo he did so as the agent of the charterer, and was accountable to the charterer for the freight thereby earned.² The defenders therefore were entitled to the freight earned by carrying the pineapples.

Wills & Co. v.
Burrell & Son.

Argued for the pursuers;—Under this charter-party there was not, as the defenders conceded, a demise of the ship. *Meiklereid v. West*³ was an example of a case in which there was a demise of the ship, but the present case was similar to that of Sandeman v. Scurr,⁴ in which it was held that there had been no demise. That being so, the defenders were not entitled to load a deck cargo, the deck not being part of the ordinary carrying capacity of a ship.⁵ The case of the "Norway,"⁶ and *Robinson's*⁶ case, were distinguishable from the present. In these cases it was held that what was called freight was truly a sum paid for the hire of the ship; here freight was used in its strict sense of the sum paid for the carriage of a cargo on board ship.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that the claim made by the charterer in this action is quite untenable.

The charter-party in question cannot be regarded as amounting to a demise of the vessel. Some of its clauses are quite inconsistent with the idea of any such thing being contemplated, and indeed the counsel for the defenders admitted in the course of the debate that he could not contend that there had been a demise of the vessel, taking that phrase as it is usually understood. The view maintained for the defenders rather was, that they had hired the whole carrying space of the vessel for the round voyage, and that whatever was carried in the course of the voyage was carried for their benefit. The answer to that contention, however, which seems to me to be conclusive, is, that under such a charter-party as we have now before us the carrying space contracted for is only the usual carrying space below hatches. The deck is never regarded as carrying space to the use or benefit of which a charterer is entitled, unless specially stipulated for. It was not stipulated for in the present case, and therefore anything of the nature of cargo stowed and carried upon deck was not occupying space to which the charterers had any claim. If they had no claim to occupy the space themselves or with their own cargo, they can have no claim

But what is an equally conclusive answer to the defenders' demand is this, that they have got all they contracted to get for their lump freight, and must therefore pay the lump freight without deduction. What they contracted for was that the ship would receive a full and complete cargo at the loading ports named, and carry that cargo to the specified ports of delivery, while the owners guaranteed that the vessel would stow and carry to and from these ports deadweight cargo, if provided, up to a certain weight. That specified cargo was supplied by the charterers, and was received and carried by the vessel, and the defenders have no complaint to make on this head. They must therefore fulfil their counter obligation by paying the stipulated freight.

Feb. 2, 1894.
Wills & Co. v.
Burrell & Son.

I could have understood a claim for damages at the defenders' instance if the guaranteed weight of cargo had not been carried, or if the loading space below hatches had been occupied by goods taken by the master of the vessel to the exclusion of goods which the charterers had tendered for carriage, or if the carrying of the pineapples on deck had been to the injury of the charterers through delaying the arrival of their cargo, with consequent loss of market or fall in market price. No such ground of damage is seriously put forward, and certainly no damage has been established. But even if it had, it would have been a claim for damages for breach of contract which the defenders would have had, not a claim for freight. Freight they could not claim unless they were owners of the vessel, or were in the position of owners pro tempore by the demise of the vessel, and the defenders cannot claim either character. The authorities cited by the defenders have very little bearing upon the question here raised. In the case of "The Norway"—followed in the case of Robinson—it was decided that where a lump freight was stipulated for a single or a round voyage, the full amount was payable, although from a cause for which the ship was not responsible less than a full cargo was delivered. The opinion in the former case by Lord Justice Knight Bruce that the lump sum although called freight was "more properly a sum in the nature of a rent to be paid for the use and hire of the ship," must be read in connection with the special facts of the case in which it was delivered. The charter-party in "The Norway," 3 Moore, P. C. R. (N. S.), 245, expressly bore that the lump freight was "for the use and hire of the vessel." The charter-party in Robinson's case was not expressed in the same terms, but what was decided—and alone decided—in both cases, as I have already stated, was this, that where a lump freight was stipulated, that was due and payable without regard to the quantity of cargo delivered at the port of discharge. No question was raised or decided as to whether "the entire vessel" for which the rent or hire or freight was paid included more than the usual carrying space. That question could not have been raised in Robinson's case, L. R., 8 C. P. 465, for there was a distinct stipulation by the charterers for a right to carry deck cargo. A passage in Bell's Commentaries was also cited (i. 587). But that passage, I think, can only be read as applicable to the case of a demise of a ship, a phrase not used by Bell, but not used probably because the phrase was not in common use among Scots lawyers in his time. The passage, however, is descriptive of what is now called a demise of the ship, and correctly states the rights which are conferred on the charterer by a charter which amounts to a demise. But if Professor Bell uses the words "entire ship" as meaning something less than "demise" imports, the passage is still no authority in support of the defenders' claim. For reading "entire ship" as entire carrying space, that would not, according to recent authorities, include the deck. No. 96.

I think the judgment appealed against should be affirmed.

Reparation — Relevancy — Specification of fault — Defective hoist. — In an action of damages for personal injuries the pursuer averred that he had been sent by his employers to take delivery of goods at the defenders' premises; that in descending with the goods from the top flat by means of a hoist used for the conveyance of persons and goods, and in charge of an attendant in the defenders' employment, "the regulating power seemed to lose its control, and hoist and contents fell to the ground," and the pursuer was injured. The pursuer further averred,—"It was the duty of the defenders to see that the hoist was in a safe condition before allowing those using it in connection with their business to do so, and this they negligently failed to do. The hoist was not in a proper state of repair, or at all events was not running as it should have been, and this the defenders knew, or ought to have known, or at any rate could have discovered, had they made a proper examination thereof, or inquiries in regard thereto."

The defenders maintained that the action was not relevant, as no specific fault on the part of the defenders had been set forth.

Held that the action was relevant.

ROBERT OLIPHANT, a carter in Glasgow, raised an action of damages for personal injuries against Johnstone & Macleod, corset makers, Calton, Glasgow. 2D DIVISION.
Lanarkshire.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond 3) "At the date of the accident, and for some time prior thereto, the pursuer was in the employment of the Caledonian Railway Company, his duties being to deliver and take delivery of goods for the company." (Cond. 4) "On or about 23d June 1893 he was sent to defenders' place of business to receive certain goods to be taken by him to the company's station at Buchanan Street, Glasgow." (Cond. 5) "On arrival at said place of business the pursuer proceeded to the top flat of the building occupied by the defenders in order to obtain delivery of the goods which he had been sent for, and in order to reach said top flat he stepped into a hoist used for the conveyance of persons and goods from the ground flat thereto, and which was in charge of an attendant in defenders' employment." (Cond. 6) "After obtaining delivery of the goods for which he had been sent, and depositing them in the hoist to be taken to the ground flat, the pursuer stepped into said hoist along with said goods, and the same having been set in motion by the attendant, they began to descend, and went all right until they reached the second flat, when the regulating power seemed to lose its control, and hoist and contents fell to the ground with such terrific speed that on reaching it the pursuer was not only thrown out, but the hoist rebounded to the top flat and remained fixed there." (Cond. 7) "In consequence of the rapidity of the descent of said hoist, and the violence with which it came into contact with the ground flat, and the manner in which the pursuer was thrown therefrom, he sustained serious injuries." (Cond. 8) "It was the duty of the defenders to see that the hoist was in a safe condition before allowing those using it in connection with their business to do so, and this they negligently failed to do. The hoist was not in a proper state of repair, or at all events was not running as it should have been, and this the defenders knew, or ought to have known, or at anyrate could have discovered, had they made a proper examination thereof, or inquiries in regard thereto."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, (1) The action is irrelevant.

On 15th November 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) found that the pursuer had not stated a relevant case, and therefore dismissed the action.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—There was no onus upon the injured person in a case of this kind to aver what was the specific defect which caused the accident.¹ The occurrence laid the onus on the employer to account for it, and to prove that it was unavoidable.

Argued for the defenders;—The judgment was right. Practically all that the pursuer averred was that there was an accident, and he inferred from this that there was a defect which the defenders ought to have discovered. The case was ruled by Macfarlane v. Thomson,² in which the cases last cited by the pursuer had been explained, and in which it was held that the fact that an accident has happened will not raise a presumption that it was caused by a defect in the plant for which the master was responsible. That defect must be averred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt whatever that the pursuer's record is relevant as it stands, and that he is entitled to an issue.

A moulding-machine in a pottery was connected with the motive power supplied from a steam-engine by a drum being pressed on a revolving plate forming part of the mill-gearing. The drum and revolving plate, which were under the worker's bench, were accessible from three sides to persons wishing to clean the revolving plate.

A woman engaged at the machine, in cleaning the revolving plate while in motion (which she had to do from time to time), though aware of the danger, did so from the side where the edges of the revolving plate and of the drum were approaching each other instead of from the side where they were separating, and had her hand drawn in and crushed.

SARAH JANE BROUGH OR PRINGLE, wife of George Pringle, harness clipper, and George Pringle, as her curator and administrator-in-law, raised an action of damages at common law, or under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, or under the Employers Liability Act, 1881, against F. Grosvenor, pottery manufacturer, Eagle Pottery, Glasgow, for personal injuries sustained by the female pursuer when working at a machine in the defender's pottery.

2D DIVISION.
Lanarkshire.

The pursuers averred that these injuries were received through the fault, failure, and culpable recklessness of the defender or his foreman, inter alia, "first, in failing to have the machine at which the pursuer was working securely fenced to prevent access thereto or interference therewith while in motion; third, in imposing the duty of cleaning and attending to the said machine upon the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, having sustained loss, injury, and damage, through the fault, culpable, careless, and reckless conduct or negligence of the defender, or others for whom he is responsible, as condescended on, is entitled to damages and solatium at common law, or under the Factory and Workshop Acts,* or under the Employers Liability Act.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The injuries to the female pursuer not having been caused by the fault or negligence of the defender, or anyone for whom he is responsible, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (3) The injuries sustained by the female pursuer being caused by her own negligence, or carelessness, or at least such negligence having materially contributed thereto, she is barred from suing the present action.

A proof was allowed, and the following facts were established:—

Mrs Pringle was employed in the defender's pottery in moulding jam-pots at a Jolly machine. The frame of the machine, made of cast iron, stood about three feet from the floor, and was covered by a flat working table or bench, about four feet square. The machine was set in motion by the worker pressing with her foot a lever about four inches from the ground. This lever, when so pressed, brought a horizontal drum, underneath the bench and forming part of the machinery by which the mould was turned, into contact with a circular wheel or plate behind, which revolved perpendicularly, connected with the mill-gearing. The pressure of the drum against the revolving plate caused the drum to revolve, and thus caused the machinery of the Jolly machine to move. By removing the foot from the lever, the worker relieved the pressure. If the machine had been in perfect working order the drum would then have stopped, but as it was not, the contact was not entirely broken and the drum continued to revolve, though more slowly.

(3) Every part of the mill-gearing shall either be securely fenced or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced."

Sec. 96 provides,—"The expression 'mill-gearing' comprehends every shaft, whether upright, oblique, or horizontal, and every wheel, drum, or pulley by which the motion of the first moving power is communicated to any machine appertaining to a manufacturing process."

It was the usual custom in other potteries to have the drum and plate boxed in so that the worker could not tamper with them, and a man was sent round the works in order to remove the oil when it trickled down from the spindle between the plate and the drum. In the defender's pottery the machine was placed with one side to a wall. At the other three sides the revolving wheel and the drum were accessible to any person wishing to clean them. In front of the bench there was an upright board about eight inches broad, but it did not prevent access. It was part of the recognised work of the women in this pottery to clean the plate and drum when oil fell upon them, the effect of the oil being to prevent the drum gripping the plate. At the right hand side the revolving plate and the drum revolved inwards towards each other, so that any worker who happened to be cleaning the machine from the right hand side was exposed to the danger of having her hand drawn in between the drum and the plate. At the left hand side, which was equally accessible, there was not this danger.

On 22d September 1892, while the pursuer was cleaning the revolving plate and drum at the right hand side of her machine with a piece of waste, it was caught between the plate and drum, and her hand was drawn into the machinery and crushed. It was proved that she knew that it was dangerous to clean the machine from that side.

On 5th April the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer was on the 22d September 1892 engaged at a Jolly machine in the defender's works, and while engaged in cleaning with a piece of waste a certain plate and drum her right hand was drawn in and serious injuries sustained thereto: Finds that the system of defender was faulty: Repels the third plea in law stated for defender, and also the whole defences: Finds defender liable in damages; assesses these at the sum of £35."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—"The drum and revolving plate were not part of the mill-gearing. They were only connected with the mill-gearing proper when the strap was placed round the plate. The defender was then not within the Factory Acts. But assuming that the drum and plate were parts of the gearing, they were sufficiently fenced. "Securely fenced" meant fenced with safety to persons doing their proper work in the mill. No accident could have happened had not the pursuer been cleaning the machine on the dangerous side, a proceeding which, it was proved, she knew was fraught with danger.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—"The drum and plate, or, at all events, the latter, were "part of the mill-gearing." The motion of the first moving power was communicated by the revolving plate to the drum. They should then have been properly fenced in terms of section 5 of the Factory Act of 1878. The dangerous character of the cleaning was not so obvious that the pursuer could be held to have willingly exposed herself to the risk of an accident.² The defender had further contravened section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1878 in allowing the pursuer to clean the machinery. No. 98.

Feb. 3, 1894.
Pringle v.
Grosvenor.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is clearly proved that the women working in this factory had, as part of their regular and recognised duty, to clean the revolving disc which was the means of communicating motion to the machine. It appears that in other factories that is not permitted. It is also clear from the evidence that the revolving disc and the axle were part of the mill-gearing of the pottery. Such gearing required under the statute to be fenced. The question whether it was or was not fenced depends upon whether the board which stood upright in front of the table where the female pursuer was working was fencing. It may in a sense be called fencing, but it certainly did not fence that part of the gearing which might be dangerous if a person had to go near it in order to clean the machinery as the pursuer did.

It is said that the pursuer is not entitled to succeed because she cleaned the machine in a way dangerous to herself by going to the side where her hand might be drawn in.

It appears to me that that is just one of the things which the Legislature provided for by enacting that such gearing should be fenced. Here it is plain that the gearing was not fenced at a point where there was manifest danger.

But it is said on the part of the defender that he may have been in fault, but that the pursuer contributed to the accident by deliberately going to the side of the machine where the danger existed.

Now, I think the Legislature intended to provide not against a person putting the hand wilfully, deliberately, and intentionally into danger from mere wanton bravado or anything of that kind, but against a person committing a mistake,—the inadvertent mistake it may be,—of going to the wrong side of the machine and thereby sustaining injury.

I think that is quite sufficient ground for adhering to the Sheriff's judgment, and I do not express any opinion upon the question whether the defender was not also in fault in allowing the woman to clean this machine having regard to section 9 of the Act of 1878.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that the upright wheel formed part of the gearing and should have been fenced. It is also quite clear that it was not fenced, and that by reason of this statutory omission the pursuer was injured. She could not have been injured if the defender had performed his statutory duty.

I do not mean to say that if the pursuer had deliberately exposed herself to a known danger she might not be debarred from recovering damages. But there is no such case here presented. There may have been inadvertence, but that arose from the women in this factory being allowed to clean the machinery while in motion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion.

Process—Appeal for Jury Trial—Proof—Remit to Sheriff—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 40.—In an action raised in the Sheriff Court by a parish minister against the heritors for manse rent in consequence of their failure to provide a habitable manse, the defenders appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, and moved that the cause should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds in respect there was already pending before him a cognate cause under the Ecclesiastical Buildings, &c. Act, 1868. The respondent moved that the cause should be remitted back to the Sheriff. The Court, in respect that neither party asked for jury trial, and that the question to be tried was peculiarly appropriate to a local tribunal, remitted to the Sheriff.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Inverness-shire.

IN July 1892 the Reverend James Bain, minister of the parish of Duthil, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Inverness against the heritors of that parish for payment of £1000 as manse mail.

He averred that he had been elected minister of the parish in 1877, and that in 1884 he had been obliged to leave the manse, which had become uninhabitable owing to its condition of disrepair, its insufficient water supply, and its defective drainage, and also because of the noxious smells which pervaded the manse from its proximity to the churchyard, which was on a higher level, and was overcrowded and dangerous to health.

It appeared from the statements of parties that the pursuer had in 1890 presented a petition to the Presbytery praying that Court to order the heritors to put him in possession of a habitable manse, and had subsequently appealed to the Sheriff of Inverness, &c., under the Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act, 1868, and thereafter to the Lord Ordinary on Teind causes.* The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling), after obtaining reports from men of skill, had ordained the heritors to execute certain repairs and alterations on the manse and offices.

These repairs had not been finished at the date when Mr Bain raised this action.

The pursuer pleaded;—The defenders having failed to implement the obligations incumbent on them as heritors of Duthil to provide the pursuer with a habitable manse, are liable in manse rent, and decree ought to be pronounced against the defenders jointly and severally, or severally according to their respective liabilities, for the sum sued for, with expenses.

By interlocutor dated 27th May 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Blair) allowed a proof, and this interlocutor was affirmed by the Sheriff on 28th December 1893.

The defenders appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and argued;—The case should be remitted to Lord Stormonth-Darling to take a proof. There was already pending before him, as Lord Ordinary on Teinds, the appeal taken by the pursuer under the Ecclesiastical Buildings, &c., Act, which was concerned with practically the same matter as the present case. It had been held competent to remit to a Lord Ordinary in the case of Willing & Company,¹ and what had influenced the Court there was that a cognate cause was already pending in the Outer-House. The case was of too great magnitude to be remitted to the Sheriff, and besides, that course had been disapproved.²

No. 99.

Bain v.
Heritors of Duthil.

Argued for the respondent;—The case was peculiarly appropriate for trial by the local Judge, and should never have been brought to the Court of Session. The action pending in the Outer-House had no concern with the claim for manse rent for the years in question. The appellants admitted that their object in appealing had not been to obtain a jury trial, and the case should, therefore, be remitted back to the Sheriff.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion, on the whole, is that we shall best exercise our jurisdiction by dismissing this appeal and remitting this case back to the Sheriff. The action is one for a considerable sum, but at the same time the kind of question which has to be tried is peculiarly appropriate to a local tribunal, and the evidence is to be found in the place where the subjects are.

The appellants rest their appeal on one definite ground. They say that there has already been a good deal of procedure before a Lord Ordinary in a proceeding relating to the condition of this same manse. But then the appellants admit that this case must go to proof. Now, the procedure in the Outer-House to which they refer has not been of the nature of proof. Remits were made to men of skill and reports obtained—a mode of inquiry quite appropriate to the proceedings before the Lord Ordinary—and the Lord Ordinary has decided the matter upon these reports. But it is admitted that the case must be opened afresh and tried on evidence yet to be given. That being so, I am disposed to think that there is no such high convenience in sending the case to a Judge who has already had cognisance of the matters in dispute as there would at first sight appear to be, for his Lordship would require to divest his mind of the impressions formed in the course of the previous procedure.

I am also to some extent influenced by the consideration that if the case be tried in this Court before a Judge an appeal to the House of Lords on the facts would be competent; that, although not conclusive, has a legitimate weight. Accordingly I am not prepared to accede to the motion of the appellants that the case should be tried by a proof before the Lord Ordinary.

Now, neither party asks for jury trial; the appellants appealed for the definite purpose which I have discussed, and the respondent's motion is that we should dismiss the appeal. That last seems to me to be the proper course to take.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The appeal has been brought here under the 40th section of the Judicature Act. The object of that section is to enable the party appealing to obtain a trial by jury. But the appellant in this case, having come here, says that that was not the object of his appeal, but that the case ought to be tried by a Judge. And as the other side also say that a proof is the appropriate mode of trial, I think we are entitled to send the case for proof. If it had been truly an action of damages, there would have been more difficulty in not sending it to a jury. But that is not the nature of the case. The case is laid on the proposition that it is the duty of heritors to supply a habitable manse, and the action is for breach of that duty from 1884 onwards, and if that is established then there remains to be considered what is a fair rent during that period.

The question, therefore, is, assuming that there is to be a proof, who is to take it? To my mind the case ought never to have come from the Sheriff. It is entirely a question for a local inquiry before the Sheriff, viz., What has been the state of these subjects during a considerable period? In the whole circumstances, I think that the case ought never to have been brought up from the Sheriff, and that we should send it back.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am reminded by counsel that in a former case I had expressed an opinion unfavourable to the practice of remitting advocations—for this is really an advocacy though it is called an appeal—to the Sheriff. The ground of that opinion is that while the Sheriff Courts by their original constitution had unlimited jurisdiction in personal actions, the Legislature had thought fit to restrict that jurisdiction by providing that it should only exist concurrently with a right to either party to remove the case to the Court of Session for jury trial, if the case be of the value of £40. If the question were open, I should doubt whether this Court had the power in such cases to remit to the Sheriff. But it has been decided in a very authoritative way that this course may be taken. I agree that the circumstances of this case are such as to render it more suitable for investigation before the local tribunal rather than before the Court of Session, because of the entirely exceptional character of the case, and because of its affinity to cases arising under the Act 31 and 32 Victoria, cap. 96, in which the Judge is final on the facts. Neither party desires that the case should be sent to a jury, and we cannot, I think, be wrong in taking the course which will make the decision on the facts final, at all events, in the Court of Session.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

Entail—Provision to widow—Increase of provision after granter's death—Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87), secs. 1 and 3.—Although a bond of provision by way of liferent annuity granted under the Aberdeen Act by an heir of entail in possession in favour of his wife may not at the date of the granter's death be effectual, or may be effectual only to a limited extent by reason of the subsistence of similar bonds in favour of widows of prior heirs, it will become effectual (within the limits of the statute) as these prior bonds lapse.

the said annuity so provided to my said wife shall be restricted to a sum corresponding to the one-third of the free yearly rent or value of the said entailed lands and estate ascertained in manner foreshaid, or to such other sum as in the circumstances may be consistent with the terms and provisions of the said statute."

Mr Morison died on 10th November 1886, survived by his widow, Mrs Mary Weatherall or Morison, and by a son, Colonel Frederick De Lemare Morison, who succeeded his father as heir of entail in possession.

At the date of Mr Morison's death the entailed estates were burdened with a liferent annuity, granted under the Aberdeen Act for £1800 in favour of Mrs Catherine Young or Morison, the widow of a former heir of entail. On 29th October 1889, in a petition by Frederick De Lemare Morison for restriction of the amount of the annuity payable to his father's widow, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor restricting the annuity to £980 per annum, but reserving "to the said Mrs Mary Jane Weatherall or Morison her claim on the death of Mrs Mary Catherine Young or Morison, widow of the deceased Alexander Morison, to the full annuity of £1800 provided to her by the said bond."

Mrs Catherine Young or Morison died on 5th May 1893.

On 17th June 1893 Mrs Mary Jane Weatherall or Morison brought an action against Frederick De Lemare Morison, as heir of entail in possession, for declarator that the annuity payable to her under the bond of 1880 was £1800, payable half-yearly, beginning Whitsunday 1893, and for payment accordingly.

The parties subsequently by minute agreed that one-third of the free rental of the estate at the date of John Morison's death was £1580, assuming that the amount of the annuity to Mrs Young or Morison was included, and the pursuer restricted the summons to £1580 accordingly.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's husband had no power under the statute to increase the liferent to his widow beyond the one-third of the free yearly rent ascertained as at the date of his death, seeing that the liferent could not be, quoad the bond granted by him, a "former" liferent in the sense of the statute. (3) Esto that the pursuer's husband had power under the statute to provide an increase of her annuity on the expiry of a former liferent, such power could not take effect unless exercised by him. (4) In any event, the pursuer's husband having, by the terms of the said bond and codicil, irrevocably fixed the determination of the amount of her annuity, as at the date of his death, and not having provided for any subsequent increase thereof, and having made delivery of the said deeds, and having had them duly feudalised immediately thereafter, the measure of the pursuer's rights under the said bond falls to be taken finally as at the date of the granter's death.

On 24th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor decerning in favour of the pursuer.*

* "OPINION.—In this case I have given every consideration to the argument which was pressed upon me on behalf of the defender, but the result is that I have not been able to find grounds for holding that there is any obstacle, either upon the terms of the statute or upon the language of the bond of provision, to the pursuer making good her claim to the increased annuity which she now seeks.

"So far as the bond is concerned, I cannot doubt that its just construction is that the granter desired to give his widow an annuity of £1800, subject only to such restriction as the statute required. That is, I think, the whole scheme of the deed and the plain meaning of the language. The only question, therefore, in my judgment, is whether the statute permits an heir of entail to grant to his wife what has been termed an expanding annuity—that is to say, an

Morison.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The present case did not fall within the scope of section 3d of the Act. The pursuer's liferent was neither a "new liferent," as it had been in operation to the extent of £980 since Mr John Morison's death, nor a "former liferent," for a liferent could not be "former" with reference to itself. Assuming, however, that by "former" was simply meant "subsisting," what the statute said with reference to such liferents was that "the power of granting a liferent may be exercised so as to increase a former liferent to the extent hereinbefore authorised to be granted." Now, "the extent hereinbefore authorised to be granted" was "one-third part of the free yearly rent . . . after deducting," inter alia, "liferent provisions . . . all as the same may happen to be at the death of the granter." But the liferent provision in favour of Mrs Young or Morison was a liferent provision existing at the death of the granter here; the amount of that provision, therefore, did not become part of the free yearly rent, as in the present question, when the provision terminated. The amount of a widow's annuity under the Act was to be calculated as at the date of the husband's death, and was neither to be increased nor diminished by anything happening after that date.¹ The case of *Bonar*² was special, as there the prior annuity was not constituted under the Act. But (2) assuming that an heir in possession had power to provide for an expanding annuity in the way now proposed, that power had not here been exercised. Powers conferred by statute on heirs in possession under an entail, to be effectually exercised, must be exercised in the way pointed out by the Act, and must be actually exercised by the heir himself. It was not enough that the Court, proceeding on the ordinary rules of testamentary interpretation, should be satisfied that the heir in possession intended that the power should be exercised; his deed must either expressly or by necessary implication contain an actual exercise of the power by him.³ The present deed contained no such exercise. It is true that £1800 was mentioned as the amount of the annuity, but that was merely a random annuity which shall increase on the free rental as at the date of the death becoming enlarged by the lapse of some previous annuity. Now, of course, if that question depended on the language of the first section of the statute, it must be answered in the negative. No annuity could, according to that section, exceed one-third of the free rental as at the death of the granter. But the point really turns upon the terms of the third section of the statute, and that section, as I read it, makes an express exception from the general rule of the first section; that exception being in effect this, that in so far as the free rental at the death of the granter is diminished by a previous widow's annuity, such diminution shall not count against a succeeding annuity which is to begin to run or to be increased on the termination of the first.

"I am not, I confess, able to find any reasonable interpretation for the third section except what I have just stated. In short, it appears to me that the third section has effectually provided, inter alia, for the very case which has occurred here.

"I propose, therefore, to decern and declare in terms of the summons—as restricted—that is to say, for an annuity of £1580, being the amount fixed at the date of the death plus one-third of £1800 of which the estate has been disburdened by the death of Mrs Morison senior."

sum, and per se meant nothing. Then while the granter provided that the liferent should be in abeyance while there were two prior existing liferents, and also that it should not exceed one-third of the free yearly rental, there was nothing to suggest that once the annuity began to run it should in any event increase in amount, unless it was the general declaration that the annuity was granted "under all the conditions and limitations" contained in the Act. But that was far too vague and general to be regarded as an exercise of a power conferred by the Act.

Argued for the pursuer;—The leading purpose of the Act was to empower an heir of entail in possession to grant a liferent provision to his widow of not more than one-third of the free rental. If there was one prior subsisting widow's liferent, then the second was diminished so long as the prior liferent continued; if there were two prior liferents, then the third was in abeyance until one or other of the prior liferents lapsed. But the prior liferents were mere burdens on the later liferent, and as soon as these burdens were removed the later liferent increased automatically until it reached the highest amount permitted by the Act, provided, of course, that the amount of the liferent granted by the heir admitted of that. It was not necessary for the heir expressly to exercise the power to increase the liferent. All that was necessary for him to do was to specify the amount of the provision which he wished to grant, and if this sum exceeded what he was entitled to grant, either absolutely or pro tempore, then under the 7th section the liferent would be restricted absolutely or pro tempore to the amount permitted by the Act. Even if the Act merely created a power which the heir in possession must exercise if the liferent was to increase, the present deed contained, by clear implication, an exercise of the power.

LORD YOUNG.—This case raises an interesting enough question, but the Lord Ordinary has apparently decided it without much doubt or difficulty, and I must say that I have much sympathy with the views he has expressed in the note to his interlocutor.

I think that the plain meaning of the statute is, that if there are two subsisting liferents—by which I mean liferent annuities—in favour of the widows of two previous heirs of entail, then the granting of a third liferent annuity in favour of the widow of another heir of entail shall have no effect until one of the prior liferents shall have disappeared by the death of the annuitant. I think further that the statute intended that a liferent provision to a widow, granted according to the terms of the first clause of the Aberdeen Act, should be calculated with respect to the state of affairs which might exist, not only at the death of the granter of the annuity, but also with reference to the state of affairs which might exist at the expiry of one or both of the prior liferents. If there are two subsisting prior liferents on an estate, the grant of a third one can have no effect or validity so long as both the prior liferents continue, but it is clear that under section 3 of the statute this want of effect and validity ceases on the death of one or other of the prior liferenters, for otherwise the provisions of the statute would come to mean this, that if at any time two liferent annuities happened to be subsisting upon an estate, the grant of a third never could have any effect and validity. That is not the language of the statute. This is what the Act says,—“Provided always that where two liferents to wives or husbands, granted under the powers hereinbefore contained, shall be subsisting at any one time upon an entailed estate, it shall not be competent to grant a third liferent to take effect till one of the former subsisting liferents shall cease or expire." No. 100.

 Not that it shall not be competent to grant a third liferent at all, but that it shall not be granted with effect and validity until the death of one of the prior liferenters, the plain inference being that it then shall take effect and have validity. The deed granting the liferent is a living deed, although its operation is suspended in regard to the rents of the estate until the death of one of the prior liferenters leaves only one liferent annuity charged upon the entailed estate as an annuity under this Act. So also is it a living deed with reference to the sum provided as the amount of the annuity, although that is greater than one-third of the free rental of the entailed estate as at the death of the granter. The deed is not to have any effect at all while there are two widows of former heirs of entail drawing annuities from the estate, but if one of the annuitants dies, then it is to have effect, so far as relates to one-third of the free rental of the estate, after deducting the annuity paid to the other annuitant and the other deductions ordered by the statute.

Feb. 13, 1894.
 Morison v.
 Morison.

I do not think that this third clause is merely an empowering clause the meaning of which is to put an heir of entail in possession into this position, that if he grants a deed, giving a liferent annuity to his widow out of the free rental of the entailed estate, when there are two subsisting liferents, he is empowered to put a clause into the deed which shall have the effect of enabling his widow to draw her annuity from the estate when one of the prior annuitants dies. What the Act says is this,—“But the power of granting a liferent may be exercised so as to increase a former liferent, or grant a new liferent to the extent hereinbefore authorised to be granted, upon the ceasing or expiration of any former or subsisting liferent, although the same may not take place in the lifetime of the person granting such prospective or increased liferent.” Now, what is the meaning of these words. They have reference solely to the amount of the annuity to be granted by the deed. The amount “hereinbefore authorised” is a third of the free rental of the entailed estate after deducting the various burdens upon it, and in my opinion the words mean that in estimating the amount that may be given to the new annuitant or the increase granted to a prior annuitant, the amount of the annuities which have expired is not to be taken into account. I think that that is the fair view to take of the meaning of the statute, and the only point which was urged against it was that this provision gave only a power to the granter of the deed to increase the annuity, or to grant a new one on the death of the prior annuitant, and that any deed to be effectual must be in terms an exercise of this power, or it must so read that although there are not actually words in the deed stating that it is granted under the powers conferred by the statute, the Court shall come to be of opinion, on consideration of its whole terms, that that was the intention of the granter of the deed. I think that that is far too technical an argument to overcome the manifest considerations of convenience and good sense which, in my opinion, exist in the statute as I have explained them.

I should like to say that I have great difficulty in recognising the case of Bonar v. Anstruther, June 6, 1868, 6 Macph. 910, as an authority in this case. It appears to me doubtful whether the third clause of the statute is applicable at all to that case. It appears to me that that section is applicable only where there are two liferents charged upon the estate which have been granted under the powers conferred by the first clause of the statute. In Bonar's case there was only one such. The question which arose on the second branch of that

No. 100. Morison v. Morison. Feb. 13, 1894. case was whether a prior liferent secured over the estate, but which had not been granted under the powers of the Act, or indeed under the entail at all, was to be deducted from the free rental of the entailed estate in calculating the amount of a liferent annuity charged under the statute. The original annuity had been granted by the entailer himself, in the deed of entail, in favour of his own wife. It was certainly a burden to be deducted in calculating the free rental available for another annuity under the statute, but I think that it was to be deducted merely as a burden to be taken into account at the date of the death of the granter of the second annuity, in no respect different from an annuity to a distant relative or to a stranger. The prior annuity deed was not granted either under the statute or under the powers of the entail, and the burden which it imposed was not different from any burden which the entailer, as being himself fee-simple proprietor of the lands, might have put upon the lands in the shape of an annuity in favour of any stranger. Therefore how clause 3 of the statute could have anything to do with the matter I fail to see.

But although I am not prepared to regard the decision as an authority on the question then before the Court, I admit at once that the remarks of the Judges upon the meaning and spirit of the Act are valuable and worthy of consideration. With regard to that matter, I adopt the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken, and I agree with him that that is the reasonable interpretation of the statute. It is a remedial statute and ought to be liberally construed, so as to attain its plain meaning and object, which is to give each successive annuitant the largest possible benefit contemplated by the statute. So long as both or one of two prior annuities continue operative, they are obstacles to the enjoyment of that benefit by the third annuitant, but when they or either of them cease to be operative they ipso facto cease to be obstacles.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary. I do not express any opinion as to the case of Bonar.

LORD TRAYNER.—The puzzle in this case I think is raised by the peculiar way in which the third clause is expressed. In my opinion the Lord Ordinary has solved it in a way in accordance with the fair meaning of the statute, and with the purpose which the statute was meant to effectuate.

Mackenzie v. Lucas & Aird. Feb. 15, 1894. Process—Reclaiming Note—Competency—Interlocutor ordering proof—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 28.—The Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28, enacts that any interlocutor by a Lord Ordinary ordering proof “shall be final unless within six days from its date the parties or either of them shall present a reclaiming note against it to one of the Divisions of the Court.”

On 30th January a Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof. The Court rose for recess on 3d February and met again on 13th February. The pursuer boxed a reclaiming note against the interlocutor on 12th February, being the earliest day after 3d February on which it was possible to box, but he did not, as he might have done, lodge a reclaiming note No. 101. with the Clerk of Court within the six days allowed for reclaiming. Held — Feb. 15, 1894. Mackenzie v. Lucas & Aird. (diss. Lord Young) that the reclaiming note had not been presented within six days from its date, and was therefore incompetent.*

In an action of damages for personal injuries, brought by Alexander Mackenzie, labourer, Fortrose, against Lucas & Aird, contractors, Fort-William, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 30th January 1894, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dispenses with the adjustment of issues: Allows the parties a proof of their respective averments on record on a day to be afterwards fixed."

The Court rose for the February recess on Saturday, 3d February, and sat again on Tuesday, 13th February.

On 12th February the pursuer boxed a reclaiming note against the foregoing interlocutor.

The defenders objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—This being an interlocutor allowing a proof, a reclaiming note against it must be presented within six days of its date.† No doubt here the six days expired when the Court was not sitting and the boxes were not open, but the reclaiming note would have been timeously "presented," if it had been lodged with the Clerk within the six days, as here it might have been, although the boxing only took place on the earliest possible day thereafter.¹ The Acts of Sederunt, July 11, 1828, sec. 79, and July 20, 1853, did not apply to interlocutors allowing a proof.

Argued for the claimer;—The principle applicable here was that if it was impossible to do the thing required by the statute within the limited time mentioned in the statute, it would be sufficient if it was done on the earliest possible opportunity thereafter.² A reclaiming note was presented if it either was boxed or was lodged with the Clerk. Here the claimer had chosen the former alternative, and the note had been duly boxed on the earliest possible day. It was therefore competent.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that this reclaiming note is incompetent, and that the Act of Sederunt does not apply. The statute says that a reclaiming note of this kind ought to be presented within six days, and I think it must be presented within that time.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think that the provisions of the statute are imperative. I do not think that the boxing of the prints on the first day they could be boxed is enough. I think that the reclaiming note must be lodged within six days.

LORD YOUNG.—It seems to me not at all doubtful that in deciding this question exactly the same considerations must weigh with the Court which had weight when the Court passed the Acts of Sederunt which regulated the way in which reclaiming notes against interlocutors which might be reclaimed against

I pointed out during the discussion that these Acts of Sederunt were founded upon considerations of good sense and expediency as to what should be done in such cases, and I thought that the same considerations were equally applicable to this case. No Act of Sederunt, however, regulating reclaiming notes which must be presented within six days has been passed, and the only question therefore is whether a Division of the Court may not act upon the same considerations of good sense and expediency which actuated the Court in passing these Acts of Sederunt. I think it would be standing out for a mere matter of form for the Court to decline to act upon such considerations seeing that the judgment which your Lordships are to pronounce could have been obviated by an Act of Sederunt.

The result is that we refuse this reclaiming note.

Observations on Mackenzie v. Gillanders, June 19, 1874, 1 R. 1050.

2D DIVISION. JAMES CLARK, thread manufacturer in Paisley, died on 3d August 1881, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 17th August 1880, by which he, in the last place, with regard to the residue of his means and estate, directed his trustees "to hold and apply, pay and convey, the same to and for behoof of all my children equally, and their respective issue, as follows, viz., one-half of the shares falling to sons to be paid and conveyed on my death to such of them as shall then be twenty-five years of age, and to such of them as shall not then have attained that age on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-five years; and the other half of the shares falling to sons, and the whole of the shares falling to daughters, to be held and applied, paid and conveyed, to and for their behoof, in liferent, for their respective alimentary uses only, and to and for behoof of their respective children per stirpes, in fee; . . . declaring, with regard to the shares of residue before directed to be held for behoof of my sons and daughters respectively in liferent, and their respective issue in fee, that in the event of any of my said children dying without leaving issue, or in the event of any of them dying leaving issue, but of such issue not surviving to take in terms of the destination hereinbefore contained, then the share of residue (whether original or as augmented by accretion) which may have been liferented by such child shall devolve upon his or her surviving brothers and sisters, along with the issue of any brother or sister who may have deceased leaving issue, such issue always taking the share which their parent would have taken No. 102. on survivance; but subject always such accretion, in as far as in favour of sons, to the extent of one-half thereof, and in as far as in favour of daughters, to the whole extent thereof, to the same liferent, and also to the same destination, declarations, and conditions in all respects as are herein contained with regard to the original shares of residue provided to them respectively in liferent, and their respective issue in fee." Feb. 16, 1894.

Clark's Trustees v. Clark's Executors.

The settlement also contained this provision,—“And further, and notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, I provide and declare . . . (secondly) that in the event of any of my sons and daughters dying without leaving issue, or of any of them dying leaving issue, but of such issue not surviving to take in terms of the destination hereinbefore contained, it shall be competent to him or her to test upon the share of residue (whether original or as augmented by accretion) that may have been liferented by him or her, and that in favour of such person or persons, or for such uses and purposes, and in such way and manner, all as he or she may think proper.”

Mr Clark was survived by his widow and by six sons and two daughters.

One of the sons, James Alexander Clark, died on 8th January 1893, unmarried, at the age of thirty. He left a holograph will, dated 13th October 1892, by which, after bequeathing certain legacies, he provided as follows:—“And the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate I give, devise, and bequeath unto my brothers Kenneth Mackenzie Clark and Norman Clark, equally, and I hereby appoint Kenneth Mackenzie Clark and Norman Clark, or the survivor of them, executors of this my will.”

After James Alexander Clark's death, the question arose, whether his will was a valid exercise of the power contained in his father's trust-disposition and settlement of testing on the share of his father's estate liferented by him, and a special case was presented.

The first parties—Mr Clark senior's trustees—maintained that James A. Clark's will was not a valid exercise of this power, and accordingly that the share liferented by him fell to be administered by them in terms of Mr Clark senior's trust-disposition and settlement.

The second parties—James A. Clark's executors—maintained that his will was a valid exercise of the power, and therefore that the share liferented by him fell to be paid over to them.

In addition to setting forth the facts already narrated, the case stated that James A. Clark was survived by three brothers and one sister, and was predeceased by two brothers and one sister (all of whom left issue); and further, that he never received any portion of his father's estate, and at the time of his death was entitled to one-eighth part of the residue, one-half in fee, and one-half in liferent.

The questions of law were,—“(1) Are the first parties entitled to retain and administer, as trustees of the said James Clark, the portion of the residue of the estate of the said James Clark liferented by the said James Alexander Clark? or (2) Are the first parties bound to pay to the second parties the portion of the residue of the estate of the said James Clark liferented by the said James Alexander Clark?”¹

Clark's Trustees v. Clark's Executors.

LORD YOUNG.—The question which is raised in this case is, whether a will, although it in terms refers only to property of which the testator had the fee, may be read as including also other property of which he had the liferent with an absolute power of disposal of the fee. That question is not now raised for the first time, for it was raised and determined in the affirmative in the case of Hyslop v. Maxwell's Trustees, 12 S. 413. The maker of the will which is here in question had, I understand, a large fortune of his own, part of it consisting of a share of his deceased father's estate, which he had permitted to remain in the hands of his father's trustees. With respect to another part of that estate, it was not his own, but he had the liferent of it, together with an absolute power to dispose of the capital. It is not disputed that the will which he left is applicable to that part of his father's estate of which he had the fee, although it remained in the hands of his father's trustees. But the contention is, that it is not applicable to the fee of the other part, of which he had the liferent with an absolute power of disposal. I am unable to agree in that view. I think the case is indistinguishable from Hyslop v. Maxwell's Trustees, only that it appears to me to be a stronger and clearer case for the application of the rule there established. The circumstances here are altogether favourable to the inference of an intention on the part of the testator to dispose of the fee of the property, of which he had the liferent with an absolute power of disposal, for it would be making a distinction not likely to occur to an ordinary testator to suppose that he understood that he was disposing of that part of his father's estate of which he had the fee, but not of that other part of which he had the liferent, but with an absolute power of disposing of the fee of it. That circumstance makes this case an exceedingly clear case for the application of the rule. We must of course be satisfied that the rule is in accordance with the true meaning of the will in the particular case, and if there is anything to hinder us from giving effect to the rule of course it will not hold, but here I can find nothing, and therefore I apply the rule established in Hyslop v. Maxwell's Trustees, and give that effect to the will here which makes it carry the property of which the testator had the liferent with an absolute power of disposal. I am of opinion accordingly that we should answer the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that we must follow the rule of the case of Hyslop v. Maxwell's Trustees. I cannot distinguish the present case from it. I have examined the case of Mackenzie v. Gillanders, 1 R. 1050. I am satisfied that it was decided on special grounds, viz. (1) because of the form of the will, and (2) because of the peculiarity of the power.

LORD TRAYNER.—I come to the same conclusion. I think this case cannot be distinguished in any material respect from the case of Hyslop v. Maxwell, the decision in which has never been overruled, but has, on the contrary, been referred to with approval in subsequent cases. I do not regard the decision in the case of Mackenzie as derogating from or competing with the authority of Hyslop v. Maxwell. Mackenzie's case was very special in its circumstances, and was decided in respect of specialties.

Cuthill v.
Strachan.

Payment—Appropriation of indefinite payments—Account-current—Bank—Cash-credit account.—In an account-current where there is no appropriation of payments to the discharge of any particular debts, the law makes an appropriation according to the order of the debit items in the account.

Strachan, one of the cautioners for a cash-credit account with a bank, was sequestrated, the balance against George Cuthill, the principal under the cash-credit account, being £599 at the date of the sequestration. The bank made no claim in the sequestration, and Cuthill continued to operate on the cash-credit account until he granted a trust-deed for creditors, when the bank closed the account, the balance due by Cuthill then being £615. William Cuthill, another cautioner, having paid this £615 to the bank, made a claim of relief against Strachan, who had carried through a composition settlement with his creditors. In defence it was pleaded that the balance due to the bank at the date of Strachan's sequestration had been extinguished by subsequent payments by George Cuthill into the bank. It appeared that sums exceeding the balance, as at Strachan's sequestration, had been subsequently paid into bank, but that the daily debit balance was never less than £550, and that the aggregate amount paid in was almost exactly equal to that withdrawn. } 559

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the rule above given applied, and that Strachan's cautionary obligation had been extinguished.

IN March 1887 William Cuthill, spirit merchant, Hilltown, Dundee, Joseph Strachan, wholesale grocer, Tower Nook, Arbroath, and Jonathan Forbes, merchant, Shore Terrace, Dundee, became cautioners under a cash-credit bond to the British Linen Company Bank, for an account-current, at the Arbroath branch of the bank, to be kept in the name of George Cuthill junior, Keptie Street, Arbroath, for £600. 2D DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

On 4th September 1888 the estates of Joseph Strachan, one of the cautioners, were sequestrated. The sequestration was closed under a composition arrangement of 7s. 6d. in the pound, and Strachan was discharged on 2d November 1888. The bank did not lodge any claim in the sequestration, and took no payment under the composition arrangement. At the date of the sequestration, 4th September, the balance due to the bank on the cash-credit account was £599, 7s. 6d.

On 22d June 1891 George Cuthill, the principal debtor, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, and the cash-credit account with the bank was closed of the same date.

At the date of George Cuthill's trust-deed the balance due to the bank on the cash-credit account, with interest, was £615, 5s. 8d. On 21st October 1891 William Cuthill, as cautioner, being called on to do so by the bank, paid this £615, 5s. 8d. to the bank.

Forbes, the remaining cautioner, subsequently relieved William Cuthill of this payment to the extent of his liability for himself and Strachan. William Cuthill then brought an action against Strachan for payment of £37, 9s. 2d., being the amount of the composition of 7s. 6d. in the pound on one-half of Strachan's third of £599, 7s. 6d.

In defence, Strachan maintained, inter alia, that he was not liable to the pursuer, in respect that between the date of his sequestration and the closing of the cash-credit account sums were paid into the account by the

No. 103. principal debtor equal to the amount for which he, the defender, was liable at the date of the sequestration, assuming a claim to have been then made against him by the bank.

 Cuthill v.
 Strachan.

From joint minutes lodged by the parties it appeared that the total sum paid into the cash-credit account from 4th September 1888, the date of the defender's sequestration, to 22d October 1891, the date of the closing of the account, was £6266, and that the total sum withdrawn during the same period was £6291, 17s. 11d. It further appeared that the actual debit balance on the account from day to day was never reduced below £550 or thereby.

On 24th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) granted decree against the defender for £37, 9s. 2d., with interest from the date of citation.*

X LORD YOUNG.—The rule of law stated in the case of Lang v. Brown, December 2, 1859, 22 D. 113, is conclusive, and it is stated as a principle held by the Court to be well settled, that to an account-current the principle is applicable that where payments are made by a debtor and are not appropriated by the parties, the law appropriates them to the extinction of the items of debit in their order in the account. Applying that principle to the facts of the present case, I think that the various entries by the principal debtor after the sequestration of the defender settles the debt just as clearly as if the first payment had been an entry by the principal debtor of £600, which admittedly

* "OPINION.— . . . It only remains for me to notice the defender's argument founded on Devayne's case, 1 Merivale, 585, and the cases of Houston v. Spiers, 3 W. and S. 392, and Royal Bank v. Christie, 2 Rob. 118. The principle of Devayne's case is simply this, that in an account-current where no special appropriation has been made by the parties, the law appropriates payments to the various debts in their order, so that the first item on the credit side discharges the first item on the debit side, and so on. In Houston's case (which was one of suretyship), there was a change in the mode of dealing which was held to liberate the cautioners after a certain time. The balance against them at that time was afterwards entirely extinguished if the payments which they subsequently made were applied to the debit entries in their order, and it was held that they must be so applied. So in Christie's case (which was one of partnership dissolved by death), the balance against the deceased partner at the date of his death was afterwards entirely extinguished if the subsequent payments by the surviving partners were applied to the debit entries in their order. But what the defender wishes to do here is, not to set one entry against another in order of time, but to pick all the credit entries out of the account and by adding them up and disregarding the debit entries altogether, to shew that they exceeded the sum of £599, 7s. 6d. This seems to me quite inadmissible. The actual debit balance on the account from day to day was never reduced below £550 or thereby. Once there was an apparent reduction to £444 by a credit payment of £149, but there were drafts on the same day which restored the balance to £599. Substantially the state of the account remained unaffected from September 1888 to June 1891. It seems to me therefore that the principle of these cases would not apply, even if it could be said the defender had no control over the account after his sequestration. But I think he had, because . . . he could have called upon the bank to stop it if he had chosen. I shall therefore give decree . . . but with interest only from the date of citation."

would have extinguished the debit balance on the account. He had no doubt the intention of continuing to operate upon the account, and as circumstances arose he might thereafter continue to draw on his account, thereby making himself a debtor to the bank, or by paying in a larger sum make himself a creditor, but at the date of the sequestration the defender's cautionary obligation was extinguished for the future. What the condition of the cash-credit was when it came to an end does not signify.

Succession—Liferent or fee—Intestacy.—A testator by his settlement "willed and disposed of" his whole property in favour of his two surviving daughters nominatim "during their lifetime, share and share alike," and appointed two persons to be trustees "to see the provisions of this my will carried into effect." The settlement did not dispose of the fee of his estate per expressum.

The testator was survived by the two daughters named in the will, and by a grandchild, the daughter of a deceased daughter. His wife predeceased him.

In a competition between (1) the two surviving daughters, and (2) the grandchild, held (dub. Lord Trayner) that the settlement conferred a liferent only of one-half the estate on each of the surviving daughters, and that as each liferent terminated, the half of the fee liferented fell to be disposed of as intestate succession of the testator.

THOMAS SPINKS, watchmaker in Edinburgh, died on 24th March 1893, 2D DIVISION. leaving a settlement in the following terms:—"I, Thomas Spinks, . . . do hereby . . . will and dispose of all my money, goods, chattels, household property, furniture, merchandise, stock in trade, and all my earthly belongings, &c., in favour of my daughters, Margaret Galloway Spinks, and Alexandrina Ramsay Spinks, during their lifetime, share and share alike. I hereby appoint the following trustees to see the provisions of this my will carried into effect." Then followed the names of the trustees, who accepted office as executors and were confirmed.

Questions having arisen as to the construction and effect of the settlement, a special case was presented. Mr Spinks's executors were the first parties. He was predeceased by a daughter, Euphemia, Mrs Simpson, who left a pupil daughter, Mary Ramsay Simpson, represented by her father, Thomas Simpson, as second party. The third parties were the two daughters named in the settlement, who were unmarried and were in majority. Mr Spinks's wife predeceased him.

The case stated:—"At the date of his death the heritable property belonging to the testator consisted of a house worth about £400, burdened with a bond for £150. The net amount of his estate, heritable and moveable, is estimated at about £530. The deceased's daughters were not taught any means of earning their livelihood, and have no means of

No. 104. support other than what they may obtain from their father's estate. They are, however, carrying on their father's business, with the aid of a practical manager; and one of them attended the shop during her father's last illness, and will continue to do so." It was further stated that the settlement was framed by one of the executors without legal assistance, and with a view to carry out instructions verbally given by the testator to him.

Feb. 16, 1894.
Spinks's
Executors v.
Simpson.

The second party maintained (1) that the right of the third parties under the settlement was one of liferent only; and (2) that on the death of either of them, the share liferented by her would either pass to the testator's grandchild, Mary Ramsay Simpson, or fall into intestacy.

The third parties maintained that, on a sound construction of the said settlement, the testator had bequeathed the capital of his whole estate equally in fee to his surviving daughters, and that they were entitled to immediate payment and conveyance thereof from the first parties. In the event of its being held that the third parties were not so entitled, and that their right was limited to a liferent, they maintained that the survivor of them would be entitled to liferent the whole of the deceased's estate. In the event of it being held that the fee of the deceased's estate was not disposed of by his settlement, the third parties maintained that they were entitled to two-thirds thereof.

The following were the questions of law:—“(1) Whether the third parties are entitled to immediate payment and conveyance of the deceased's whole estate, share and share alike, in fee; or whether the right of the third parties in the said estate is limited to a liferent? (2) Whether, in the event of it being held that the right of the third parties in the said estate is limited to a liferent, the survivor of these parties, on the death of one of them, is entitled to liferent the whole estate? or, (3) Whether, in the event foresaid, on the death of each of the third parties, the share liferented by her will pass to the testator's grandchild, the said Mary Ramsay Simpson? or, (4) Does the fee of the estate, on the death of either or both *liferent*rices, fall into intestacy; and in that event are the third parties entitled to two-thirds thereof?”¹

LORD YOUNG.—The testator by his settlement wills and disposes of his money, household property, and all his earthly belongings, “in favour of my daughters,” naming them “during their lifetime, share and share alike,” and then he appoints certain persons as trustees. Now, I think it is impossible to disregard these words “during their lifetime” as a limitation on the gift, and to read the clause as if it was an absolute gift to his daughters. In my opinion the will gives a liferent only to the daughters in the estate, which, during their lifetime, is protected by the appointment of trustees and that there is intestacy as regards the fee. Of course he might have disposed of the fee. Had the will gone on, “I give all my property to A, B, and C, after my daughters' death,” that would have been disposing of the fee, but there being no such clause he dies intestate as regards the fee, and the law of the matter is not doubtful.

The testator had three daughters, one of whom predeceased him but left a child. They are his heirs, and must take the fee of his estate. Upon the decease of the two surviving daughters, the one-third share of the fee falling to each will go as she may choose to direct if she should leave a will disposing of it, if not it will be disposed of as intestate succession of her. With respect to the other third, upon the termination of the life interests that will go to the grand-child. Each sister takes the life interest of one-half of the estate, and upon the death of one of them the half liberated will be disposed of as fee, the surviving sister continuing to enjoy the life interest of the remaining half, which on her death will in turn be disposed of as fee.

Superior and Vassal—Composition—Relief—Implied entry—Entail—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 4.—An institute under a deed of entail obtained an implied entry with the superior by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and not being an heir alioqui successurus became liable in composition. The superior discharged his claim on payment of relief-duty. On the next heir of entail—who was not heir of line—obtaining an implied entry the superior claimed composition.

Held that the vassal being the heir of investiture was only liable in relief-duty.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that an implied entry must be subject to all the conditions and reservations by which the superior would have been entitled to qualify an express entry by progress.

WILLIAM MORAY STIRLING, of Abercairney, was proprietor of certain lands, held of the Crown, under a deed of tailzie dated 1769. He was duly entered with the superior. In 1849 he disentailed the lands and executed a new entail whereby he disposed them to himself, whom failing to his sister Mrs Home Drummond, whom failing to her second son Charles Home Drummond and the heirs of his body, and failing them to a certain series of heirs, but under the condition that "in case any of the heirs of entail succeeding under the deed should succeed to the estate of Blair Drummond, and should at the time of his death leave (in addition to an eldest son or descendant of an eldest son) a second or other younger son or descendant of such, then the lands should, upon the death of such heir, descend to his or her second or younger sons successively in their order, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies respectively."

William Moray Stirling was infeft on this disposition. He died in 1850, and in 1851 his sister, Mrs Home Drummond, was served heir of entail and provision to him, and was infeft, but did not enter with the Crown.

1st Division.
Ld. Wellwood.

No. 105. By disposition dated 30th October 1851 Mrs Home Drummond disposed the lands to her second son, Charles Home Drummond (afterwards Charles Stirling Home Drummond Moray), under reservation of her liferent.

Feb. 16, 1894.
Lord Advocate v. Moray.

On her death it appeared that her service was defective, and Charles S. H. Drummond Moray, to whom the succession opened, passing over the title he had acquired from his mother made up his title by serving himself heir of tailie and provision in special to the entailer. An extract of the decree of service, dated 30th July, was recorded in the General Register of Sasines on 15th August 1868, and by the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, he became entered with the Crown.

No casualty was at that time paid to the Crown in respect of his implied entry. In 1876 George, the elder brother of Charles S. H. Drummond Moray, died. Several years thereafter the Crown accepted relief-duties from Charles on the footing that he was heir alioqui successurus (under the previous entail), which he was not in 1874 at the date of his implied entry. The receipts granted by the Crown contained no reservation of any sort.

Charles S. H. Drummond Moray died in 1891, and was succeeded in the lands by his second son, William Augustus Home Drummond Moray, in virtue of the destination contained in the disposition and deed of entail of 1849. He was duly infeft, conform to a recorded extract decree of special and general service. The heir-at-law of Charles S. H. Drummond Moray was his eldest son Henry.

In May 1893 the Lord Advocate, as representing the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue, raised an action against William A. H. Drummond Moray for declarator, that in consequence of the death of Charles S. H. Drummond Moray, who was the vassal last vest and seised in the lands, "a casualty of composition on the untaxed entry of a singular successor" had become due, and for payment.

The record set out the facts above narrated.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having taken infeftment as a singular successor in the said lands, is liable in respect of his implied entry in payment to the Crown as superior of the same of a casualty of composition.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The defender being heir of tailzie and provision under the investiture created by the said deed of entail of 1849, and that investiture having been enfranchised by the Crown, as stated in the defences, is only liable in relief-duty.

On 8th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) found that the defender was liable in payment of composition.*

* "OPINION.—This case raises the question whether an implied entry under the Conveyancing Act of 1874, followed by acceptance without reservation by the superior of relief-duty from the heir of entail in possession under a new entail, has the effect of enfranchising the investiture created by the deed of entail, so as to preclude the superior from thereafter demanding composition, when the succession opens to one who is not alioqui successurus.

"I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to a casualty of composition. Under the law as it stood prior to the passing of the Act of 1874, if a vassal, purchaser, or assignee applied for a charter of confirmation, and tendered a year's rent, the superior was bound to grant, without reservation or qualification, a charter in favour of whatever persons the vassal, purchaser, or assignee might please to name, and to embody in the charter, if required, the fetters of a strict entail; with the result that the whole persons named in the charter, in whatever degree of relationship they stood to the vassal, purchaser, or assignee, or to each other, were entitled, as heirs of the investiture, to obtain an entry on payment of the casualty of relief. By granting such a charter the superior was held to have enfranchised the investiture.

“Again, the superior was bound, when applied to for a charter of confirmation of a deed of entail which changed the destination in the former investiture to grant such a charter on payment of relief-duty only, if the person first called was also the heir of the former investiture ; but he was entitled to insert in the charter a reservation of his right to claim composition when the succession should open to one who was not heir alioqui successurus.

“Such being the old law, the Conveyancing Act of 1874, which abolishes charters and writs by progress, provides (section 4, subsection 2),—‘Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate Register of Sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior, whose estate of superiority in such lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice.’ If the statute had stopped there the superior’s rights would have been seriously affected in various ways. For instance, formerly, if the superior granted a charter of confirmation he was held to have discharged all claims for past due feu-duties and casualties, and therefore it became necessary to provide, as is done by section 4, subsections 3 and 4, that the superior’s rights in that respect should not be affected by the implied entry.

“Again, when a superior was applied to to grant a charter by progress he was entitled, unless barred by prescription, to recur to the original charter as shewing the measure and extent of the feu-right. He was also entitled to refuse, without a consideration, to enlarge the vassal’s rights by granting an assignable charter, or without payment of composition or reservation, to insert a tailzied destination different from that in the prior investiture.

“But if the vassal’s implied entry were to be held to be equivalent without qualification to a writ of confirmation granted by the superior, the superior might be held to have lost his right to object to the terms of the disposition which was impliedly confirmed. Therefore by section 4, subsection 2, it is provided,—‘But such an implied entry shall not be held to confer or confirm any rights more extensive than those contained in the original charter or feu-right of the lands, or in the last charter or other writ by which the vassal was entered therein.’

“It seems to me then that after the passing of the Act of 1874 the superior’s rights stood thus : Charters by progress being no longer necessary or competent, and the vassal being entered as if he had obtained a writ of confirmation, the superior could no longer protect himself by inserting a reservation in the charter, or refusing to grant a charter until he was paid composition. But his right to demand a casualty on each implied entry remains intact. If the heir thus entered was heir alioqui successurus the superior was entitled to demand and receive relief-duty only. That is what the Crown did in this case when they settled with Charles Drummond Moray. My own view is (but this does not affect the present question) that the Crown might have demanded a year’s rent from him, because at the date of his implied entry, the passing of the Act of 1874, he was not heir alioqui successurus, his elder brother being still alive. If the Crown had then received a composition the new investiture would undoubtedly have been enfranchised. But relief-duty only was paid, and the only ground upon which the defender maintains that composition is not now exigible in respect of his entry is that because the Crown, in the receipt granted to Charles Drummond Moray, did not insert a reservation to claim composition, it must be held to have enfranchised the destination just as if a charter of confirmation had been granted without reservation or qualification.

“I cannot adopt this view. I do not think that any such reservation was prior to 1874 a vassal was entitled to tender a charter to the superior containing a destination to any series of heirs he chose, and the superior was bound on receiving payment of composition to grant it. If the superior inserted a clause reserving right to demand a composition from each succeeding heir in the series who was not heir of line, such a reservation effected nothing.¹ An apparent exception to this rule was that if the institute under a new entail was also heir under the old investiture, he was entitled to enter for relief, in which event the superior might reserve his claim for composition from the first heir in the new destination who was not also heir under the old investiture.² But that was the only case in which such a reservation was competent. It was not essential, as the Lord Ordinary had held, to the enfranchisement of an investiture that a composition should de facto have been paid by someone, and if a superior once granted a charter, it might be for no consideration, he could not, nor could his representatives, refuse a charter by progress on payment of relief merely because no composition had in fact ever been paid.³ The dicta of Lord Deas, on which the pursuer founded, in Swinton's case⁴ had been disapproved.⁵ The right of a vassal to be entered for relief depended therefore on his being an heir under the existing investiture, provided that he did not fall under the exception above noted. The Act of 1874 made no special exception of what was to happen to casualties because of the implied entry. It was necessary to look to its general provisions for the effect of recording a disposition. It was impossible to maintain that the rights of superior and vassal were absolutely unaffected by these. The superior might be benefited⁶ or the vassal.⁷ Now, whether the superior was prejudiced or not, the effect of the Act was in all cases to enter the vassal infest to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation, i.e., a writ in unqualified terms. In the present circumstances the result of that was that, by the statutory entry of Mr Charles Drummond Moray in 1874, the investiture created by the deed of 1849 was confirmed,⁸ and Mr Moray was entered as a singular successor in fact as well as form, the older investiture being sopited. The Crown might have demanded a composition from Mr Charles Drummond Moray, but its failure to do so could not affect the required. The receipt was not in the circumstances a proper document in which to insert it. There was no transaction between superior and vassal, and no question except as to the amount of the casualty then due was raised. The most plausible view of the defender's case is that if the Crown had exacted composition from Charles Drummond Moray the defender would only have been liable in relief-duty. But this is not a fair way of putting the case. The Crown accepted what both parties then believed to be the appropriate casualty in any case; and the broad facts remain that the Crown has not received composition from any heir of tailzie, and it has never expressly discharged its right to claim composition. I therefore think that the Crown is not precluded from now demanding composition."

defender. Further, assuming that the Crown might, as a condition of his being entered for relief, have reserved a right to claim composition from the next heir, it had not done so. The receipts would have been the natural place to find such a reservation, and they contained none. In the absence of an express reservation, there was no presumption in law that the Crown must have intended a reservation, for it was admittedly not the invariable practice of the Crown to enforce its extreme rights in entering vassals, and it was to be noted that the only payment which it had demanded here had been made. But no such reservation would have been effectual in any view, for the Crown did not and could not enter Mr Charles Drummond Moray in 1874 as the heir of the old investiture (in which case alone a reservation to claim composition would have been competent), for de facto he was not such heir until the death of his elder brother two years later. The writ of confirmation granted by the Crown on the assumption of the Act must therefore have been in absolute and unqualified terms.

Argued for the pursuer;—While there was no presumption that the statute had left the rights of superior and vassal in regard to casualties exactly as they were before, the Court would be slow to accept a construction of the statute leading to results which were anomalous and contrary to principle. Under the former law, when a vassal applied for a charter to give effect to an altered destination, and thus to enlarge the original grant, the superior had it in his power to insert clauses in the charter reserving and protecting his rights. The result of the implied entry introduced in 1874 would have been to deprive the superior entirely of his rights in this respect had there been no saving clause, and subsection 2 of section 4 was introduced for the purpose of protecting the superior's rights.* The statutory "writ of confirmation" was not intended to and did not enlarge the rights of the vassal, and if Charles Drummond Moray had applied for a charter, the Crown would have protected itself by inserting all clauses necessary for that purpose. The words "existing law and practice" could only refer to such a charter as the superior could be compelled to grant. If that were so, the question was whether the Crown had lost its right by what took place in 1874 and subsequently, to claim composition from a succeeding heir under the investiture of 1849, and that depended upon whether the Crown then consented to admit succeeding heirs under that investiture upon payment of relief-duty only. The Crown had never given any such consent, for it was clear that the Crown officials had dealt with Charles Drummond Moray under a mistaken view of the rights and obligations of a superior—a mistaken view which was generally entertained by the profession prior to the decision in Stuart v. Hamilton,¹ and accordingly it had treated Mr Moray as heir alioqui successurus, the character in which he had been put forward. Nor could it be said that the Crown had lost its right because the receipts contained no reservation. The receipts were documents entirely personal to the individual to whom they were given, and they could never be allowed to contradict or contest the terms of the title.

No. 105. Lastly, the claim of the Crown was not excluded by the fact that a composition might have been claimed from the defender's predecessor, for payment of a composition was essential to the enfranchisement of a charter. A charter accompanied by such payment, but nothing less, enfranchised an investiture, and indeed the enfranchisement was the result not of the charter but of the payment of composition.¹ The defender was therefore liable for a casualty of composition, none having been paid in respect of the investiture contained in the tailzie of 1849.

Feb. 16, 1894.
Lord Advocate v. Moray.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—It is admitted that the defender is liable in payment of a casualty in respect of his implied entry with the Crown in the lands libelled. The question is, whether he is liable in composition as a singular successor, or in relief-duty as the heir of the investiture.

The last vassal entered with the Crown under the former investiture was William Moray Stirling of Abercairney, who executed the deed of entail under which the defender now holds, on the 27th October 1849. By this deed he disposed the lands to himself, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to his sister Mrs Home Drummond, whom failing, to Charles Home Drummond, her second son, and the heirs of his body, and failing them, to a certain series of heirs, but under a condition which is not very correctly described as a clause of devolution, that in case any heir succeeding under the deed of entail should also succeed to the estate of Blair Drummond, and should at his death leave, in addition to an older son, a second or younger son, the estate of Abercairney should, upon the death of such heir, descend to his second or younger sons successively in their order, and the heirs of their bodies. In the event so provided for, therefore, the estate is not to be taken by the heir of line, but by a younger brother of the heir of line, or by a descendant of such younger brother.

On the death of the entailer, Mrs Home Drummond was served heir of tailzie and provision to him, and was infeft, but did not enter with the Crown. In 1851 she disposed the lands to her son Charles Home Drummond, afterwards Drummond Moray, reserving her liferent. On her death it appeared that her service was technically defective, and Charles Home Drummond, to whom the succession opened, passing over his mother's service and the title he had acquired from her, made up his title by serving himself heir of tailzie and provision in special to the entailer, William Moray Stirling. An extract of the decree was recorded in the Register of Sasines; and on the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, he was entered with the Crown by the operation of the statute.

No casualty was paid in respect of this entry until 1876. But by that time Mr Drummond Moray, in consequence of the death of his elder brother, had come to be in the position of heir-at-law of William Moray Stirling, the last entered vassal, and it appeared that the Crown discharged the claim for casualty on payment of relief-duty, on the assumption that he was heir alioqui successor instead of exacting the composition, for which he was undoubtedly liable as a singular successor.

Mr Drummond Moray died in 1891, and his second son, the defender, suc-

Lord Advocate v. Moray.

The only ground set forth upon record for claiming a year's rent as composition is that the heir-at-law of the last vassal is not the defender but his elder brother, and the defender is therefore infeft and entered as a singular successor. This is certainly untenable. There can be no question that the defender is the heir of the existing investiture, and he is entered accordingly as heir of taillie and provision, and in no other character. The implied entry which is created by the Statute of 1874 has the same effect "as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the law and practice" existing at the passing of the Act. Now, there can be no question as to the terms or effect of the charter which Charles Drummond Moray would have been entitled to demand under the former law, provided always that he satisfied the superior's claim for a casualty on entry. He could have obtained a charter confirming his infeftment and all the writs upon which it proceeded, and the effect of such a charter or writ of confirmation would have been to enable all the heirs of entail succeeding to him to enter with the superior in their turn for payment of relief-duty. It was settled law before the passing of the Act that the disponee of an entered vassal might require the superior to grant a charter to himself and any series of heirs he chose to name, or that might be named for him by the granter of the disposition in his favour, and that when by such a charter a certain line of descent had been once admitted into the investiture of the vassal, the persons so favoured must be accepted by the superior as heirs in their order, irrespective of their relation by blood to the immediate grantee or to one another. This is settled by a series of decisions of which Stirling v. Ewart may be taken as the final and conclusive authority, and it cannot now be called in question. It is of no consequence, therefore, that the defender, being a younger son, is not the heir-at-law of the last vassal. By the implication of the statute, which is equivalent in law to the superior's own act, he is the heir of the investiture.

But the Crown's demand was supported in argument, and has been sustained by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, upon an entirely different ground from that which is pleaded on record. It is said that the right of heirs who are not heirs-at-law to enter for relief-duty arises only when the charter admitting them into the investiture has been granted without qualification or reservation and for payment of composition; that if Charles Drummond Moray had been entered by charter or writ of confirmation on payment of relief-duty, the right to exact composition from the first substitute under the new investiture who should not be also the heir of the investiture which it superseded, would have been expressly reserved in such writ or charter; and that the implied entry under the statute cannot confer upon heirs of the new investiture any other or higher right than the superior could have been required to grant under the former law. The Lord Ordinary says that the only answer to this argument, and "the only ground on which the defender maintains that composition is not now exigible in respect of his entry, is that because the Crown, in the receipt granted to Charles Drummond Moray did not insert a reservation to claim composition, it must be held to have enfranchised the destination just as if a charter of confirmation had been granted without reservation or qualification." I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, if the argument is otherwise well founded, this is

No. 105. not a good answer. I do not think the question depends upon the terms of the receipt, but upon the legal operation of the statutory entry. The Act alters the method by which entry is obtained. It is no longer to be effected either by a separate charter granted by the superior, or by the superior's writ engrossed upon the conveyance, but by the recording of the conveyance in the Register of Sasines. But the substantial rights of the superior and vassal are left precisely as they stood before the statute. And, therefore, if it be clear that by the law and practice then existing a disponent could not have insisted upon an absolute and unqualified confirmation, the implied entry must, in my opinion, be subject to all the conditions and reservations by which the superior would have been entitled to qualify an express entry by progress.

Feb. 16, 1894.
Lord Advocate v. Moray.

The question, therefore, is whether we are to assume that if the Act of 1874 had not passed, and Charles Drummond Moray had completed his title by entry with the Crown under the old law, the crown charter or writ of confirmation must have been so qualified as to render the defender liable, on his entry, for payment of composition as a singular successor.

Now, it is certain, in the first place, that he was entitled to demand a charter in favour of himself and the heirs of entail under which all the heirs-substitute, however remote from the legal order of succession, would be entitled to enter as heirs of provision for payment of relief-duty; secondly, that the composition or price which the Crown would have been entitled to demand for a charter in these terms was exactly the same as that exigible for a charter to the vassal and his heirs-at-law; and thirdly, that if such a charter had been granted for payment of such composition as the Crown was entitled to exact, no reservation of a right to demand composition from heirs of entail who should not be heirs of line would have been of any avail to the Crown.

But it has been decided in the cases of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie and the Marquis of Hastings v. Oswald, first, that if the institute under a deed of entail is also the heir of the existing investiture he is entitled to the benefit of his character of heir and to enter for relief, notwithstanding that in order to avoid a forfeiture he has been compelled to make up his title under the entail, which necessarily means that he has entered in form as a disponent or singular successor; and secondly, that the superior who had been compelled to enter the institute for relief-duty might effectually reserve his claim for composition on the entry of the first substitute under the new investiture who should not be the then existing heir of the former investiture. The second proposition was held to be a corollary of the first; because, as Lord Wood explains in the Marquis of Hastings v. Oswald, it is "a necessary adjunct" of the doctrine that the heir of a prior investiture is entitled to enter under a new tailzied investiture for payment of relief-duty only. The doctrine thus established is anomalous. But there can be no question that in this Court, at least, it must be treated as settled law. It is therefore maintained on the authority of these decisions that the Crown admitting Charles Drummond Moray for payment of relief-duty would have been entitled to reserve a claim for composition on the entry of a substitute who should not be his heir of line. But the doctrine is inapplicable to this case, because Charles Drummond Moray was not the heir alioqui successurus when he entered with the Crown. He was disponent of the last vassal under a deed which displaced the heir of the investiture; and he could not have entered in any other character than that of disponent. It makes no difference that at the time when the casualty was paid he had come into the position of heir-at-law to his uncle, because the character of the entry implied by the statute must be determined with reference to the date of the registration of his infeftment. He is to be deemed to have been entered as at that date to the same effect as if a writ of confirmation had been granted. But if the extent of his liability were to be determined as at the date of payment of the casualty it would still have been the liability of a singular successor; because the right of the heir aliouqui successurus to enter as disponee for payment of relief-duty is available only when the old investiture remains open, so that he might, if he had thought fit, have made up a title by service, and the old investiture had been entirely sopited by the operation of the statute on Mr Drummond Moray's infeftment as disponee. This was decided in Stuart v. Hamilton. Charles Drummond Moray, therefore, had no right to demand a charter from the Crown except on payment of a year's rent as composition.

No. 105.

Feb. 16, 1894.
Lord Advocate v. Moray.

The question then is whether we are to assume that if it had been necessary or possible to grant a charter by progress in 1876, such a charter would have contained a reservation that the Crown should be entitled to claim composition on the entry of a singular successor. I think this cannot be assumed, for two reasons,—In the first place, the statute leaves no room for speculative reasoning as to the terms of the charter. The vassal who is duly infeft is to be deemed to be duly entered to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice; and that must mean such a writ as would have been granted in ordinary course, in such terms as were usual and necessary for completing the vassal's title in the character in which he was infeft. Now Charles Drummond Moray, who was not the heir of the former investiture, was entered as disponee under a conveyance by the former vassal, with a tailzied destination; and in ordinary course the superior's confirmation must have imported an absolute and unqualified investiture of the disponee and the whole series of heirs in the specified line of descent. There is nothing to suggest that it would have contained any exceptional condition or reservation, except the fact that the payment exacted for entry was less than the sum which the superior was entitled to demand. But that might be accounted for in various ways. He knew that the extreme rights of the Crown were not always enforced on the completion of crown titles; and a vassal might be admitted for relief who was liable for composition, either because the Crown chose to waive its right, or because the crown officers were mistaken as to the extent of their claim. There would be no reservation in either case. It is admitted that the casualty which the Crown chose to demand was duly paid, and it is to be held, under the statute, that a charter was granted in return for the payment. The rights of heirs cannot, in my opinion, be determined by speculation as to clauses which might, or might not, have been inserted in such charter, but by the terms which the charter must have contained if it were granted in ordinary course to a singular successor on satisfaction of the superior's claim.

But, in the second place, I think that the reservation, if it had been inserted, would have been ineffectual. A reservation has no effect in law, except in so far as it saves an existing right, and the defender's case is not rested, as the Lord Ordinary had supposed, upon the superior's omission to reserve a legal claim, but on the stronger ground that he had no claim to reserve. I think this follows from the judgment of the House of Lords in Stirling v. Ewart. Composition is not a casualty payable out of the land from time to time. It is the

No. 105. price of the charter. The superior's right to demand a year's rent as the price rests upon the Acts of 1469 and 1669, and upon the Act of George II. But these statutes give the right upon the entry of an adjudger or a disponee, and upon no other occasion. They give no right "upon the succession of anyone claiming under such entry." These propositions being established, the right of an heir of entail to enter for relief-duty depended on the Act of 1685. It was maintained for the superior that an entail which departs from the legal line of succession is, in substance, an alienation to strangers by anticipation, and each substitution which departs from the line of the vassal last entered is a repetition of the alienation, so that every substitute who is not an heir of line as well as an heir of provision under the deed of entail is, in truth, a disponee or singular successor, and bound to pay a composition accordingly. The answer to which the judgment of the House of Lords, affirming the decision of this Court, gave effect is thus expressed in the opinion of Lord Cottenham. The Statute of 1685, "in giving power to make tailzies, gave a right against the lord to give effect to that right; and as the claim in question did not exist before that time, and was not within the reservation" to the superior of casualties of superiority, "and certainly was not given by that Act, there cannot be any legal foundation for it." I think it follows that if composition were exigible by law, as the price of a charter confirming a deed of entail, the claim must have been enforced on the entry of the institute, or not at all. For the superior had no claim except against a disponee, and no remedy, except by withholding a charter. He might enter the institute as disponee, if he pleased, for a lesser price than the law entitled him to exact. But he could not, by entering the institute for relief-duty, when he was entitled to composition, acquire a right which the law did not give him, and which the institute could not give him by contract, to demand composition from the future heirs of entail. For the Act of 1685 had a double effect. It deprived the superior of his right of refusing to give effect to an entail, notwithstanding that it might operate as an alienation, and it brought in a series of heirs who do not represent the institute, and are not bound by his personal contracts. When the charter has once been granted, therefore, in such terms as the superior has thought fit to exact, within his legal right, the right is determined. He cannot control the series of heirs in whose favour the charter will operate, and he has no right by law, and can acquire none by contract, to treat them as singular successors, for whatever reason he may have chosen to treat the institute as an heir.

I am therefore of opinion that Charles Drummond Moray must be held to have been entered to the same effect as if a writ of confirmation had been granted in absolute and unqualified terms. The payment to which the superior was entitled, in respect of his entry, has been satisfied and discharged, and the defender has no concern with the terms on which the discharge was granted. The claim against him is for his own entry, and as he is entered in the character of an heir of provision, the claim is for relief-duty and not for composition.

LORD ADAM and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found that, in respect of the implied entry with the Crown in the lands held of the Crown, the defender was liable in relief-duty.

Succession—Vesting—Conditional institution—Destination over—Heritage—Substitution.—By general disposition and settlement A disposed a share of her heritable and moveable estate to B in liferent allanarly, and to the heirs of B's body in fee, whom failing, to C, and the heirs of his body in fee.

C survived the testator, and was survived by B, the liferentrix, who died unmarried. C left an heir of his body who survived the liferentrix. Held that no fee had vested in C, as the heir of his body was a conditional institute.

Observations on the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance.

MRS JANET ALLISON OR MILLER was at the date of her death infert in certain heritable estate in Dunoon, Argyllshire. By a general disposition and settlement, dated 27th November 1865, she assigned and disposed to "my daughter, Janet Miller, in liferent, for her liferent use allanarly, and to the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing, to my sons, Matthew Miller, John Miller, Alexander Miller, and my daughter Margaret Miller or M'Dougald, equally between them, and share and share alike, and the respective heirs of their bodies in fee," her whole estates, heritable and moveable.

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Low.

Janet Miller enjoyed the liferent provided to her by the settlement, and died in 1890 without issue.

Matthew Miller, John Miller, and Alexander Miller predeceased their sister Janet, each leaving issue.

Prior to his death in 1883 Matthew made up a title to the one-fourth part pro indiviso of the estate in which his mother, the testator, had been infert, and disposed of it to James William Turner, solicitor, Greenock.

After the death of the liferentrix, her sister Margaret and the eldest son of each of her three brothers made up a title each to one-fourth pro indiviso share of the heritable estate, and disposed the whole to Mrs Gaw in March 1891.

On 7th December 1892 Mr Turner brought an action against Mrs Gaw for declarator that he was proprietor of one-fourth pro indiviso share of the heritable estate as in right of Matthew Miller, and for reduction of the disposition in favour of the defender so far as it conveyed to her more than three-fourths of the subjects.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's author (the said Matthew Miller) having a right to make up a title to one-fourth share of said piece of ground, and having done so, and thereafter conveyed said one-fourth share to the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (2) The pursuer not having a valid title to any portion of the subjects libelled, the defender is entitled to be assolizied.

On 2d June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) assolizied the defender.*

* "OPINION.—(After narrating facts)—The question is, whether any right in the fee of the subjects vested prior to Janet Miller's death? The pursuer contends that the fee vested in the sons and daughters called nominatim, subject to divestiture in the event (which did not happen) of Janet Miller leaving heirs of her body. The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that no right vested in anyone until it was ascertained by the death of Janet Miller without issue that she had no heirs of her body.

"If the destination had been to Janet Miller in liferent, and her 'issue' or 'children' in fee, that would have been a disposition of the fee capable of taking effect at the death of the testator. If Janet Miller had children in existence at the testator's death the fee would, in the case supposed, have vested

No. 106. The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—On the death of the testator one-fourth of the estate vested in Matthew Miller, subject to defeasance in the event of Janet Miller leaving children.¹ That event had not occurred, and the pursuer having received a valid title to the subjects from Matthew was entitled to decree. It might have been different if there had been a trust. Here was no trust, and if the contention of the defender was sound the fee must have been in pendente. But that view had been rejected in the case of M'Lay v. Borland,² which was not distinguishable from the present case. The distinction drawn by the Lord Ordinary between a destination to "children" and to "the heirs of the body" was not sound.

Turner v. Gaw.

Argued for the defender ;—The doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance had no application to the case of a direct conveyance of heritage. It had only been applied in cases of mixed succession settled in trust. Otherwise, if it were applicable to heritage then the substitute might (as being in right of the fee though subject to divestiture) make up a title to and then sell the subjects, and so jeopardise the right of the original institutes, the first objects of the testator's benevolence, for the feudal title being complete in the person of the purchaser there would only remain at most a personal obligation to divest. No difficulty arose from in them. If Janet Miller had no children at the time of the testator's death, then I think that the result of the more recent authorities is that the persons called nominatim would have taken a vested interest in the fee, subject to defeasance or divestiture in the event of Janet Miller having children. The reason why the nominatim legatees would have taken such vested interest appears to me to be that the form of the bequest is a conveyance of the fee as at the death of the testator. If there were children of Janet Miller in existence at that date, it cannot be doubtful that the fee would vest in them, because there would in the case which I am supposing be a direct conveyance to them which would immediately take effect. If there were not children of Janet Miller in existence at that date, I think that the principle upon which it would be held that there was contingent vesting in the conditional institutes named is that the intention of the testator was, that failing children of Janet Miller, the conditional institutes should take precisely what her children would have taken, that is, a fee of the estate from the testator's death.

"In the present case, however, even if Janet Miller had had children in existence at the testator's death nothing in my opinion would have vested in them, because the bequest is not to her children but to the 'heirs of her body,' a class which could not be ascertained until her death. The disposition therefore to the 'heirs of the body of Janet Miller' was not intended to take effect, and could not possibly take effect, until her death. But if the disposition to the institutes could only take effect at Janet Miller's death, I do not think that it could be held to take effect at an earlier date as regards the conditional institutes.

"The case may also be regarded as one of conditional bequest. The right of the sons and daughter named was conditional upon Janet Miller dying without leaving heirs of her body, and until that condition was purified I do not think that anything vested in them.

"The pursuer relied upon the case of M'Lay v. Borland (3 R. 1124). That, however, was a very peculiar case, and I do not think that any general principle can be deduced from it. The view which was taken by the majority of the Judges of the First Division appears to have been adopted as the only way of avoiding the anomaly of the fee of heritage being in pendente. I do not think that there is any question here of the fee being in pendente. The conveyance is to Janet Miller for her liferent use alienably, and to the heirs of her body in fee. Under that conveyance it seems to me that, according to a well-settled principle, a fiduciary fee for the heirs of her body vested in Janet Miller."

the fee being in pendente. The liferentrix held a fiduciary fee for her children.¹ The facts in *M' Lay v. Borland*² were very special, and that case could not form a precedent. But apart altogether from the consideration that the estate was heritable, this case was ruled by Bell v. Cheape.³ The right of Janet's brothers was clearly contingent on their surviving her, and there was a conditional institution of the heirs of their bodies if they predeceased her. There was thus a destination over, and not a case of the conditional institution of a class of persons ascertained at the death of the testator, and there was no room, therefore, for the application of the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance.⁴ Accordingly, nothing having vested in Matthew Miller, the disposition by him to the pursuer carried nothing.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is, whether a disposition granted in the pursuer's favour by the late Matthew Miller of one-fourth part pro indiviso of the fee of certain subjects is a valid disposition or not. If not, the pursuer has no title to insist in this action. The question depends on whether or not the pro indiviso fee thereby disposed was vested in Matthew Miller at the date of the disposition; and that again depends on the construction of a general disposition and settlement, dated 27th November 1865, left by his mother Mrs Miller.

By that deed Mrs Miller disposed to and in favour of her daughter Janet Miller in liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and to the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing; to and in favour of her sons, Matthew Miller, John Miller, and Alexander Miller, and her daughter, Margaret Miller, equally between them, share and share alike, and the respective heirs of their bodies in fee, her whole estate, heritable and moveable. Matthew Miller predeceased the liferentrix, his sister Janet Miller.

I think that this case is ruled by Bell v. Cheape, 7 D. 614, and that consequently no fee vested in the sons, Matthew, John, and Alexander Miller, or in the daughter Margaret, a morte testatoris, but that their right was contingent on their surviving the liferentrix; that the heirs of their bodies respectively were conditionally instituted to them; and that, therefore, in the event of any of them predeceasing the liferentrix, the heirs of their bodies would take on her death without issue.

If this be so, then Matthew Miller, having predeceased the liferentrix, never had any right to the subjects, and the share which he would have taken had he survived passed to his son Matthew.

It is maintained, however, that the doctrine of vesting subject to divestiture applies in this case, and that a fee vested in Matthew and in the other sons and daughter, subject to divestiture in the event of the liferentrix Janet leaving heirs of her body—an event which did not happen. It appears to me, however, that this is not a case to which that principle applies.

The conditions necessary for its application are thus formulated by the late

No. 106. Lord President in the case of Steel's Trustees v. Steel, in 16 R. 204,—“I think,” he says, “the result of all the cases on this subject may be summarised thus : Where a fund is settled on daughters of the testator for their liferent use allenerly, and their children, if any, in fee, whom failing, to another person or persons in absolute property, with no further destination, the vesting of the fee in the last-named person or persons will depend ” on certain considerations which he proceeds to point out.

Feb. 20, 1894.
Turner v. Gaw.

But the conditions precedent, under which alone certain considerations have to be regarded, do not exist in this case, because the fee is not given in absolute property to the sons and daughter with no further destination. There is the further destination to the heirs of their bodies respectively.

Now, the importance of that further destination comes out very clearly in that case from his Lordship's desiring to correct an error in the report of his opinion in the previous case of Haldane's Trustees. He says,—“My words, as reported, are,—‘It cannot be disputed that if the residue of an estate destined to A in liferent, and his issue in fee, and failing his leaving issue, then on the expiry of the liferent to B, no right vests in B till the death of the liferenter without issue. This was authoritatively settled in the case of Bell v. Cheape.’ Now,” he goes on to say, “this, as it stands, is not sound law, and nothing of the kind was settled in Bell v. Cheape. But the blunder consists in this, that after the words ‘on the expiry of the liferent to B’ there ought to be added ‘and his heirs, executors, and assignees,’ which makes the proposition good law, and truly represents the judgment in Bell v. Cheape, for that judgment proceeded on the ground that B's heirs and executors were called as conditional institutes after B, and were entitled to succeed in place of B if he predeceased the death of the liferenter and the term of payment.” So, in this case, the heirs of the body of Matthew were called as conditional institutes after him, and would have been entitled to succeed in his place if he predeceased the liferentrix Janet.

On the authority, therefore, of these two cases, I concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, although I do not concur in the grounds on which he has rested his judgment. I do not think that the decision of the case at all depends on the fact that the destination is to “heirs of the body” and not to “children.” I also wish to say that I doubt whether the doctrine of vesting, subject to divesting, would have been applicable in the present case, even although there had been no ulterior destination to the heirs of the body. It will be observed that it is the case of a direct disposition of a heritable subject, without the intervention of a trust. I have always understood it to be settled law, since the case of Newlands, that a conveyance to A for his liferent use allenerly and to his children, or the heirs of his body nascituri, in fee vested a fiduciary fee in A for his children, and I do not at present see how a fiduciary fee being vested in one person for that person's children or issue is consistent with a beneficial fee in the same subjects being at the same time vested in another person.

Neither do I at present see why the person in whom the beneficial fee is said to be vested may not make up a title and sell the subjects, and so defeat the rights of children who may come subsequently into existence.

It is not, however, necessary to decide the question in this case, but I desire to reserve my opinion should the case hereafter occur for decision.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in all that Lord Adam has said.

In the first place, I assent to the view indicated by Lord Adam that no decision on the vesting of a beneficiary interest under a trust can ever be an authority on the construction of a heritable destination. The fundamental principles applicable to the construction of such destinations are altogether diverse, and inapplicable the one to the other. In a proper heritable destination, of course, the principle of construction is substitution; while in that of a trust destination the principle is always conditional institution. If I leave heritable estate to A in liferent, and to B, whom failing, to C in fee, or it may be to any number of substitutes in succession, the liferent and the fee always, and necessarily, vest concurrently in the liferenter and the first-named fiar; and it makes no difference in the construction what words ("whom failing" or, "on the death of A") are used to connect the names of the different persons who are to take in succession. Accordingly, there can be no suspension of vesting in such a case. The exception which Lord Adam has noticed of a disposition to a parent in liferent, and to his heirs or his issue in fee, introduces a third principle of construction distinct from the two to which I have referred; because, in this case, the parent is a beneficiary to the extent of his own liferent, and he holds in trust for the interest of his children, but, as I take it, universally on the condition that each child takes a vested interest on its birth. I know of no such thing as suspension of vesting under a direct heritable destination in liferent and fee except the necessary suspension until a fiar is born.

The other point on which I have a view is the proposed application of the rule of vesting subject to defeasance. I agree, for the reasons already given, that it is altogether inapplicable to this case; but I think that, even if this were a case of trust, it is not a case for the application of the doctrine, because the necessary condition of vesting subject to defeasance is that, if the original institution, say of issue, were absent or supposed to be absent from the deed, the persons next in order would take a vested interest a morte testatoris; and that, as explained by the late Lord President in the passage read, can only be where they are a class of persons definitely ascertained. If they are a class of persons not ascertained, and the period of distribution is postponed, then it is evident that even if there were no original destination to issue, that class could not take a vested interest at death, because the presumption always is that the words of survivorship or conditional institution are referred to the period when the trust expires.

With these observations, which do not differ in any way from Lord Adam's opinion, I concur in the judgment proposed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in Lord Adam's opinion as to the construction of the gift in the general disposition, the effect of which we are to determine. I also agree with him in desiring to reserve my opinion as to the application of the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance to the case of a direct conveyance to a donee in liferent, and the heirs of his or her body in fee, with a series of substitutions failing heirs of the liferenter's body, which may, of course, operate as conditional institution in the event of no such heirs existing. It does not appear to me to be necessary to decide that question in the present case, and I desire to reserve my opinion upon it.

THE LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

MISS FLORENCE WRIGHT, Second Party.—D. Dundas—Constable.

REV. PATRICK ARKLEY WRIGHT HENDERSON AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—Johnston—Macfarlane.

Succession—Faculties and powers—Power to appoint “under conditions”—Appointment in part ultra vires.—By antenuptial marriage-contract trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses “to pay over or assign” certain funds to the child or children of the marriage “in such proportions and at such times and under such conditions” as the survivor of the spouses should appoint.

The spouses were survived by three children of the marriage.

The surviving spouse in his trust-disposition and settlement, professing to exercise the power of appointment, directed his trustees to “lay out and invest the third part or share falling to his daughter F.” in their own names, and to pay over the annual proceeds to F. during her life, and “in the event of her being married, and her husband surviving her,” to pay the annual proceeds to him, and upon the death of the longest liver of F. and her husband, then to hold the funds for behoof of F.'s children. Failing children of F., the trustees were directed at the death of the survivor of F. and her husband to pay the funds “to such persons and in such manner” as F. should direct.

In a question between the trustees and F. (who was seventy-five years of age and unmarried), F. contended that the power had been invalidly exercised. Held (1) that the appointment was not invalid because it restricted F.'s right to a liferent, with a power to test; and (2) that although the provisions in favour of F.'s husband and children were ultra vires and ineffectual, their invalidity did not affect the gift of the power of disposal in the event of F. having no children.

Succession—Vesting—Payment postponed till death of liferenter without children.—A truster by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to hold a fund for behoof of his daughter F., and of any husband she might marry who should survive her in liferent, and on the death of the survivor, for behoof of their children. Failing children of F., then the trustees were directed at the death of F., or of her husband, if he survived her, to pay the fund to the children of the truster's son W. if any then existing, and failing such children, to pay one half of the fund to W. himself or his next of kin.

W. survived the truster, and died unmarried. At the date of his death F. was his sole next of kin. In a question between F. (who was unmarried, and seventy-five years of age) and the trustees, F. contended that one half of the fund had vested in her subject to defeasance in the event of her having children. Held that vesting was postponed until the death of F.

1ST DIVISION. By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 27th April 1813, entered into between Mr John Wright, of Broom, in the county of Stirling, and Miss Helen Tovey, the latter conveyed to trustees certain sums of money to be held by them for the conjunct liferent use of her and her husband and the survivor, “and after the death of the survivor of the said parties, then the said trustees shall pay over or assign the principal sums vested in them in trust as aforesaid to the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, in such proportions, and at such times, and under such conditions as the said survivor shall direct and appoint, and failing any such direction and appointment, then the said trustees shall, after the death of the survivor of the said John Wright and Helen Tovey, pay over or assign the trust-funds and estate among the children of the said intended marriage, equally, share and share alike, at such times as they may think proper, and, at furthest, at their respective majorities, and until the term of payment of the said shares, the said trustees shall have full power to pay so much of the interest of the sums vested in them as aforesaid, to the said children respectively entitled to the same, as shall not exceed the interest of their respective shares of the principal sum to which they may be entitled. . . .”

Wright's
Trustees v.
Wright.

Mr John Wright survived his wife, and died on 4th March 1861. There were five children of the marriage, three of whom survived their parents, viz., (1) William, who died unmarried in 1886; (2) Hamilton, who married the Rev. Robert Henderson, and died in 1876, leaving two children, viz., the Rev. Patrick Arkley Wright Henderson of Wadham College, Oxford, and of Broom, and Hamilton George Henderson of Allan Park, Stirling; and (3) Florence.

Mr John Wright left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 21st February 1855, by the third purpose of which he, inter alia, directed the marriage-contract trustees to pay over the whole of the funds vested in them to the trustees under his settlement to be applied by the latter as follows:—One-third to be paid over to the marriage-contract trustees of his daughter Hamilton, “another third part of the foresaid trust-funds shall be held by my said trustees in the manner hereinafter directed for behoof of my said daughter Florence Wright in liferent, and to the parties after named in fee,” and the remaining third to be paid over to his son William.

By the fourth purpose the truster, inter alia, directed as follows:—“Second, that my trustees shall lay out and invest the third part or share falling to my daughter Florence of her mother's fortune . . . and also the further sum of £2000 upon good heritable or other security, taking the securities in their own names, and shall pay over the annual interest or proceeds thereof to my said daughter Florence Wright, during all the days of her life, and in the event of her being married, and her husband surviving her, then the annual proceeds thereof shall be paid to him during all the days of his life, and upon the death of the longest liver of the said Florence Wright and any husband she may marry, then the said trust funds shall be held for behoof of the lawful children of the said Florence Wright . . . and failing children of the said Florence Wright, then at her death, or if married, at the death of the longest liver of her and her husband, the said trust funds shall be paid as follows, viz.:—The share of her mother's fortune aforesaid . . . shall be paid to such parties, and in such manner as my said daughter shall direct by any writing under her hand, and failing such writing, to her nearest in kin equally, and the aforesaid sum of £2000 shall be paid to the lawful children of the said William Wright, my son, equally if he has any lawful children at the period of the death of his said sister Florence without issue, or in the event of her being married, upon the death of the survivor of her and her husband, and failing lawful children of the said William Wright then existing, then the one-half of the said sum of £2000 shall be paid to himself or to his next of kin, and the other half to the children of the aforesaid Hamilton Wright or Henderson, my daughter, share and share alike.

On Mr John Wright's death his trustees paid one-third of Mrs Wright's estate to his son William Wright, another third to the marriage-contract trustees of his daughter Hamilton, and they retained and invested in their own names the remaining third share, together with the sum of £2000, and regularly paid the income thereof to the truster's daughter Miss Florence Wright, in accordance with the directions of his trust-disposition and settlement.

In 1893, when Miss Florence Wright, who was unmarried, was seventy-five years of age, questions were raised by her with regard to her rights in the two funds liferented by her, and a special case was presented to

No. 107. the Court. The parties to it were (1) the trustees under Mr John Wright's settlement; (2) Miss Florence Wright; (3) the two children of the truster's daughter Hamilton. The only questions to which it is necessary to advert were:—"1. Has the power of appointment of the marriage-contract funds of the wife, conferred upon the survivor of the spouses under the antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Wright been well and validly exercised by Mr Wright in his trust-disposition and settlement quoad the share appointed to Miss Florence Wright? 3. Did a right to one-half of the fee of the said sum of £2000 vest a morte testatoris in the said William Wright? or, on the death of the said William Wright without issue, in his then next of kin? or, is vesting postponed until the death of the said Miss Wright?"

Feb. 20, 1894.
Wright's
Trustees v.
Wright.

The second party maintained, in the first place, that with respect to her share of her mother's fortune she was, on the death of her father, vested with a fee therein, under the destination in her parents' marriage-contract; that her father, Mr Wright, was not entitled under the power of apportionment conferred upon him by such marriage-contract, either to limit such estate of fee to an estate of life, or to confer a benefit on grandchildren or other strangers to the power; that the apportionment was accordingly either wholly or partially invalid, and that she was entitled to payment free of the conditions imposed by her father, the testator; and in the second place that, with respect to the half of the fund of £2000, the fee thereof vested in William Wright's next of kin at his death, and that she was vested with the fee thereof as his sole next of kin at that date, though she was not entitled to demand payment of it during her lifetime, or alternatively, that the fee of the said half vested in William Wright.

The first and third parties maintained that the power of appointment had been validly exercised, and the second parties further maintained that no vesting took place until the death of Miss Florence Wright.

The first and third parties argued;—(1) The power of appointment had been validly exercised by Mr Wright. So far as he had restricted his daughter's right to a bare life with a power to test, the present case could not be distinguished from the cases of Wallace and Lennox.¹ The variation in the expression of the power made no difference. Its meaning and effect were substantially the same. Whether or not the provisions in favour of the daughter's husband and children were ultra vires was immaterial, for she was unmarried, and the question did not arise. Besides if they were held to be invalid, the appointment quoad ultra would remain unaffected.² In Mackie's case³ the marriage-contract trustees were directed to hold for the children in fee. (2) Vesting was clearly postponed until the death of the life-tenant. Before that event it was not certain that she would not have children. There was no room for the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance, for there was a series of destinations over, the ultimate destination being to a class of persons, the next of kin of William Wright, who were not ascertained at the death of the testator.⁴

Argued for the second party;—1. A power of appointment such as had been conferred on Mr Wright did not entitle him to limit an estate of fee to an estate of liferent, or to confer a benefit on grandchildren or other strangers to the power.¹ In the cases of Lennox's Trustees and Wallace's Trustees,² the terms of the power given were much wider than in the present case. Even assuming that the restriction of Miss Wright's interest to a bare liferent with a power to test would have been competent, the truster had gone farther and had sought to confer a benefit on her husband and her children who were strangers to the power. So far, therefore, the appointment was clearly ultra vires, and being invalid and ineffectual in part, the whole appointment fell.³

Trustees v.
Wright.

2. The terms of the destination were almost the same as those in recent cases in which it had been held that vesting took place in the ultimate objects of a series of destinations over, subject to defeasance.⁴ It was unnecessary to consider the effect of a destination to the next of kin of a person who survived the testator before that person's death, for William Wright had died and his next of kin were therefore now a class fixed and ascertained, and when there was an ultimate destination to a class the presumption was in favour of vesting as soon as the individuals composing the class were ascertained.⁵ Miss Wright, being her brother's sole next of kin at the date of his death, had therefore a vested right to the fund.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The first and principal question in this case is, whether a power of appointment, contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr and Mrs Wright, has been validly exercised quoad the share thereby appointed to their daughter Miss Florence Wright, who is the second party to this case.

The fund which is the subject of appointment consists of certain sums of money assigned by Mrs Wright to the marriage-contract trustees. They are directed to hold it in trust for the conjunct liferent of Mr and Mrs Wright, and during the subsistence of the marriage to pay the interest to Mr Wright, and after the dissolution of the marriage, to the survivor, and after the death of the survivor, to pay the principal sums to the child or children of the marriage, "in such proportions and at such times and under such conditions as the said survivor shall direct and appoint," and failing such direction and appointment, then to and among the children of the marriage equally, all as therein specified.

I do not think it can be doubted that, under this direction, the fund in question belonged to the children of the marriage, subject only to its division or apportionment among them by the surviving spouse.

Mr Wright survived his wife and died on 4th March 1861. At his death there were three children of the marriage in life, one son, William, and two daughters, Hamilton and Florence. Hamilton married the Rev. Mr Henderson,

Wright's
Trustees v.
Wright.

Mr Wright left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 21st February 1855, by which he professed to exercise the power of appointment in question.

By the third purpose of the trust he directed the trustees under the antenuptial contract of marriage to pay over the whole trust funds vested in them to his testamentary trustees, who are the first parties to this case. He then directed his testamentary trustees to pay one-third part of these funds, which are the funds subject to appointment, to the marriage-contract trustees of his daughter Hamilton Wright or Henderson; another third part thereof he directed to be held by his trustees in the manner therein directed, "for behoof of my said daughter Florence Wright in liferent, and to the parties after named in fee," and the remaining third part he directed to be paid to his son William.

By this appointment, therefore, the whole fund is divided into three parts, two going to the other children of the marriage, and as regards these there is no dispute. It is in reference to the remaining third that the present questions have arisen.

Now, this share is directed to be held for Miss Wright in liferent, the fee being given "to the persons after named." These persons are to be found in the fourth purpose of the settlement, and if Miss Wright is entitled to a fee of the share, her right thereto must be found in the directions therein contained, as so far a liferent only has been given to her.

By this fourth purpose Mr Wright directs the trustees to invest the fund, and to pay the interest to Florence Wright during all the days of her life. He then provides for two possible events, that of Florence marrying and having children, and that of her not marrying.

In the first of these events, he directs his trustees to pay the produce of the fund to her husband during his life, if he should survive her, and, on the death of the longest liver of her and her husband, to hold the fund in trust for her children, in such manner, and in such proportions, as their parents, or the survivor of them, should direct, and failing such directions, then for the children equally, share and share alike, payable on their respectively attaining majority or being married.

The truster then provides that, failing children of Miss Florence Wright, at her death, or, if married, at the death of the longest liver of her and her husband, the fund in question "shall be paid to such parties, and in such manner as my said daughter shall direct by any writing under her hand, and failing such writing, to her nearest of kin equally."

So far as regards the provisions above mentioned in favour of the possible husband and children of Miss Florence Wright, I think that they are ultra vires of Mr Wright. If such persons had come into existence they would not have been objects of the power. The only objects of the power are the children of Mr and Mrs Wright, who alone have a right to share in the fund. So far, therefore, as regards these provisions, I think the appointment is invalid.

But in so far as the appointment provides a liferent of the fund to Miss Wright, with, in a certain event, an absolute right to dispose of the fee, I think that it is a valid appointment. Had these provisions in favour of Miss Wright stood alone,—that is to say, had they not been mixed up with other provisions, which are invalid,—they must have received effect. The last case on the subject is that of Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace, in 18 R. 921, in which the trustees under the antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr and Mrs Wallace were directed, after the death of the survivor of the spouses, to pay over certain funds to and for behoof of the surviving children of the marriage in such shares and proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations, as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. No. 107.

Feb. 20, 1894.
Wright's
Trustees v.
Wright.

The children of the marriage were, therefore, just as in this case, the only objects of the appointment. The spouses by trust-disposition and settlement directed their testamentary trustees to hold these funds for behoof of their children in equal shares, and to pay to them the income; and as regards the shares of the daughters, the trustees were directed to settle the share of each daughter upon her at her marriage for her sole and exclusive use during her marriage, so that the same should be held for her behoof, with power to her to dispose of the fee of the same by any testamentary deed, and failing her disposing of the same by such deed, to her heirs and executors; and in regard to the shares of any daughter who might not marry, the trustees were directed to pay the same, according to the directions which such daughter might leave by any testamentary deed, and failing such deed, to her heirs and executors.

It was contended in that case by the daughters, who were all unmarried at the time, that the appointment was invalid in respect that the spouses had no power to restrict their right to a liferent with a power to test. The Court, however, following the case of Lennox's Trustees v. Lennox, 8 R. 14, held that the appointment was valid.

I think that in this respect the present case cannot be distinguished from these two cases, and must be ruled by them.

The gift of the share, therefore, would not fail because a fee of the share was not given to Miss Wright in terms, but only a liferent, with the power of disposal thereof.

But, as has been pointed out, the fee of the share is first provided to Miss Wright's children, if any, and the power of disposal of the share is only given to her in the event of the failure of children, and the question arises whether the gift of a liferent to the surviving husband and of the fee to the children, in the first place, although altogether ultra vires, has the effect of rendering invalid the subsequent provisions or gifts in the appointment, and, if not, what is its effect?

Now I do not think that an appointment is to be considered as altogether invalid because there may be contained in it certain gifts or provisions which are ultra vires and cannot receive effect. Of this there is an example to be found in the case of M'Donald v. M'Donald, 2 R. (H. L.) 125. In that case the joint donees of the power, Sir John and Lady M'Donald, provided a liferent of the fund, which was the subject of the power, to Sir John. This was ultra vires, and it was contended that it rendered the whole appointment invalid. In disposing of this the Lord Chancellor said,—“I certainly do not give any weight to an argument which was addressed to your Lordships in favour of the respondents—that because the joint deed of division purported to give to Sir John M'Donald, in the event of his surviving his wife, a life interest in the whole of the trust property, therefore all that was done by way of appointment subsequently to the giving of that life interest was invalid. There was an attempt to give the whole of the income to Sir John during his life in the event of his surviving Lady M'Donald. In point of fact he did not survive Lady M'Donald.

No. 107. Under these circumstances it appears to me it would be entirely contrary to reason, and as far as I know quite without authority, to hold that an attempted disposition not in any way interfering with that which was legitimately within the object of the power of distribution of the property, and only to take effect in an event which never has happened, should in any way militate against the validity of the subsequent appointment." I think, therefore, that, on the authority of that case, the gift of a liferent of the fund to a possible husband of Miss Wright may be disregarded.

Trustees v.
Wright.

The next question is as to the effect which the gift of a fee to the possible children of Miss Wright has upon the subsequent gift to her.

I am not aware that there is any decision in the law of Scotland on the subject, but the rule of the law of England seems to be that such a provision, although ultra vires, is not to be wholly disregarded, and that it depends upon the event of there being children or not whether the ulterior grant to a proper object of the power shall receive effect. The leading case seems to be that of Crompe v. Barrow, 1799, 4 Ves. 681, which resembles in its circumstances the present case very closely. In that case, by a settlement made previous to the marriage of John James, and Mary Barrow, certain funds were assigned to trustees to pay the income to Mary Barrow during her life, and after her decease, upon trust for the children of Mary Barrow by a former, or by the intended marriage, in such shares and proportions, and to be paid at such ages and in such manner as she should direct by her last will and testament, and failing such direction, to the children equally.

Mary Barrow by her settlement directed one moiety of the trust fund to be paid to her daughter, Frances James; and as to the other moiety, she directed the income to be paid to her son Charles, and after his decease, the fee to be paid to his wife and children, as he might appoint, and failing such appointment, equally; and in the event of Charles dying without leaving wife and children, to her daughter Frances James.

As regards this moiety of the fund, the Court declared "that the same is well appointed for the benefit of the defendant, Charles Barrow, for his life, according to the trusts of the said will and appointment, and that the appointment of the said moiety of the said trust premises after his death in trust for his wife and children is invalid, the same not being well appointed by the terms of the power in the said marriage-settlement; and declared that, in case Charles Barrow shall die without leaving a wife or child surviving, the same, according to the said appointment, will belong to the defendant Frances James, her executors and administrators."

In giving judgment the Master of the Rolls said,—“This limitation over to Frances James is, if Charles Barrow should die without leaving a wife or child surviving. It fails as far as it affects to give interests to the children, but is there any occasion to make it fail upon the other point—the gift over to a person who is an object of the power? There are two alternatives—If Charles Barrow leaves no wife or children at his death, then the limitation over, being to a good object, shall take effect. If he does leave a wife and child, then it cannot take effect.”

I know no reason why the law of Scotland should be different from the law of England in this respect, and as it appears to me that this case of Crompe v. Barrow is exactly in point, I think we should follow it, and pronounce a similar judgment in this case.

The next question relates to a sum of £1000, half of a sum of £2000, which was Mr Wright's own property, and which he could dispose of as he chose. Mr Wright mixed up this sum with the antenuptial contract fund, and the directions in the deed are so far made applicable to both. Thus he directs his trustees to pay the interest of the joint fund to Miss Wright, and after her death to her husband, if she married and he survived, and upon the death of the longest liver, to hold the trust funds for her children in such proportions as they or the survivor might direct, and failing such directions, for their children equally, the share of a child predeceasing the period of payment without issue accreasing to the survivor. The truster then separates the two funds, and directs that, failing children of Miss Wright, at her death, or if married, at the death of the longest liver of her or her husband, the foresaid sum of £2000 shall be paid to the children of William Wright equally, and failing such children then existing, then one half of the said sum of £2000 to William Wright himself, or to his next of kin, and the other half as there directed.

Trustees v.
Wright.

It appears to me to be very clear that under this destination no fee vested a morte testatoris, or can vest until the death of the liferentrix, Miss Wright, without children, a contingency which has not yet occurred.

It was maintained, however, that a fee vested in William a morte, subject to defeasance in the event of Miss Wright leaving children. But that view is quite untenable, because any right which William might ultimately come to have was postponed to that of his children, and was contingent on there being no children of his own in existence at the death of the liferentrix. William could not therefore take a beneficial fee, and such a thing as a fiduciary fee being taken subject to divestiture, I have not heard of. A fee subject to divestiture is only recognised where, failing children, an absolute right of property is given, without ulterior destinations—a state of matters which does not exist here—See Steel v. Steel, 16 R. 204.

I think, therefore, that we should find that the vesting of this £1000 is postponed till the death of Miss Wright.

These are all the questions that require to be answered.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the power of appointment of the marriage-contract funds of the wife conferred upon the survivor of the spouses under the antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Wright has been well and validly exercised by Mr Wright in his trust-disposition and settlement in so far as regards the share thereof appointed to Miss Florence Wright: Further, find and declare that, as regards the one half of the fee of the said sum of £2000 mentioned in the fourth purpose of Mr Wright's said trust-disposition and settlement, vesting is postponed until the death of the said Miss Wright: Therefore answer the third alternative of the third question in the affirmative, and decern."

WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Petitioners (Reclaimers).—

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), secs. 84 and 86—Interest on purchase-money from date of entering on land—Railway.—Section 84 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, enacts that where the promoters of an undertaking desire to enter upon lands to be taken under the Act before the amount of compensation has been fixed, it shall be lawful for them to deposit in bank by way of security a sum to be fixed by a valuator as the value of the lands, and, if required, to give the owner a bond for the amount of such deposit with five per cent interest from the date of the deposit till compensation is paid.

Held (1) that when the owner of lands so entered upon dispenses with the granting of the bond, he is nevertheless entitled to 5 per cent interest upon the compensation from the date of the promoters entering upon his land till the compensation is paid; and (2) that he is entitled to payment of such interest out of the sum deposited by the promoters.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Low.

On 13th December 1893 the West Highland Railway Company presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary, praying for warrant on the Bank of Scotland to pay to them the sums of £1350 and £130, being the sums deposited on 24th December 1889, in security for lands about to be taken from Edward Gordon Place of Loch Dochart, and John Christie, tenant of the farm of Inverhaggernie, both in Perthshire, respectively, for the purposes of the company's undertaking.

It appeared from the petition and answers lodged by Mr Place and Mr Christie that the petitioners availed themselves of the provisions of section 84 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and entered on 21st June 1890 upon the lands in question without the consent of the respondents.* A valuation was accordingly made by a valuator appointed by the Board of Trade, and the amounts so ascertained were deposited in bank in the names of the respondents respectively.

Thereafter the amounts actually due to the respondents were settled by arbitration. The oversman in his awards did not deal with the question of interest on the sums awarded.

The petitioners tendered payment of the purchase-money and of the expenses of the arbitration, and interest from the date of the decreets.

* Section 84 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provides,—“If the promoters of the undertaking shall be desirous of entering upon and using any such lands before an agreement shall have been come to or an award made or verdict given for the purchase-money or compensation to be paid by them in respect of such lands: It shall be lawful for the promoters of the undertaking to deposit in bank, by way of security, . . . such a sum as shall, by a valuator appointed by . . . be determined to be the value of such lands, or of the interest therein which such party is entitled to, or enabled to sell or convey, and also, if required so to do, to give to such party a bond under the hand of the secretary . . . with two sufficient securities, . . . for a sum equal to the sum so to be deposited, for payment to such party . . . of all such purchase-money or compensation . . . together with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the time of entering on such lands until such purchase-money or compensation shall be paid to such party, or deposited in the bank for the benefit of the parties interested in such lands, under the provisions herein contained; and upon such deposit by way of security being made as aforesaid, and such bond being delivered or tendered to such non-consenting party as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the promoters of the undertaking to enter upon and use such lands. . . .”

In the petition they averred that they had performed the conditions required of them by the Act, and that they were entitled under section 86 of the Act * to receive back the money deposited as security. No. 108.

The respondents averred "that the petitioners did not grant bonds for payment of the purchase-money or compensation, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from the date of entering on said lands till payment of the purchase-money or compensation, as provided by section 84 of the said Act. The respondents have not hitherto demanded such bonds to be granted, nor have they waived their right to require them. They now require them to be granted, or otherwise that interest be paid on the purchase-money or compensation found to be due to them, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from 21st June 1890, when the petitioners entered on said lands, till payment. The respondents all along relied on the petitioners paying such interest in the same way as if bonds had been granted therefor in terms of the statute. . . . The petitioners have not performed the conditions required of them by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. Instead of offering to pay interest to the respondents from 21st June 1890, the date of entering on the lands, in the same way as if they had granted bonds in terms of the 84th section of the said Act, they have tendered interest only from the dates of the decrees-arbitral, and have refused to make any arrangement with the respondents with regard to their claim of interest for the period prior to the dates of the decrees-arbitral. The respondents respectfully submit that, under the 86th section of the said Act, the Court have the power to, and should order payment to the respondents out of the money deposited in bank, of interest on the purchase-money or compensation payable to them from the date of entering on the lands till payment, at the rate of five per cent per annum; or otherwise, that the interest accrued on the deposits should be paid to the respondents; and that the prayer of the petition should either be refused, or granted only on such conditions as to payment of interest to the respondents as shall be fixed by your Lordships."

The petitioners maintained in argument that the respondents had waived their claim to interest by letter stating that they did not wish bonds to be granted in terms of the Act. This letter was read to the Lord Ordinary, but was not referred to in the Inner-House.

On 26th January 1894, the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) That the petitioners, having entered upon the lands belonging to the respondents mentioned in the petition, before an award was given for the purchase-moneys or compensations to be paid by them in respect of said lands, are liable to make payment to the respondents of interest upon such purchase-moneys or compensations from the time of entering upon such lands until the date of payment of such purchase-moneys or compensations, unless the respondents have waived their right to claim such interest, or have otherwise debarred

* Section 86 of the Act provides,—"The money so deposited as last aforesaid shall remain in the bank by way of security to the parties whose lands shall so have been entered upon for the performance of the bond to be given by the proprietors of the undertaking as hereinbefore mentioned; . . . and upon the conditions of such bond being fully performed, it shall be lawful for the Court of Session, upon a like application, to order the money so deposited, . . . together with the accumulation thereof, to be repaid or transferred to the promoters of the undertaking; or if such conditions shall not be fully performed, it shall be lawful for the said Court to order the same to be applied in such manner as it shall think fit, for the benefit of the parties for whose security the same shall so have been deposited."

themselves from claiming it in whole or in part; (2) that if the respondents have not waived their right to claim, or otherwise debarred themselves from claiming interest as aforesaid, they are entitled to an order for payment of the amount thereof out of the moneys deposited in bank by the petitioners, in terms of the 84th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, in respect that the petitioners have refused to pay to the respondents interest upon the said purchase-moneys or compensations, prior to the date of the awards mentioned in the petition, fixing the amount of the purchase-moneys or compensations payable to the respondents; and (3) that the petitioners are entitled to an order authorising them to uplift the said deposited moneys, except to the extent of £300 and £60, to meet interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum upon the purchase-moneys or compensations, from the date when the petitioners entered upon the said lands until the date of the said awards; therefore grants warrant to and ordains the Bank of Scotland to repay to the petitioners, upon production of a certified copy of this interlocutor, the sums contained in the two remaining deposit-receipts specified in the petition to the extent of £1050 and £70, and ordains the balance of the said sums, namely, £300 and £60, to be re-deposited upon two deposit-receipts in the same terms as those previously granted: Ordains the petitioners, within fourteen days from the date hereof, to lodge in process a minute setting forth the facts and circumstances upon which they maintain that the respondents waived their right to interest upon the said purchase-moneys or compensations, or otherwise debarred themselves from claiming the said interest in whole or in part; and decerns; quoad ultra continues the cause.*

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that a proprietor, whose lands are taken compulsorily by a railway company, cannot claim interest on the compensation fixed by an arbiter or a jury from a date earlier than that of the award or verdict, if the company have not previously entered upon the lands. That, I think, must be held to be settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Carmichael (2 Scotch App. 56).

"The reason why the statute did not make any provision for interest in such a case appears to me to be this. Although by service of the notice to treat, a contract for the sale and purchase of the lands is concluded, yet, until the amount of the compensation is settled, and paid or consigned, as the case may be, the proprietor continues in the enjoyment of the lands, and he is not entitled both to the proceeds of the lands and also to interest upon the price.

"But if the company take advantage of the provisions of the 84th section of the Act, and enter upon the lands before the amount of the compensation is settled, a different state of matters arises. Even in that case when the question of the amount of compensation comes before an arbiter or a jury, the amount of the compensation falls to be fixed in the same way, and under the same statutory provisions, as in a case in which the company had not obtained previous possession of the lands. But, through no fault of either party, a considerable time may elapse before the amount of compensation is fixed, and it would be unjust if, between the time when the company obtained possession and the date of the award or verdict, the proprietor should receive no consideration for being deprived of his lands, and should have neither the lands nor the price of the lands. In such a case it would be equitable that the proprietor should receive interest upon the price of the lands from the date upon which the company obtained possession.

"The statute seems to me to recognise the proprietor's right to interest in such a case in the 84th section. It is there enacted that, if the promoters shall be desirous of entering upon and using lands before an award or verdict, they shall deposit in bank, by way of security, such a sum as shall, by a valuator to be appointed by the Board of Trade, be determined to be the value of such lands,

The petitioners reclaimed, and argued ;—Under the Act the money deposited represented only the capital value of the lands to be taken, the and shall also, 'if so required to do,' grant a bond to the proprietor, with two sufficient securities, for a sum equal to the sum so to be deposited for payment 'of all such purchase-money or compensation as may in manner hereinbefore provided be determined to be payable by the promoters of the undertaking, in respect of the lands so entered upon, together with interest thereon at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum, from the time of entering on such lands until such purchase-money or compensation shall be paid.'

"If, therefore, a bond in terms of the Act is granted, no question can arise, because in it the company bind themselves to pay interest upon the purchase-money or compensation from the time of entering the lands. But in this case no bond was granted, and a letter was read by the railway company, asking the respondent if he required a bond to be granted, and an answer from him saying that he did not do so. Of course, if the respondent waived his right to interest, there is an end of the matter, but the letters which were read do not, in my opinion, necessarily involve such waiver on the respondent's part. The bond is to be granted for the security of the proprietor, and only if the company are 'required' by the proprietor to do so. If the proprietor has confidence in the sufficiency of the company for whatever sum he may be entitled to claim from them, he may not insist upon a bond being granted, and that, I believe, is what frequently happens. But I do not think that the mere fact that the proprietor does not insist upon a certain security which he might demand being actually granted can affect the amount which the company are liable to pay. Their liability is not affected, although the proprietor's security is lessened.

"It therefore seems to me to lie upon the company here to aver and prove that the respondent waived his right to interest upon the compensation money from the time when they entered upon the lands. They might also perhaps shew (and they indicated that they intended to plead), that the respondent has barred himself from claiming interest for the whole period, by having caused delay in the ascertainment of the amount of compensation.

"The next question is whether the point is competently raised, and can be determined, upon a petition by the company, to uplift the deposited money?

"By the 86th section of the Act, it is provided that, upon the conditions of the bond to be granted in terms of the 84th section being fully performed, it shall be lawful for the Court of Session to order the money to be repaid to the promoters, 'or, if such conditions shall not be fully performed, it shall be lawful for the said Court to order the sum to be applied in such manner as it shall think fit, for the benefit of the parties for whose security the same shall so have been deposited.'

"Now, if it should appear that the respondent intimated to the company that he would not require them to grant a bond, not with the intention of giving up any payment which he would otherwise have been entitled to claim from them, but simply for the convenience of the company, I think that the matter would fall to be dealt with just as if a bond had been granted. But if a bond had been granted, and the company had paid the amount of the compensation, but refused to pay interest thereon, I think that, under the provisions of the section which I have just quoted, I would be entitled to order the interest to be paid out of the deposited fund.

"It therefore appears to me that a portion of the deposited fund, equal to five per cent upon the compensation awarded to the respondent from the date when the company entered upon the lands until the date of the award, should remain in bank until it is ascertained whether, as matter of fact, the respondent waived his right to claim interest, or has otherwise barred himself from claiming interest in whole or in part. I see no reason, however, why the company should not now be authorised to uplift the balance of the deposited money.

"The petition contains no statement of the circumstances upon which the petitioners rely, as shewing that the respondent waived his right to interest, words of the Act being "such a sum as shall by a valuator . . . be determined to be the value of such lands." The only case in which interest was due from the date of entering on the lands was when the landowner insisted on a bond being granted. Payment of interest from the date of entering was no doubt a condition of the bond, if a bond was granted, but it was not a condition attaching to the deposited money. Further, the claim for interest was only a possible claim, as they averred that the landowner here had waived his claim, and the question of whether he was entitled to get interest or not could not competently be tried in a petition to uplift.

Argued for the respondents;—The words "conditions of such bond" in section 86 referred back to the bond mentioned in section 84. That bond was to be "tendered or delivered," and the conditions were, in the view of the statute, as much in the tendered bond as in the delivered bond. One of the conditions of the bond was the payment of interest on the purchase price from the date of entering on the lands. The result of the argument of the petitioners would be that, while a landowner who put the railway company to the expense and trouble of delivering a bond would have ample security not only for principal but for interest from the date of entering, a landowner who trusted to the promise of a solvent railway company would not only have no security for interest, but would not be entitled to get interest.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question mainly argued was whether, where money is deposited under section 84 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and no bond is delivered to the landowner, the railway company are entitled to have the amount of the deposit paid back to them though they have not paid interest on the purchase-money found due. On that general question, which was taken, for the sake of argument, on the footing that the landowner has a claim for interest, the sections stand thus: Section 84 provides that if the promoters of an undertaking are desirous of entering upon lands before the amount of compensation is settled, they may deposit certain money in bank by way of security. Now, the section down to that period does not say for what the money is to be security, but the statute promises the reader to tell him further on. It is erroneous to say that, up to that point, the statute says even that the security is to be for the compensation money; it leaves the thing to be secured, in the meantime, entirely untold. Now, on reading on, it appears to me that the only passage in the Act which can be pointed at as fulfilling that promise occurs thus. The owner is not only secured by the deposit, but by being given, if he likes to take it, a bond, and the statute tells what the obligants in the bond are to bind themselves to, for at that stage it is said in so many words that the amount of the bond shall be the purchase-money, with interest at 5 per cent. Now, the Act says that the bond, having this tenor, is to be delivered or tendered. The owner may take it or leave it, but the man who declines it sees, just as much as he who takes it, what is in the bond; and in the bond it is to appear that interest is secured as well as the purchase-money. Here, then, we have a clear statement of what is to be secured.

or has disentitled himself to claim it. The petitioners are not to blame for that state of the pleadings, because the petition is in the ordinary form, and the question of interest is raised by the answers. It will now, however, be necessary for the petitioners to lodge a specific statement of the circumstances upon which they rest their plea that the respondent is not entitled to interest."

Now, all this becomes even more clear when we look at section 86. That section alone brings the Court of Session into contact with the transaction, and it says that we are entitled to grant warrant for payment of the money "upon the conditions of such bond being fully performed." I ask, "conditions of what bond?" and I answer,—“Of the tendered bond,”—it does not matter whether it has been accepted or dispensed with. Now, this seems quite an intelligent way for the Act to set forth its scheme of security, the only thing at all out of the common being that, instead of beginning by telling what is to be secured alike by the deposit or by the bond, it takes the only time at which the conditions of the obligation come to be written out (i.e., in the bond) as the time for stating them.

West High-

Co. v. Place.

The reason of the thing, it is important to notice, exactly coincides with the conclusion to which I have come, for it would certainly be strange if a landowner, who declined to accept a bond, being satisfied with the deposit, should have no security whatever for interest, while the same man, if he insisted upon getting a bond, should have two securities for interest,—the bond and the deposit. On the question mainly argued to us, then, my opinion is clearly in harmony with the decision of the Lord Ordinary.

The questions raised in the first and second findings of the Lord Ordinary were not so fully argued, but I have heard nothing to lead me to doubt the soundness of the judgment. The case is one of a company taking possession of lands before the amount of compensation is fixed, and I think it clear that interest is due from the date of entry. The case is not similar to, but is just the opposite of, a case in which the award is fixed at the end of the owner's possession. There it is clear that the owner has and can have no claim for interest prior to the award, because up to that time he had been receiving the rents of his lands.

I think that we ought to adhere.

LORD M'LAREN.—The primary obligation of a railway company in cases of compulsory purchase is to make full compensation before entering on the lands, and it is only in the event of the company wishing to enter on the lands in anticipation of the award of compensation that the machinery of secs. 84-86 of the Act comes into operation. I do not think that it would have occurred to any mind, however ingenious, to suggest that there is one case of compensation in which interest is payable, and another in which it is not, had it not been that the amount to be deposited is precisely the sum which is certified to be the value of the lands. That suggested the argument that, so far as the security was concerned, it was only to be security for principal. The argument is altogether fallacious. The reason why only the estimated price is to be deposited is, that it is impossible to say at the time the deposit is made what the amount of interest will be; but the point has not been overlooked by the Legislature, for the owner is entitled to get a bond covering both principal and interest. In sec. 84 it is stated that the deposit is to be in security as therein-after provided. That plainly refers to sec. 86, and when we turn to that section it is as clear as can be that the security is to be for principal and interest. That is made clear by the provision that the company is only entitled to uplift the money if they satisfy the Court that they have performed the conditions of the bond. It is, I think, impossible to confine that position only to cases where bonds have been actually granted; the conditions to be per-

West High-

Co. v. Place.

If in cases where no bond has been granted the company were to be relieved of payment of interest, it would logically follow that they should also be relieved from payment of principal, for principal and interest are put in exactly the same position by the section, but it cannot be intended that a landowner should lose his claim to interest because he is satisfied as to the credit of a perfectly solvent company, and does not demand a bond.

I did not understand from the argument that the alleged waiver was put upon any special circumstances; I thought that it was merely grounded on the fact that a bond was not required. If that is so, I do not see why the respondents should not at once get their money, as I do not think that the circumstance of the omission to take a bond amounts to a relevant averment of waiver.

LORD KINNEAR.—If the promoters of an undertaking do not enter on the lands till the purchase-money is paid or deposited in bank, then it is reasonable that no interest should run prior to the date of payment, for the owner up to that time is left in possession of his land and the railway company of their money. Section 84 of the Act, however, provides for a different set of circumstances. A privilege is there given to the promoter, viz., that he may enter on possession without the landowner's consent, although the compensation has neither been paid nor consigned.

It seems reasonable that the Legislature should provide for payment of interest when the payment of the price of land of which the company has taken actual possession is indefinitely postponed. But I do not think that the matter is left to stand on implication, for payment of interest is expressly provided for in the statute. The 85th section provides that in the event of the promoters entering before payment of the price, they are to give security in two different forms. They are to deposit the amount claimed for the whole lands in their notice to treat, or otherwise the sum determined by a valuator appointed by the Board of Trade, and they are also to give the landowner a bond with two sufficient sureties for payment of the purchase-money or compensation which may be fixed in the manner prescribed by the statute, with interest at the rate of five per cent from the date of their entering upon the land until such purchase-money is paid. The bond which they are thus required to tender does not create the obligation, but only gives effect to an obligation which had previously arisen in consequence of their entering into possession of the lands. The terms of the bond define specifically the obligation which the Legislature intends to impose. But I cannot see any reason to doubt that the obligation remains the same whether delivery of the bond is insisted on or no. It may be that a landowner may discharge his claim for interest, and it is, as I understand, maintained that he has done so in the special circumstances of this case. If so, there will be no obligation to pay interest; but that is a question which remains to be decided. We could not recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and authorise the railway company to uplift the whole sum deposited, unless we were prepared to affirm the proposition that a mere waiver of the right to insist on delivery of a bond necessarily involves an abandonment of the claim to interest. But it is clear enough that, if the landowner were satisfied with the security of the deposited money, he might refrain from insisting on his right to obtain the additional security of a bond guaranteed by two sureties, without the slightest intention to give up any part of his claim. If the petitioners can shew that the claim for interest has been discharged, they may be entitled to uplift the whole deposited sum. But that has not yet been shewn, and in the meantime I agree with the Lord Ordinary that a sufficient sum to meet the respondent's claim must be retained.

Poor—Settlement—Imbecile pauper—Confinement in private lunatic asylum licensed by the Lunacy Board—Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 71), secs. 75 and 95—Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54), sec. 7.—Held (1) that the Lunacy Act, 1857, fixes the permanent burden of a pauper lunatic's settlement in the parish of the lunatic's settlement at the date of seclusion in the district asylum, even in cases where the settlement is derivative; and (2) that this liability is not avoided by reason of the lunatic being confined, with the sanction of the Lunacy Board, in a private asylum licensed by the board and not in the district asylum.

Palmer v. Russell, Dec. 1, 1881, 10 Macph. 185, followed.

In June 1892 Farquharson, inspector of Coupar-Angus, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against Liddell, inspector of Murroes, for payment of £28, 17s. 11d., being the amount paid by the pursuer (after deducting the proportion of the lunacy grant received by him) as the cost of maintaining a pauper lunatic child named William Stewart, in the Baldovan Institution for the training of imbecile children.

The circumstances out of which the action arose, as disclosed by a proof, were as follows:—The pauper was the illegitimate son of Marjory Stewart, and was born in September 1879. He was a congenital imbecile. In November 1885 Marjory Stewart married John Thow, whose settlement then was in Murroes, the parish of his birth. He was not the father of the pauper. In August 1886 Thow and his wife went to reside in the parish of Coupar-Angus, his settlement still being in Murroes.

In May 1890 the pursuer applied to the Board of Lunacy to sanction the pauper's admission to the Baldovan Institution, the application being accompanied by two medical certificates to the effect that the pauper was capable of deriving benefit from training and treatment in the institution. The Board of Lunacy granted the application, and the pauper was accordingly admitted on 1st July 1890.

The Baldovan Institution was an institution for the training and treatment of imbecile children, which was licensed by, and under the inspection of, the Board of Lunacy,* which repaid a proportion of the cost of maintaining imbecile pauper children there out of a parliamentary grant.

* The Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54), sec. 7, enacts,—"It shall be lawful for the board to grant licence to any charitable institution established for the care and training of imbecile children, and supported in whole or in part by private subscription, without exacting any licence fee therefor, and such licence may be in name of the superintendent of such institution for the time being."

No. 109. There was a district lunatic asylum for the parish of Murroes, but no special attention was paid at it to the training of imbecile children, and the institution nearest to Murroes where such training could be obtained was the Baldovan Institution.

Inspector of Coupar-Angus
v. Inspector of Murroes.

On 1st August 1891 Thow, and through him his wife, the pauper's mother, acquired a residential settlement in Coupar-Angus.

The defender, who admitted that his parish of Murroes was liable for the maintenance of the pauper down to 1st August 1891, maintained that this liability ceased at that date, on the ground that the pauper followed his mother in then acquiring a settlement in Coupar-Angus.

The pursuer maintained that Murroes remained liable, notwithstanding the mother's change of settlement, on the ground that, under the Lunacy Acts, the settlement of the pauper at the date of his admission to the Baldovan Institution remained his settlement so long as he should remain in the institution.*

On 15th July 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the child whose aliment is the subject-matter of the present action is a bastard and a congenital idiot, and that his settlement is the settlement of his mother: Finds that her settlement is the settlement of her husband, and that his settlement has been since 1st August 1891 in the parish of Coupar-Angus: . . . Finds that pursuer's contention is that after being lodged in Baldovan Institution, the said child's settlement became fixed upon Murroes, and incapable of following the settlement of the person from whom it was derived in respect of the provisions of 20 and 21 Vict. c. 71, sec. 75; but finds that the proved facts do not justify the application of said statute to said child in respect that there was no urgent or necessary cause for declaring him to be a lunatic beyond what had existed from his birth, and because the most probable and credible explanation of his being transferred to Baldovan was that his mother's husband was on the point of acquiring a residential settlement in pursuer's parish of Coupar-Angus: Finds that he had at or before 1st August 1891 acquired such a settlement, and that he has in law acquired said settlement both for his wife and her imbecile child: Therefore sustains pursuer's claim only up till 1st August 1891, as admitted by the defender before this action was raised. . . . Quoad ultra assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

On 2d November 1893 the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on appeal, adhered.

* The Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 75, enacts,—"Every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly; and the residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic."

Section 95 enacts,—"Every pauper lunatic to be detained under the powers of this Act shall be sent to the asylum for the district in which the parish of the settlement of such pauper lunatic is situated; provided always that under special circumstances it shall be lawful for the parochial board, with consent of the board, to dispense with the removal of any pauper lunatic to such asylum, and to provide for him in such other manner and under such regulations as to inspection and otherwise as shall be sanctioned by the board; and provided further that the provisions of this Act as to the requisite licence and order and returns or reports of the board shall be duly complied with."

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—The present case was ruled by No. 109. Palmer v. Russell.¹ This child had been sent to the Baldovan Institution with the sanction of the Lunacy Board, and as the Baldovan Institution was licensed by the Board, the institution must be taken to be in the same position as the district asylum. The Board of Lunacy having sanctioned the admission of the child to the Baldovan Institution, it was nothing to the point to inquire into the propriety of such admission. Murroes therefore was liable.

v. Inspector of Murroes.

Argued for the defender ;—The case of Palmer did not apply. There was no district asylum in that case, here there was. If, however, Palmer was intended to lay down any general rule it ought to be reconsidered.² It was inconsistent with the general policy of the Scots poor-law of settlement, which was to keep the family together.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case it being beyond doubt that if the boy, the pauper lunatic, had been lodged in a district asylum the Act would have applied, and that the settlement which he now has would not have changed so long as he remained a lunatic and was detained in the district asylum, the question is whether that is changed by his not having been put into a district asylum, but into an institution which was considered by those who had power to adopt an alternative more suitable for him in the circumstances. In my opinion the principle of the case of Palmer v. Russell, December 1, 1871, 10 Macph. 185, applies clearly. In that case it is true that there was no district asylum for the parish in which the pauper lunatic had a settlement, and she was sent to another which was used for those lunatics who would in ordinary course be sent to a district asylum, but I think that the principle laid down there is applicable to this case, and settles that the placing of a pauper lunatic in an asylum which has been selected for him as the best place in the circumstances, instead of in the district asylum, is fulfilment of the statutory requirement. Then section 95 of the Act, taken along with section 75, confirms the view I have stated, because it indicates that some other asylum may, if the authority of the Lunacy Board be obtained, be substituted for a district asylum. That power being given, it seems to me to be a reasonable deduction that such confinement in a selected and authorised institution, is the same thing in legal effect as confinement in the district asylum would be.

If it was thought that the case of Palmer ought to be reviewed, we should require to send this case to a full bench, but that case was decided twenty-three years ago, and has been acted upon ever since, so that even if I did not agree with the result, I should not think it proper to throw doubt upon it. But I agree with the decision, and think that we should act upon it in this case.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

We are asked to reconsider the case of Palmer. I see no reason for doing so. It has stood unchallenged for nearly a quarter of a century, and I think that it must be taken to be a sound exposition of the law until it is reversed by a higher Court.

If we follow that case, there can be no doubt that if the lunatic had been sent to a district asylum the parish of settlement at the date of his admission would continue to be liable for his maintenance so long as the lunacy continued.

² Milne v. Henderson and Smith, Dec. 3, 1879, 7 R. 317.

No. 109. But it is said that that consequence does not follow, because he was not sent to a district but to a private asylum called the Baldovan Asylum. He was sent to it with the sanction of the Lunacy Board. In these circumstances, I think that we follow the case of Palmer in holding that the Baldovan Asylum is to be taken as an equivalent for the district asylum.

Inspector of Coupar-Angus
v. Inspector of Murroes.

By the 95th section of the Act it is directed "that every pauper lunatic detained under the powers of the Act shall be sent to the asylum for the district in which the parish of the settlement of such pauper lunatic is situated." But there is a dispensing power. The parochial board may, with consent of the Lunacy Board, dispense with the removal of the pauper to a district asylum, and provide for him in such other manner as shall be sanctioned by the Lunacy Board. When they exercise that power they are creating an equivalent for the district asylum. To use the words of the Lord President,—“One place of confinement is substituted for another by legal authority, and the same effects will follow.” The words “district asylum” as they occur in the 75th section must be read in connection with the dispensing power, and construed to include any place which shall be substituted by the exercise of that power, otherwise the exercise of the power would affect the liability of parishes, and there is no ground for thinking that the Legislature had any such purpose. The reasons for the rule introduced by the 75th section apply with equal force whether the lunatic be detained in a district asylum or in any substituted place.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. Lord Rutherford Clark has expressed the views I hold so exactly that I have nothing to add to what his Lordship has said.

Sale—Delivery—Possession—Marriage-contract—Conveyance to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione.—In December 1883 M's estates were sequestrated, but before a trustee had been appointed a deed of arrangement was executed between M and his creditors and B. By this deed M assigned his furniture to B in consideration of payment of a sum exceeding its value by way of composition to the creditors. B thereafter assigned the furniture to the trustees under M's antenuptial marriage-contract for behoof of M's wife in liferent, and

The furniture was allowed to remain in the house then occupied by M and his wife, which belonged to the trustees, and on the spouses removing to another house in 1884 the furniture was taken with them. In 1890 M sold the furniture to G, and G let the furniture on hire to M. The furniture remained with M and his wife. In an action by the marriage-contract trustees to have G interdicted from removing the furniture, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the right to the furniture was in the trustees, in respect that since the date of the assignation in their favour M's wife had been in actual possession of it as life-rentrix, and that the trustees had accordingly been in civil possession through her, and that G therefore had no title to it, and interdict granted.

 Mitchell's
 Trustees v.
 Gladstone.

THIS was a note of suspension and interdict at the instance of the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs T. Sawers Mitchell to have Andrew Alexander Gladstone interdicted from removing certain furniture from the house 17 Dalhousie Terrace, occupied by Mr and Mrs Mitchell.

1ST DIVISION.
 Ld. Kyllachy.

Mr T. Sawers Mitchell was sequestrated in 1883, but before a trustee was appointed a deed of arrangement under sec. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was entered into between him, his creditors, and Mr Blackwood, his father-in-law, by which, inter alia, Mr Mitchell assigned and made over to Mr Blackwood all the household furniture in No. 24 Merchiston Park, where he was then living, and Mr Blackwood undertook to pay his creditors a composition of 1s. 6d. in the pound. The deed of arrangement was subsequently approved by the Sheriff, and the sequestration declared at an end in January 1884.

Mr Blackwood thereafter executed a deed of assignation dated January and May 1884, whereby he assigned and made over the furniture to the trustees under the antenuptial contract of marriage of Mr and Mrs Mitchell (dated 1871), declaring that the trustees were to hold it for behoof of Mrs Mitchell, "and exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, . . . which jus mariti and right of administration are hereby renounced by him accordingly, but that only in liferent, for the liferent use of the said Mrs Mitchell, and for behoof of her children, or such of them as she may prefer thereto by any writing under her hand, in fee, with power to the second parties to sell the same and apply the proceeds in like manner."

The transaction was not accompanied by any removal of the furniture from the house 24 Merchiston Park, which belonged to the marriage-contract trustees. At Whitsunday 1884, that house having been sold, Mr and Mrs Mitchell removed to 17 Dalhousie Terrace, taking the furniture with them. This house was subsequently acquired by the trustees in May 1891. On 11th July 1890 Mr Mitchell sold the furniture to the respondent Mr Gladstone at the price of £130, granting him an assignation thereof; and on the same date Mr Mitchell hired the furniture from the respondent at the rate of £10 for every three months, payable in advance. Mr Mitchell having fallen into arrears with the payment of the hire the respondent raised an action against him for delivery of the furniture, and on 29th July 1892 obtained a decree from the Sheriff.

The marriage-contract trustees then raised the present suspension and interdict on 12th August 1892.

The respondent, inter alia, averred;—"No delivery to the complainers followed upon said pretended assignation, and Mr Mitchell continued actual, and ostensible, and reputed owner of the furniture, . . . From Whitsunday 1883 to Whitsunday 1884 the said Mr Mitchell had possession of said furniture in a house in Merchiston Park, Edinburgh, of which he was tenant; and since Whitsunday 1884 he has had possession of said furniture in a house in Dalhousie Terrace, of which he has all along been, and still is, tenant."

 Mitchell's
 Trustees v.
 Gladstone.

The complainers pleaded ;—(1) The complainers are entitled to interdict as craved, in respect that the furniture in question is their property, and that the respondent unwarrantably asserts right thereto.

The respondent pleaded ;—(3) The articles mentioned in the prayer of the note having been the property of the said Thomas Sawers Mitchell, and the property therein having never effectually passed to the said William Blackwood, or to the other complainers, the complainers have no right thereto in competition with the respondent, a bona fide purchaser from Mr Mitchell.

On 1st June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) granted interdict.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether certain furniture, which formerly belonged to Mr T. S. Mitchell, and still remains in the house occupied by him and his wife and family, belongs to the complainers, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Mitchell, or, on the other hand, to the respondent Mr Gladstone. The marriage trustees claim the furniture as having become their property under a certain transaction which took place when Mr Mitchell became bankrupt in the year 1884. Mr Gladstone claims it as having been sold, and constructively delivered, to him by Mr Mitchell in the year 1890.

"The facts which are, I think, sufficiently admitted or instructed by documents, appear to be these :—Mr Mitchell was sequestrated in 1884, but, before a trustee was appointed a deed of arrangement, under the 38th section of the statute, was entered into between him and his creditors, and his father-in-law, Mr Blackwood. By that deed of arrangement, which appears to have been duly carried through, the furniture in question was transferred to Mr Blackwood, on payment by him of a sum exceeding its value, in the shape of a composition of 1s. 6d. per pound paid to the creditors. Mr Blackwood thereupon executed a deed, whereby he transferred the furniture to the complainers, the marriage-contract trustees of his daughter (the bankrupt's wife), to be held by them for her in liferent and her children in fee. The transaction was not accompanied by any removal of the furniture, but the house in which it remained, and which continued to be occupied by the bankrupt and his family, was the property of the marriage-contract trustees, and that house having been sold, the furniture was subsequently removed to another house, also belonging to the trustees, and also occupied by the bankrupt and his family. And in this house it has since remained.

"In 1890 Mr Mitchell, having got into difficulties, appears to have borrowed, or at least obtained, £130 from the respondent, Mr Gladstone, and, by deeds passing between them, Mr Mitchell sold to the respondent the furniture in question, at the price of £130, and, on the other hand, the respondent hired the furniture to Mr Mitchell, at the hire of £10 per quarter. This hire having of late fallen into arrear, the respondent has taken proceedings to obtain delivery of the furniture, and the present note of suspension and interdict has been presented by the marriage-contract trustees, in order to assert what they allege to be their prior right.

"Upon these facts, which as I have said are, I think, not in controversy, I am of opinion that the complainers' title is preferable. I do not, I confess, see how, either at common law or under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, the respondent can plead successfully that he has any better title than the complainers. If the complainers have only a jus ad rem, I do not at present see how the respondent is in a better position, and, as between two personal titles, the prior title is preferable.

"But I am disposed to be of opinion that the complainers are proprietors of the furniture, and that although no actual delivery took place in 1884, there was yet such a change of possession as was tantamount to delivery. In other words, I think that, in pursuance of the deed of arrangement, Mr Mitchell ceased in law to possess the furniture, and that the possession as well as the right has since been with the complainers, who have possessed directly as

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—Delivery was necessary to transfer the property of moveables.¹ But constructive delivery was owners of the house, and indirectly through their beneficiaries, the wife and children.

Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Gladstone.

"Had Mr Mitchell's sequestration proceeded to the appointment of a trustee, there could, I think, have been no doubt as to his divestiture. The act and warrant of the trustee would under the statute have operated as delivery of the furniture, and the complainers, as taking through the trustee, must, I suppose, have had the benefit of that delivery. It is not, however, so clear whether mere sequestration had the same effect. Sequestration is only equivalent to a completed poinding, and the complainers' right is probably therefore no higher than if they had acquired under (e.g.) a sale by a poinding creditor. In such circumstances it may perhaps be doubted whether the bankrupt was divested by the mere force of the diligence. I prefer therefore to take the case just as if the complainer had bought for a fair price from the bankrupt himself, he selling with consent of his creditors, and under circumstances which established beyond doubt the truth and bona fides of the transaction. Or, to simplify the case still further, I prefer to consider it as if the deed of arrangement had been made directly with the bankrupt's wife and children, who, having separate funds, and owning the house in which they all lived, had acquired the furniture at a fair price duly paid to the bankrupt's creditors.

"Now, I do not stop to consider what would have been the effect of such a transaction under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. I do not at all doubt that the deed of arrangement embodied what was in effect a sale. But it may perhaps be doubted whether the Mercantile Law Amendment Act protects a purchaser, not merely against the diligence of the seller's creditors, but against the acts of the seller selling to a second purchaser and giving delivery. In my view, the common law is here sufficient for the complainers' case.

"It will not, I suppose, be disputed that if two persons jointly occupy the same house, the furniture of which belongs to one of them, such furniture may be effectually transferred by the one occupant to the other, and may be so without any overt change in the use which they respectively make of it. The contract being clear and unreserved, the legal possession in such a case necessarily follows the title, and is held to pass to the purchaser, who obtains all the possession of which the circumstances admit. So far as the seller retains any natural possession, he does so not as proprietor but on a new and subordinate title, which may either be hire or gratuitous use, or whatever else the parties arrange. It is perhaps superfluous to quote authorities, but Macdougall v. White-law, 2 D. 500, and Fyfe v. Woodman, 4 D. 255, both recognise the above principle as applied in the one case as between a sister and brother and in the other as between a father and daughters. Nor is the case of Anderson v. Buchanan, 11 D. 270 (supposing it to be still authoritative), at all to the contrary. In fact both the decisions I have referred to were there accepted as good law.

"But if the parties stand in the relation of husband and wife, or if the transaction takes place between the husband on the one hand, and his wife and children, or trustees for his wife and children, on the other, does it make any difference? No doubt the truth and good faith of the transaction must in such a case be more jealously scrutinised, but if that be established beyond doubt, and if the wife and children have separate estate, or if the price is paid by friends or relations on their behalf, I know of no disability which attaches in such matters to either wife or children. They buy the furniture and pay for it. They obtain all the possession of which the circumstances admit. In the present case the house is already theirs. They are now the owners both of the house and furniture, and the husband is no longer in possession of the furniture any more than he previously was in possession of the house.

No. 110. sufficient, even though the seller continued in possession of the subjects, if his right to possession depended on a new and subordinate title acquired from the purchaser under a known contract, e.g., lease.¹ The subjects in question had therefore been effectually transferred to the reclaimer. The prior transaction with the marriage-contract trustees had not divested Mitchell of the property, for the assignation to them had not been followed by delivery. They were not entitled to found on constructive possession through Mrs Mitchell, for the doctrine of *Orr's Trustee v. Tullis*¹ had not been extended to cases of husband and wife.² It made no difference that the transfer was to marriage-contract trustees.³ Hewat's case³ was not distinguishable from the present. The note should therefore be refused.

The complainers argued;—The effect of the deed of arrangement and subsequent assignation in 1884 to the complainers was to completely divest Mitchell of all right of property in the furniture, so that he had nothing to transfer to the respondent in 1890. They had possession of the furniture, for it was in a house belonging to them, and they had had the only use of it which it was possible for them to have, that, namely, through the wife. Her use depended in no way upon her husband's right, but was attributable solely to the trustees' title. If, under the assignation, the trustees had held for Mitchell in liferent, then his continued possession would have been on a new and subordinate title, and the cases relied on by the reclaimer would have applied directly in favour of the complainers.⁴ It could make no difference that they held for the wife. The case of husband and wife was not different from relatives living together, and in the case of the latter it had been held that a transfer of the furniture of the house in which they resided was effectual.⁵ All that it was necessary to shew was that the transaction was bona fide. The case of *Hewat's Trustees*⁶ was merely an example of the rule that a conveyance wife and children exclusively, but for the husband in liferent and the wife and children in fee, it could not, I suppose, have been said that the position of the latter was more favourable. In certain views it might be thought to be less so. But can it be doubted, on the authorities, that in that case there would have been a sufficient change of possession? The husband would in that case have been still in possession, but it would have been possession on a new and limited title, and according to the case of Orr v. Tullis that is enough. Indeed that this is so is necessarily conceded by the respondent, because his own title, at least so far as rested at common law, is necessarily dependent on the doctrine that delivery is not necessary when the seller continues to possess under a contract of hire or other new title of possession.

"On the whole therefore I am of opinion that the complainers are here entitled to interdict in terms of their prayer, and I see no reason why the complainers should not have their expenses."

Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Gladstone.

LORD ADAM.—In this case the complainers, who are the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Mitchell, seek to have the respondent interdicted from removing certain articles of furniture from the house 17 Dalhousie Terrace, presently occupied by Mr Mitchell.

Both parties claim to be proprietors of the furniture, and both claim to derive right to it from Mr Mitchell, to whom it formerly belonged.

The material facts of the case appear to be these: Mr Mitchell was sequestrated in 1883, but proceedings were taken under the 38th section of the Bankruptcy Act, and the sequestration put an end to by a deed of arrangement approved of by the Sheriff.

By this deed of arrangement, which is dated in December 1883, and which is entered into between Mr Mitchell, of the first part, Mr Blackwood, Mr Mitchell's father-in-law, of the second part, and certain creditors of Mr Mitchell, of the third part, Mr Mitchell assigned to Mr Blackwood, inter alia, the furniture in question, and, in consideration of this assignation, Mr Blackwood bound himself to pay a composition on the debts owing to Mr Mitchell's creditors.

This deed was followed by a second deed, dated in January and May 1884, entered into between Mr Blackwood, of the first part, the complainers, as trustees under the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Mitchell, of the second part, and Mr Mitchell, of the third part, by which, on the narrative of the sequestration and deed of arrangement, Mr Blackwood assigned to and in favour of the complainers the furniture in question, to be held by them for behoof of Mrs Mitchell, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, but for her liferent use only, and for behoof of her children in fee; and, in consideration of this assignation, the complainers discharged Mr Blackwood of all claims competent to them under the deed of arrangement.

I cannot doubt that this was a perfectly bona fide transaction, and that, by the first of these deeds Mr Blackwood purchased the furniture from Mr Mitchell and his creditors, and that by the second deed he validly assigned it to the marriage-contract trustees to be held by them for behoof of Mrs Mitchell in liferent and her children in fee.

At the date of the sale the furniture was in a house in Merchiston Park, which was occupied by Mr Mitchell and his wife and family. At Whitsunday 1884 they removed to a house in Dalhousie Terrace, taking the furniture with them, and they are still in occupation of that house. The respondent alleges that Mr Mitchell was tenant of these houses, and, for the purposes of this case, I assume that he was so.

The complainers purchased the house in Dalhousie Terrace in May 1891, but prior to that date Mr Mitchell sold, or professed to sell, the furniture to the respondent for the sum of £130, conform to assignation in his favour, dated 11th July 1890. By letter of hire, of the same date, Mr Mitchell hired the furniture from the respondent for one year certain, at the rate of £10 for each three months, payable in advance.

It is on these two documents, followed, as he alleges, by the possession of the furniture by Mr Mitchell, as having hired it from him, that the respondent claims right to it, and he denies the complainers' right to it, on the ground that they had never received delivery of it from Mr Mitchell, but that it had

Trustees v.
Gladstone.

It is true that the furniture, at the time of the sale to Mr Blackwood and the complainers, was in possession of Mr Mitchell, and that the complainers never received actual delivery of it from him; nevertheless, I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that they have acquired the full right of property therein.

I think that the case is ruled by the principles laid down in the case of Orr's Trustee v. Tullis, 8 Macph. 936, and followed in the subsequent cases of Robertsons v. McIntyre, 9 R. 772, and Darling v. Wilson's Trustees, 5 R. 180.

In the case of Orr's Trustee the articles sold were in possession of the seller at the time of the sale. The seller continued in the uninterrupted natural possession of them, having hired them from the purchaser. There was no actual delivery of them to the purchaser. The articles sold were subsequently claimed by the creditors of the seller, but the Court held that the seller was not in possession under his original title of owner, but under his subsidiary title of hirer, that consequently the purchaser was in constructive possession of them through him, and that that was sufficient to confer the complete right of property on the purchaser, although there had been no actual delivery.

The Lord Justice-Clerk said, in giving judgment,—“It is not correct to say that some corporeal act, some change in the actual situation or custody of moveables sold, is necessary to pass the property. That is only true where possession has not been obtained by the purchaser. That is manifestly not true when possession has been attained.” Then, after giving some illustrations of this, he goes on to say,—“But what shall be said if the seller in parting with the ownership himself acquires a subordinate title of possession. Shall his continued possession be ascribed to his former ownership, or to his new title? Although this is not a new question, I have found it difficult, and, so far as I know, it has hitherto been undecided in Scotland.” “There is a clear distinction,” he says, “between cases in which possession is simply continued by the seller, and those in which a new title of possession, specific and determinate, with known rights and limits, is acquired by him.” “It may be true that in the case of goods sold, remaining in the custody of the seller, there is a presumption of simulation raised against any inferior title flowing from the buyer, which he may pretend. But this presumption will be stronger or weaker according to circumstances, and if the good faith of the transaction is clearly proved will altogether disappear. In such a case the question of possession must be judged according to the legal title of the parties.”

Now, applying these principles to the facts of the present case, it is clear that there was no simulation or want of good faith in the transaction with which we have to deal, and that the result is that, when Mr Mitchell sold the furniture to the respondent, he was not in possession of it under his original title of owner, and in fact was not in possession of it at all. The facts are that Mrs Mitchell was entitled to the liferent of the furniture, that the complainers were bound to give her the possession and use of it, and that they did so. Her husband's jus mariti and right of administration with respect to it were excluded, and any use or control he had of it arose from the fact that he was living with and occupying the same house as his wife.

I accordingly think that Mrs Mitchell has been in the actual possession of the furniture throughout, that she has had that possession not as owner, but from the complainers under the specific and determinate subsidiary title of life-rentrix of the furniture; that the complainers have been all along in the civil possession of the furniture through Mrs Mitchell, and that that was sufficient to give them the plenum dominium of it. It follows that when Mr Mitchell professed to sell the furniture to the respondent, he could give him no title to it.

Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Gladstone.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I wish only to add that I think this case is solved by the application of the same principle as has been given effect to in the case of Mitchell v. Heys & Sons (infra, p. 600), viz., that the possessor of moveable property can in general give no higher right to an assignee than he has himself acquired from the true owner. The house of Mr Mitchell was not a market for sale, and the fact that Mrs Mitchell allowed her husband the joint use of the furniture for domestic purposes did not entitle the reclamer, Gladstone, to assume in a question with Mrs Mitchell, either that the property was her husband's, or that he had a power of sale. It would be otherwise if Mr Mitchell had been a furniture dealer, and his wife's furniture had been put into his shop and apparently exposed for sale.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee.

Marriage-contract—Husband and Wife—Jus mariti—Trust.—By antenuptial marriage-contract executed in 1855 a wife conveyed the whole funds payable to her under her father's settlement to trustees for the purpose, inter alia, that the revenue of £5000 (being the portion of the funds available at the date of the contract) should be paid to herself exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, the clear revenue of the remainder to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses and paid to them on their joint receipt. The husband expressly renounced his jus mariti and right of administration, in so far as the capital of the whole funds and the revenue of the £5000 were concerned, but the deed was silent as to the husband's rights with respect to the revenue of the remainder of the funds. Held that the husband's jus mariti and right of administration did not affect funds conveyed to the trustees by the antenuptial contract of marriage or the revenue thereof.

Husband and Wife—Marriage-contract—Joint estate—Revenue to be held for joint behoof and paid on joint receipt of spouses—Spouses living separate—Husband's sequestration.—An antenuptial marriage-contract contained a direction that a certain fund was to be held by trustees "for the joint behoof of the spouses, and paid to them on their joint receipt." Under an arrangement between the husband and wife, the trustees for some time paid over one-half of the income to each, but the husband's estate having been sequestrated, they refused to make any payments except on the joint receipt of the wife and the husband or his trus-

Ld Stormonth-Darling.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 26th July 1855, entered into between George Cadell Bruce and Miss Roberta Cadell, the latter conveyed to trustees her whole share of the residue of her father's estate (which ultimately amounted to about £10,000), with the exception of £1000, which she assigned directly to Mr Bruce. In particular, she conveyed the sum of £5000, being, with the sum of £1000, the portion of that estate available at the date of the contract. This estate the trustees were directed to hold for, inter alia, the following purpose,—“First, that during the joint lives of the said intended spouses the clear revenue of £5000 of the trust funds is to be paid to the said Roberta Cadell, exclusive of the jus mariti and power of administration of the said George Cadell Bruce, for whose debts and deeds, and to whose control the same shall not in any way be liable or answerable, and the clear revenue of the remainder of the trust funds is to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses, and paid to them on their joint receipt.” The deed also contained a declaration, “that the means and estate above conveyed by the said Roberta Cadell, as aforesaid, in so far as the capital of the trust funds and estate is concerned, and the revenue of the £5000 thereof specially before mentioned, are and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of the said George Cadell Bruce, her promised spouse, and the same shall not be affectable by his debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, nor by the diligence of his creditors.” In an earlier part of the deed, Mr Bruce did “herely renounce, discharge, and overgive his jus mariti, power of administration, and every other right and claim which he as husband of the said Roberta Cadell might have to the funds and effects and means and estate hereinafter conveyed in trust, and that in so far as the capital of the funds and estate is concerned, and the revenue of £5000 thereof specially after mentioned; declaring that the same shall not be affectable by his debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, nor by the diligence of his creditors.”

After 1876 the spouses lived separate. In 1877 the marriage-contract trustees, with the acquiescence of Mr and Mrs Bruce, divided the part of the free revenue of the trust funds which under the deed was directed “to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses and paid to them on their joint receipt” into two equal shares and paid one half to Mr Bruce and the other half to Mrs Bruce on their separate receipts.

Mr Bruce's estates were sequestrated on 2d November 1880, and James Wyllie Guild, chartered accountant in Glasgow, was appointed trustee thereon.

After Mr Bruce's sequestration the trustees continued to pay to Mrs Bruce the one half of the income. The other half they retained in their own hands, paying thereout the interest due by Mr Bruce on a heritable bond, and also certain premiums of insurance on his life. The balance was accumulated from year to year.

This system of division, which had been intimated to Mr Wyllie Guild, was continued down to 1891 without challenge on his part, but in June of that year he took exception to it and claimed that the whole current income, as well as the accumulations, should be paid to him. The trustees accordingly retained the whole of the income in question in their own hands.

On 26th February 1892 an action of multiplepoinding was brought by Mr Wyllie Guild in the name of the marriage-contract trustees as pursuers and nominal raisers against himself and others, including Mr Bruce, as defenders, for the purpose of determining the rights of parties “to the clear revenue of the remainder of the trust funds” in the hands of the marriage-contract trustees after setting apart the clear revenue of the £5000. The fund in medio, after a dispute as to the amount thereof had been decided, consisted (1) of the accumulations of income in the hands of the trustees up to Whitsunday 1891; and (2) of the whole income accruing between that term and Martinmas 1891.

Bruce's Trustees
v. Bruce's
Trustee.

Claims were lodged by Mr Wyllie Guild, as trustee in Mr Bruce's sequestration, and by the marriage-contract trustees.

Mr Wyllie Guild averred, inter alia,—"The jus mariti of the said George Cadell Bruce was not excluded as regards the fund in medio. Mrs Bruce refuses to sign a joint receipt."

He claimed "the whole fund in medio; or, otherwise, the whole fund in medio so far as representing accumulations of income up to Whitsunday 1891, and one-half of the fund in medio so far as representing income accrued subsequent to said term."

The marriage-contract trustees averred,—"The jus mariti of the said George Cadell Bruce does not affect that part of the fund in medio which consists of revenue accrued on the said remainder of the trust funds during the half year ending at Martinmas 1891. The claimants are not liable to be called upon to pay the revenue of the said remainder of the trust funds except on production of a joint receipt for the same, signed by Mrs and Mr Bruce, or by Mrs Bruce and the real raiser in Mr Bruce's right."

They claimed the revenue which had accrued during the half year ending at Martinmas 1891, or otherwise one-half of the revenue accrued during the said half year.

On 1st March 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Ranks and prefers the claimant James Wyllie Guild as trustee on the sequestrated estates of George Cadell Bruce to the fund in medio, in terms of his claim, in so far as representing accumulations of income up to Whitsunday 1891: Quoad ultra repels the said claim of the claimant James Wyllie Guild: Ranks and prefers the claimants Robert Philip Wood and George Miller Cunningham as the surviving and accepting trustees on the antenuptial contract of Mr and Mrs Bruce, in terms of the first alternative of their claim, and deems: Finds the said claimant George Cadell Bruce liable to the said claimants Robert Philip Wood and George Miller Cunningham in expenses in the competition."*

* "OPINION.—This is a question which turns on the construction of the antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs George Cadell Bruce, dated 26th July 1855.

"The lady had a fortune, derived from her father, which turned out to be of the value of about £10,000. Of this she reserved £1000, which went absolutely to her husband. All the rest she conveyed to trustees, subject to a declaration that the whole capital and the revenue of £5000 thereof should be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration, and not affectable by the debts or deeds of her intended husband, nor by the diligence of his creditors. Only £6000 was payable at the date of the contract, which explains the special reference to the sum of £5000. As regards the income of that sum, the trustees were to pay it to the wife, exclusive of the husband's rights, and the clear revenue of the remainder was to be held by the trustees for the joint behoof of the spouses, and to be paid to them on their joint receipt. It is with regard to this portion of the income that the present question arises.

"Since 1876 the spouses have lived separate. In 1877 the marriage-contract trustees, acting on the advice of counsel, and with the acquiescence of Mr and Mrs Bruce, divided this portion of the income into two equal shares, and paid one half to Mr Bruce and the other half to Mrs Bruce on their separate receipts. Mr Bruce was sequestrated on 2d November 1880, and the sequestration still Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee.

After parties had been partly heard on the reclaiming note a consults. The system of division adopted in 1877 continued without challenge on the part of the trustee in the sequestration down to the summer of 1891. I formerly decided, in a question as to the amount of the fund in medio, that the trustees were not bound to bring into the fund the amount of revenue which they had paid to Mrs Bruce under the arrangement of 1877, down to the raising of the present action. But I have now to decide the much more difficult question—what are the rights of the parties under the contract, apart from any arrangement.

"The trustee in the sequestration claims the whole of the revenue which has accrued on this portion of the trust-estate at and since Martinmas 1891, on the ground that it falls under the jus mariti. He says, with force, that the right attaches to all property of the wife from which it is not distinctly excluded, and that the precision with which it is excluded from the income of the £5000 and from the capital of the whole shews clearly that it was not intended to be excluded from this portion of the income. He also says that property settled by marriage-contract belongs either to the husband or the wife; that there is no such thing as a joint right of property between spouses; and that, as the money is not claimed as separate estate of the wife it must be the property of the husband.

"The marriage-contract trustees, on the other hand, claim to hold this portion of the revenue until a joint receipt is presented to them in terms of the contract. I have come to be of opinion that their claim ought to be sustained.

"I have endeavoured (I hope with success) not to allow myself to be influenced by some observations which I made in deciding the former question, and which probably went further than was necessary for the decision of the point then before me. The present question is solely one of interpretation of the contract; there is not much light to be derived from decided cases, and I own that I have found the question difficult.

"The jus mariti is a right of comprehensive and stringent application, but the law has developed very considerably with respect to it, and all in the direction of relaxing its stringency. Thus, in Lord Stair's time, it was thought that it could not be renounced or excluded at all. Then it was thought that, at all events, express words of exclusion were necessary. But now it is settled, not only that the right may be excluded, but that the exclusion may be implied if the implication be clear. Indeed the right itself rests to some extent on implication, that is to say, on the legal fiction of an assignation constituted by marriage. Where, therefore, the alleged exclusion is contained in an antenuptial contract, all that sound principle requires is that the wife shall be shewn to have thereby dealt with her property in a way inconsistent with the assignation which the law would otherwise imply. To quote Lord Mackenzie's words in the case of Rollo v. Ramsay, 11 S. 134,—'The legal assignation of the wife's moveable fortune by marriage to the husband never can be suffered to have existed at all, in contradiction to a conveyance contained in the antenuptial contract on which the marriage proceeds.'

"What, then, is the effect of the contract here? It excludes the jus mariti from the capital of the wife's whole fortune, and if it had stopped there, probably that would have been held to imply an exclusion from the income also—Robertson, 13 S. 442; Hutchison, 4 D. 1399. The deed goes on, however, to deal specially with the income of the sum of £5000, which is excluded from the husband's rights just as carefully as the capital. With regard to the income in question here, a different provision is made. Nothing is said about the jus mariti, but it is to be held by the trustees for the joint behoof of the spouses, and to be paid to them on their joint receipt. Probably the intention was that the money should be used for household expenses; and, possibly, that the husband's right of administration should not be excluded. But if it were to be held that a provision of this kind let in the operation of the jus mariti it would follow that the husband could demand payment on his own receipt, descendence and claim was lodged for Mrs Bruce, in which she alleged that since 1876 Mr Bruce had contributed nothing to her support, and she claimed (1) the whole fund in medio, and alternatively either (2) the revenue accruing during the half year ending at Whitsunday 1891, or (3) one-half thereof. Mr James Wyllie Guild having died, Mr William Auld Guild was appointed trustee on Mr Bruce's estate. No. 111.

Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee.

Argued for the trustee;—There was no exclusion in terms of the jus mariti quoad this part of the income of the estate, and the fact that that right was distinctly and expressly excluded from the income of the £5000, as well as from the whole capital, shewed very clearly that it was not intended to be so excluded. The jus mariti was a right very strongly founded in law, and according to the older cases¹ could only be excluded by direct and explicit words; and although it had been more recently held that there might be implied exclusion, the implication must be undoubted. The expressions used here did not warrant such an inference. It could not be maintained that the fund was intended to be an alimentary provision to the wife, for she already had the revenue of the £5000 secured to her. No doubt the income in question was only to be paid over on a joint receipt. That might in the ordinary case have indicated a joint right, but in the case of husband and wife such a right could not exist. The interest of the wife would pass jure mariti to her husband. In any event the Lord Ordinary's judgment could not stand, for that would produce a deadlock, and defeat the purposes of the trust. The trustee was entitled, therefore, to payment, if not of the whole at anyrate of one-half of the fund. The trustees as such had no right or interest to oppose the claimant.

Argued for the marriage-contract trustees;—These defenders as holders of the fund were bound to protect it against anyone who did not shew a good title to it. That was the case with Mr Bruce's trustee, who founded because, the money being his, he would be entitled to get it, and he could not compel his wife to sign the receipt. Therefore I apply to this provision Lord Mackenzie's language in Black v. Pearson, 3 D. 504 (at p. 511),—‘If the husband's jus mariti is to apply to these funds, every word of that conveyance is contradicted.’ That is to say, the words of a solemn contract to which the husband was a party, and made when the parties were perfectly free to contract, must be held pro non scriptis. It seems to me that any result is to be preferred to that.

“Counsel for the trustee in the sequestration argued that, even if the income had been directed to be paid to the wife on her own receipt, the jus mariti would have attached. I cannot assent to that view, because I think the whole question, whether under a marriage-contract or under the will of a stranger, is one of intention. Such a construction would be opposed to the cases of Hunter v. Smith in 1793, and Stables v. Murray in 1789, reported in Fraser on Husband and Wife, vol. i. pp. 786-7. The trustee in the sequestration cannot in my opinion succeed unless he shews that holding for joint behoof and payment on joint receipt are consistent with and equivalent to an absolute right of property in the husband.

“It is urged against the claim of the marriage-contract trustees that it brings about a deadlock. But I understand that it is the husband's trustee, and not the wife, who is causing the deadlock, by declining to continue the arrangement for a division of the income into two equal parts. With that, of course, I have nothing directly to do. The short, and as I have come to think the sufficient solution of the question, is to hold that, whatever may be the result, the marriage-contract trustees are entitled to demand a joint receipt, and are not bound to pay until such a receipt is presented to them.”

entirely on the jus mariti. That right might be excluded by implication,¹ and it was so excluded here. The very existence of a marriage-contract, which was meant to protect the wife, afforded a strong presumption that it was intended to be excluded,² and the provision as to the joint receipt was absolutely incompatible with the existence of the jus mariti. It was quite possible for a right to be vested jointly in spouses.³ In no view could the jus mariti have effect until the income was reduced into the possession of the spouses. Further, until a joint receipt was forthcoming the trustees were not entitled to part with any part of the estate, for the deed quite clearly made the delivery of a joint receipt a condition precedent to the parties getting the money. Accordingly they were not entitled to pay one half to Mrs Bruce and the other half to Mr Bruce's trustee on separate receipts.

Mrs Bruce adopted the argument of the marriage-contract trustees as to the exclusion of the jus mariti, and maintained further that she was entitled to the whole income ad sustinenda onera matrimonii, Mr Bruce having since 1876 failed in his marital obligation to support wife and family. In any view she was entitled to receive payment of one-half of the fund, so that the evident purpose of the trust-deed might not be frustrated.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question under this reclaiming note relates to the right to the income of a part of Mrs Bruce's estate which was conveyed to trustees by marriage-contract dated 26th July 1855. The material facts are very distinctly stated by the Lord Ordinary in the first and second paragraphs of his judgment, which I take the liberty of incorporating with my opinion:—

“The lady had a fortune, derived from her father, which turned out to be of the value of about £10,000. Of this she reserved £1000, which went absolutely to her husband. All the rest she conveyed to trustees, subject to a declaration that the whole capital and the revenue of £5000 thereof should be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration, and not affectable by the debts or deeds of her intended husband, nor by the diligence of his creditors. Only £6000 was payable at the date of the contract, which explains the special reference to the sum of £5000. As regards the income of that sum the trustees were to pay it to the wife, exclusive of the husband's rights, and the clear revenue of the remainder was to be held by the trustees for the joint behoof of the spouses, and to be paid to them on their joint receipt. It is with regard to this second portion of the income that the present question arises.

lence on the part of the trustee in the sequestration down to the summer of No. 111. 1891."

The trustee in the sequestration now claims the whole income which has accrued on the second mentioned portion of the money settled in trust by Mrs Bruce at and since the term of Martinmas 1891, alleging that he has right to it jure mariti.

Feb. 27, 1894.
Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee.

If the trustee's view of the effect of the contract be well-founded this will be a unique case in the history of the jus mariti of a trust being constituted by a wife for the conservation of that ancient and now abolished right. There are few principles, if any, in the law of property better settled than this, that an antenuptial conveyance of the wife's estate to trustees excludes the jus mariti, and that any interest which a husband may claim under such a trust is derived not from the assignation of marriage but from the agreement of the parties that the wife's estate shall be applied as the trust purposes direct. The law is so stated in the judgment in Rollo v. Ramsay, from which the Lord Ordinary quotes; and I agree with his Lordship that it suffices to exclude the jus mariti that the wife in her antenuptial contract has "dealt with her property in a way inconsistent with the assignation which the law would otherwise imply."

Passing to the construction of the words of the contract, we have to consider what is meant by this direction,—“And the clear revenue of the remainder of the trust funds is to be held for the joint behoof of the spouses, and paid to them on their joint receipt.”

Under this provision the income is certainly given to the spouses jointly, and not in equal shares, as was indeed natural and proper in a contract of marriage in which consortium vite was contemplated. But it is also certain that under this provision the interests of the spouses in the joint estate are equal. As the spouses are separated under a voluntary agreement, and the fund can no longer be used and enjoyed as a joint estate, either the fund—I mean the income—must be divided, or we must accept the self-contradictory proposition, that neither spouse can claim any benefit from a fund which belongs to them jointly. I am not aware of any exception to the rule of law which permits the division of a joint estate which cannot be specifically enjoyed by the joint owners. There is a distinction between joint interests and interests in severalty or shares. In the case of a proper joint interest each owner is supposed to be seized of the whole estate, so that on the death of one of them the fee expands. But this distinction, the latest exposition of which is to be found in the case of Paxton's Trustees, 13 Rettie, 1191, is, in its practical effect, confined to questions of succession, and would not, in my apprehension, impede the right of one of the joint owners to sue for a division of the subject. In the present case, it is found in fact that while the spouses were living separate the income of the fund was divided between them at their desire, and this arrangement was continued until it was challenged by the reclamer in the interest of creditors.

I may here observe that, even if there were a good theoretical objection to the alteration of the mode of enjoyment of this joint fund at the desire of one of the parties against the wishes of the other, that objection would not affect the judgment which I propose, but would strike at the claim of the trustee. When Mr Bruce's creditors came into possession of his interests under the marriage trust, the state of possession of this fund was that of division of the income between the spouses. This is accordingly the melior conditio which the law will support against the claim of one of the parties to alter the mode

No. 111. or form of possession. But I believe your Lordships agree with me that it is not necessary to found on this consideration, because Mrs Bruce is entitled to have her just and equal interest in the fund assigned to her in the only form in which she can receive that benefit, by having one-half of the income paid over to her.

Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce's Trustee.

According to my opinion, the Lord Ordinary has rightly preferred the marriage trustees to the income in question, but it will be necessary to add a declaration that the trustees are to hold the income in trust for payment of one half thereof to Mrs Bruce, including arrears, so long as the spouses shall continue to live separate, and for payment to the trustee on Mr Bruce's sequestrated estate of the other half of the income, including arrears, so long as the estates of the said George Cadell Bruce shall be under sequestration, and thereafter to Mr Bruce himself.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that under and by virtue of the antenuptial contract of marriage . . . the claimants, Robert Philip Wood and George Miller Cunningham, as surviving and accepting trustees thereunder, are bound to make payment of the income of the funds and estate conveyed to them by the said Mrs Roberta Cadell or Bruce, so far as said fund exceeds the sum of £5000 (that accrued or may accrue for the period subsequent to Whitsunday 1891), as follows, viz.:—So long as the said George Cadell Bruce and Mrs Roberta Cadell or Bruce continue to live separate, of one half thereof to the said Mrs Roberta Cadell or Bruce, and of the other half thereof to the trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said George Cadell Bruce, so long as said estates shall be under sequestration, and thereafter to the said George Cadell Bruce himself, but subject to deduction from the last-mentioned half of the premiums of insurance paid or to be paid by said trustees on the policies of insurance on the life of the said George Cadell Bruce, conveyed to them by said contract of marriage; and under reference to and subject to the foregoing finding and declaration, adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 1st March 1893, except as regards the finding of expenses; and, as regards said finding, recall said interlocutor, and decern: Find the claimant, William Auld Guild, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said George Cadell Bruce, liable to the said claimants Robert Philip Wood and George Miller Cunningham in the expenses of the competition," &c.

Mitchell v.
Heys & Sons.

IN September 1895 William Mitchell, Glasgow, raised an action against Z. Heys & Sons, calico printers, Barrhead, and against Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, calico printers, Glasgow, for their interest, concluding for declarator that 902 copper rollers, stamped "W. M.," presently in the possession of the defenders, belonged to him, and for an order for their delivery to him.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Low.

In 1885 Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company hired a number of copper rollers from the pursuer. These rollers, according to the agreement between the parties, were to be used by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company in their business at a certain rent, and were to be engraved with such patterns as the borrowers thought fit, but for no other purpose. By the sixth head the borrowers were to have "no claim of property to the engraving on any copper roller," and by the seventh head the whole of the rollers were to be kept distinctly numbered and marked with William Mitchell's name "in order to identify them as" his "property, and in the event of the borrowers parting with the custody of the rollers to any third person, they were to be delivered on Mitchell's" behalf under the following receipt:—"Received from William Mitchell."

That agreement expired in 1889, and on 10th March of that year another agreement with similar conditions was entered ~~into~~ between the parties, and Mitchell, Johnston, & Company further agreed to add new rollers to William Mitchell's stock to provide against loss of copper in turning off old patterns from his rollers, and to mark and number these new rollers in the same manner as those lent by him.

As Mitchell, Johnston, & Company had no calico printing works of their own, they, in conformity with a common custom in the trade, employed other firms who had printing works, among them Z. Heys & Sons, to print for them, and sent their cloth and William Mitchell's rollers to them for that purpose.

In June 1892 there were 902 rollers belonging to Mitchell in the hands of Heys & Sons.

In that month Mitchell, Johnston, & Company became insolvent, and Mitchell applied to Heys & Sons for delivery of the rollers. Heys & Sons, however, refused to deliver them, on the ground that they had a right to retain them in security of a general balance of £4529 due to them by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, whereupon Mitchell raised the present action against Heys & Sons.

The pursuer averred,—The defenders were well aware that the initials "W. M." represented the name of the pursuer, that he was the William Mitchell referred to in the receive-notes, that the rollers were the property of the pursuer, and were delivered to them as such, and that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company had no rights therein except such as were made with the pursuer by agreement.

The defenders averred;—(Stat. 3) "The rollers in question were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company. The pursuer in any event knew that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company had full possession and control of the said rollers, and that they dealt with them as their own property, and were in the practice of sending the said rollers to these defenders, inter alia, in order that these defenders might engrave the same, and use them for printing cloth for or on the orders of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and he intended all along that this should be done." (Stat. 4) "The pursuer knew all along that by the usage and custom of the calico printing trade in Glasgow, all rollers delivered to calico printers actually engaged in printing (as these defenders are) were delivered and received on the footing that the engravers and printers (as these defenders were) should have a general lien thereon for their whole account for engraving and printing. He knew that these defenders regularly advertised and intimated this on their business papers, and that all rollers sent to them by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company were sent by them and received by these defenders, subject to this general lien as aforesaid. The pursuer was also all along aware that the said copper rollers were being sent to these defenders for engraving and printing as aforesaid, subject to said general lien. . . ." (Stat. 5) "The pursuer never disclosed that the rollers in question were his private property. On the contrary, he concurred with Mitchell, Johnston, & Company in representing to, inter alios, these defenders that the rollers were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and in Mitchell, Johnston, & Company and these defenders dealing with the said rollers throughout, on the footing that this was so. . . . He all along knew (as was the fact) that these defenders received the said rollers on the footing and in the belief that they were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and engraved them and used them for printing cloth, for and on the employment of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, on this footing and belief." (Stat. 6) "By the usage and custom of the calico printing trade in Glasgow, these defenders have a general lien on the said rollers for the sums due to them for engraving and printing done on the employment of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—1. The said rollers being the property of the pursuer, he is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—3. In respect these defenders have a lien on the said rollers as condescended on, they should be assoilzied. 4. The defenders should be assoilzied, in respect (3) The rollers were delivered to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company by the pursuer in order that they might deal with them as their property; et separatim, that they might deliver them to these defenders to be engraved and printed from subject to said general lien.

Proof was allowed. The following facts were proved or admitted: By the custom of the calico printing trade in Glasgow, printers employed to do printing for others had a general lien over the rollers and cloth sent to them, by their customers; further, the defenders by notice on their business paper intimated to all their customers, including Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, that all rollers sent to them were subject to the above lien.

There was a considerable body of evidence led by the defenders to shew that, by custom of trade, the above lien applied to all rollers, whether they belonged to the persons who sent them to the printer or to third parties, but the pursuers adduced evidence to the opposite effect.

With regard to the receive-notes sent to the defenders by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, it was proved that, when rollers were first sent, the receive-notes were in terms of the agreement, i.e., they bore that the rollers were sent by William Mitchell; the defenders having, however, objected to the terms of these notes, Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company altered them and made direct representations to the defenders that they were in fact the owners of the rollers. It was not proved, and was denied by the pursuer, that he had any knowledge of this change in the receive-notes, or of the representations by Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company. It was proved that the defenders believed that the rollers were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and that the work was done by them on that footing.*

Mitchell v.
Heys & Sons.

It was proved that of the 902 rollers claimed in the action 125 had been the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company when they were sent to the defenders' works, and had subsequently been transferred to the pursuer in terms of the agreement of 1889.

On 7th March the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the pursuer's pleas, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns."†

* Z. Heys deponed,—“When I met the partners of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company in Wellington Street to arrange terms and prices for printing, one of the special conditions laid down with regard to our dealing was that they were to supply us with their own copper and their own cloth. These are the only terms upon which we print to anyone. They said they were not to do any business in jobbing, but were to be calico printers entirely, the same as the houses we printed for. . . . When we began business with them my understanding was that the copper and cloth they were to send to us was to be their own. These continued to be the terms until the stoppage took place. . . . From beginning to end my belief was that that cloth was all their own.”

† “OPINION.—. . . It is established beyond doubt that the pursuer was not a partner of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and that he was not interested in that firm. It is also established that the property of the rollers which are in dispute is in the pursuer.

“It is further admitted that, according to the universal custom of the trade, calico printers, who, like the defenders, are actually engaged in printing, have a lien over all rollers belonging to a customer for the general balance due by that customer.

“The means relied on by the pursuer, in the agreements by which he hired rollers to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, for securing that his rollers should not be subject to a lien for accounts incurred by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, were two in number. He stipulated in the first place that his initials should be stamped upon each roller, and in the second place that the receive-notes should be in his name. [His Lordship here referred to the evidence which he held to shew that the precautions taken by the pursuer were not sufficient to put the defenders on their guard against supposing that the rollers belonged to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and that Mitchell & Company led the defenders to believe that the rollers were their property.]

“In these circumstances, the question of law to be determined is whether the defenders are entitled to the lien over the rollers which they claim.

“In regard to the 125 rollers which were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company when they were sent to the defenders, I do not think that there is any doubt, because the defenders could not be affected by a subsequent change of ownership of which they had no notice.

“I am also of opinion that the defenders are entitled to retain the other rollers. . . .

“Both parties referred to the judgment of the House of Lords in The London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (Appeal Cases, 1892, p. 201), as laying down principles of law applicable to the present case. The question there was as to the right of the bank to retain negotiable securities for payment of a balance due by a broker who had fraudulently pledged the securities with them, as against the true owner. The House held that the bank was entitled to retain and realise the securities, having taken them for value and in good faith, and there being no circumstances to create suspicion.

“There were three questions in the case—(1) Whether the securities belonged

 Mitchell v.
 Heys & Sons.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong. It was admitted that the rollers (with the exception of the 125 trans-to the party claiming them from the bank; (2) whether they were negotiable instruments; and (3) whether the bank took them in good faith. The judgment proceeded upon an affirmative answer to all these questions.

“The decision, therefore, goes no further than this, that the bona fide pledgee for value of a negotiable instrument can retain it for the debt for which it was pledged against the true owner. The same rule, I apprehend, also applies to the impeding of documents of title, such as an indorsed bill of lading, or a delivery-order upon a warehouseman, or of goods held under such documents of title. But the rule does not in my judgment necessarily apply where what is pledged is a corporeal moveable not the property of the pledger, and of which he has the bare possession, without any document of title. In such a case it is not sufficient to prove that the pledgee took the article in good faith and in the absence of circumstances calculated to excite his suspicion.

“In The London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons, Lord Herschell thus states the law,—‘The general rule of the law is, that where a person has obtained the property of another from one who is dealing with it without the authority of the true owner no title is acquired against that owner, even though full value be given, and the property be taken in the belief that an unquestionable title thereto is being obtained, unless the person taking it can shew that the true owner has so acted as to mislead him into the belief that the person dealing with the property had authority to do so. If this can be shewn, a good title is acquired by personal estoppel against the true owner.’

“It therefore seems to me that the question here is, whether the pursuer so acted as to mislead the defenders into the belief, or so as to make them liable to be misled into the belief, that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company were owners of the rollers.

“Upon this question the case of Brown v. Marr (7 R. 427) was referred to. In that case a retail jeweller fraudulently obtained articles of jewellery from wholesale dealers upon contracts of ‘sale and return,’ and pawned them. It was held, in a question between the wholesale dealers and the pawnbrokers, that the latter were entitled to retain the jewellery. There was a great deal of discussion as to the true nature of a contract of ‘sale and return,’ and opinions were expressed upon the point, but I think that all the Judges were of opinion that it was sufficient for the decision of the case that the retail jeweller, having undoubtedly authority to sell the jewellery, could also pledge it, and that of the two innocent parties dealing with him, that party (viz., the wholesale dealers) who had put it in his power to commit the fraud must suffer.

“Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, when dealing with this view of the case, said,—‘Lord Stair says (i. 14, 5), “Property or dominion passes not by conditions or provisions, but by tradition, or other ways presented in law.” From which it follows that possession or some symbol of tradition, are the only true indications of property in moveables. Thus, it is held in England, that when tradition or possession has been obtained by fraud, and has been used to induce transactions with third parties, of two innocent parties he shall suffer who has enabled the wrongdoer to commit the fraud. This is simply another way of saying that a purchaser or pledgee is not bound to look beyond the ostensible title of possession, and that if the true owner has knowingly conferred this ostensible title, although induced thereto by fraud, a bona fide purchaser cannot be required to restore what he has bought on the ground of latent stipulations between the seller and his author.’

“I have already pointed out that one ground of judgment in Brown v. Marr was, that the owners of the watches had put them into the hands of the retail dealer (Marr) with authority to sell them, which involved authority to pledge them. I think, however, that there was another important element in the case, namely, that Marr was a dealer in jewellery, and was known by the pawnbrokers to be so. Now, suppose that the pursuers, the wholesale dealers, had been right in one of their contentions, namely, that Marr did not get the watches for

Heys & Sons.

'sale or return,' but merely 'on approbation,' I am not sure that the result would have been affected. Because if a person puts goods into the hands of another whose business it is to sell goods of that description, I think that a third party purchasing from the possessor, in good faith, for value, and in the ordinary course of trade, would get an unchallengeable title.

"That view is in consonance with the opinions expressed by Judges of high authority in the case of Pickering v. Bush (15 East. 38). In that case one Swallow was a broker and sale-agent. Pickering purchased hemp through Swallow. The hemp was transferred, at the desire of Pickering, in the books of the wharfinger, from the name of the seller to that of Swallow, as regarded one parcel, and to the name of Pickering or Swallow as regarded another parcel. The question was, whether Swallow could give a good title to a purchaser. He had contracted for the sale of hemp, and having none of his own to deliver, had transferred Pickering's hemp to the purchaser. It was held that the purchaser from Swallow was entitled to the hemp in a question with Pickering. Lord Ellenborough said,—'Strangers can only look to the acts of the parties, and to the external indications of property, and not to the private communications which may pass between a principal and his broker, and if a person authorises another to assume the apparent right of disposing of property in the ordinary course of trade, it must be presumed that the apparent authority is the real authority. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that a broker's engagements are necessarily and in all cases limited to his actual authority, the reality of which is to be afterwards tried by the fact. It is clear that he may bind his principal within the limits of the authority with which he has been apparently clothed by his principal in respect of the subject-matter, and there would be no safety in mercantile transactions if he could not.' In this same case Le Blanc, J., said,—'The law is clearly laid down, that the mere possession of personal property does not convey a title to dispose of it.' Then, after referring to the circumstances of the case, he added,—'This is distinguishable from all cases where goods are left in the custody of persons whose proper business it is not to sell.'

"There are two cases, one in England and the other in Scotland, the circumstances of which are very like those in the present case. The English case is Weldon v. Gould (3 Espinasse, 268). The circumstances are thus stated in the report:—'The plaintiff had delivered calicoes to one Pearce, to have them printed; he delivered them to the defendant, who was a calico printer; the defendant did not know that the goods did not belong to Pearce, and he kept the goods for the balance of a general account between Pearce and him.'

"Lord Kenyon decided in favour of the defendant. I confess that I am unable to see any material distinction between the circumstances of that case and the present.

"The Scotch case is Lesly v. Hunter (M. 2660, and Elchies voce Hypothec, No. 18). The defender Hunter was a bleacher, and he was employed to whiten certain cloth by George and Archibald Arnot, weavers. The Arnots' name was stamped upon the cloth. They got delivery from Hunter of a portion of the cloth, promising to pay for the bleaching of the whole cloth when they uplifted the remainder. The Arnots became bankrupt, and Lesly, who was proved to be the owner of part of the cloth remaining in Hunter's hands, claimed delivery of that part upon paying the expense of bleaching it. Hunter, upon the other hand, claimed a lien over the cloth for the whole account due to him by the Arnots. Hunter had taken the cloth in the belief that, having the Arnots' name stamped upon it, it belonged to them. The Court held that Hunter was not entitled to the lien which he claimed, but Lord Elchies states that the judgment was carried only by the casting vote of the President.

"If, therefore, the circumstances of that case are substantially the same as those of the present, it is plain that it is an authority directly in the pursuer's favour.

"The reports of this case are somewhat meagre, and the Session papers, so far as they have been preserved, do not add much to the information given in

No. 112. as hirers. That being so, the way in which the hirer dealt with the
 Feb. 27, 1894. rollers could not make any difference in the right of a person receiving
 Mitchell v. them from him, and no custom of trade could give the third party a right Heys & Sons. of lien over them. The only ground upon which the third party, the defenders here, could successfully claim a lien, was if the lessor of the goods had done something which entitled them to believe that in point of fact the goods belonged to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, or that they had a right to treat the goods as they did.¹ It was not necessary for a person letting goods on hire to take any precautions against fraud on the part of the lessee, and the person to whom the goods were sent by the lessee was not entitled to assume an unlimited title in his customer, where the possession might fairly be ascribed to a limited title only.
 The case of Lesly was really an authority in the pursuer's favour, as the Lord Ordinary was in error in saying that the person to whom the cloth was entrusted by the owner was not entitled to get it bleached.
 The Session papers in the case shewed that the Arnots had authority given to them to send the cloth to be bleached. The cases relied on by the defenders, and commented on by the Lord Ordinary, were distinguishable from the present, because in them unlimited authority was given. In Brown v. Marr, Barclay, & Company (7 R. 427), the the reports. It appears that the Arnots had woven the cloth for Lesly from yarn supplied by him, and he gave evidence that he had not authorised the Arnots to put their name on the cloth. It does not, however, appear whether Lesly had authorised the Arnots to get the cloth bleached, or whether it was the custom of the trade for weavers to get cloth which they had been employed to weave bleached for their customers. If the Arnots had no authority, express or implied, to get the cloth bleached, I can well understand that Hunter could not claim a lien for the general balance, because Lesly had in that case done nothing which was calculated to mislead him into the belief that the cloth belonged to the Arnots. Further, there is no note of the opinions of the Judges. I am thus unable to regard the decision as giving much assistance in the present case one way or the other.

"It therefore appears to me that, except the judgment of Lord Kenyon in Weldon v. Gould, there is no authority directly in point; but a consideration of the whole authorities (so far as I know them), and of the principles which may be deduced therefrom, leads me to the conclusion that the defenders must prevail.

"The ordinary practice of the trade is for job calico printers to have their own rollers, which they send along with the cloth to printers who have works, and who do the actual printing process. Further, by the admitted custom of trade, printers have a lien over the rollers of their customers. The pursuer knew the ordinary practice of the trade, and the inveterate custom as to lien, and in that knowledge he gave his rollers to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company for the very purpose of being sent by them to printers. By so acting the pursuer put it into the power of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, while using the rollers for no other purpose than that for which they had authority to use them, to mislead printers to whom they were sent, and he also rendered the printers, to whom the rollers were sent, very liable to be misled. In such circumstances, I am of opinion that the defenders, who held the rollers in the bona fide belief, induced by the representations of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, that they were the property of the latter, are entitled to retain them even against the pursuer. To hold otherwise would, in my judgment, not only be contrary to sound principle, but would be most prejudicial to the interests of those engaged in this and similar trades."

contract was for sale or return, and there there was a power given to sell the goods, which implied the minor power of pledge. Cases of principal and agent such as Pickering v. Bush (15 East. 38) were not in point, as an agent for sale had been held to have a power of pledge, but even in such cases there was authority for the pursuer's contention.¹ It was not denied that if the owner of goods put into the hands of the person to whom he entrusted them a document which enabled him to commit a fraud by representing himself as the true owner, he would not be entitled to get them back from a third party into whose hands they had come; and such were the cases of Pochin & Company (7 Macph. 622), Vickers, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 65, Babcock, L. R., 4 Q. B. D. 394, and Rose v. Spavens, 7 R. 925. These were also cases of principal and agent, and, on that ground as well, not in point. Weldon v. Gould (3 Esp. 268) was a case of agency; and further, it was not in conformity with the later decisions in Marston's case (6 R. 898), and Pickering's case (15 East. 38). It could not be said in this case that the pursuer had given Messrs Mitchell, Johnston, & Company any facilities for imposing on the defenders, and no obligation lay on him to intimate to the defenders that the rollers were his property. On the contrary, he had done everything in his power to guard his ownership by having the rollers marked with his initials, and having the receive-notes made out in his name, and these two facts were amply sufficient to put the defenders on their inquiry as to the ownership of the rollers. It was clear that the defenders had doubts as to whether the rollers were in point of fact the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, because they had insisted in a change on the form of the receive-notes, and they should have pushed their inquiries further by asking the direct question. They were not, therefore, in a position to be able to plead that they were the innocent victims of a fraud.²

Argued for the defenders;—The general lien here claimed was a well-known one, and was not disputed by the pursuer; neither was the view of the facts taken by the Lord Ordinary attacked by him. He knew from the outset that the rollers, if they passed into the hands of persons in the position of the defenders, would be subject to a general lien; and further, he knew that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company were not themselves calico printers, and that they would be obliged to send their cloth, with the rollers, to be printed elsewhere. In these circumstances, unless there was some special stipulation excluding the lien, the pursuer was bound to intimate to the defenders that the rollers were his property. What he did, in point of fact, was quite insufficient to meet that obligation. The initials on the rollers did not necessarily shew ownership, and the receive-notes only shewed the custodier of the rollers as being William Mitchell. The pursuer had therefore placed Mitchell, Johnston, & Company in a position to mislead the defenders, and that being so the rollers could effectually be pledged, whoever was the true owner. The defenders were one of two innocent parties (the pursuer being the other) who had been injured by the fraud of a third party, and in such cases that person must suffer who had given opportunity to the third party to commit the fraud.³ The case of *Weldon v. Gould*⁴ was a direct authority in favour of the defenders. That was, no doubt, a case of principal and agent, but the equitable considerations which ruled there were equally applicable in the present case. If any obligation of inquiry was on the defenders, they had fulfilled it by going to Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, their customers.¹ There was no custom of hiring of rollers in the calico printing trade, and therefore the English cases, in which effect was given to the rights of the true owner where such a custom existed were not in point.² The view of the facts in Lesly's case (M. 2660) was the right one. There was no evidence there that authority to send the cloth to the bleachers had been given, and therefore the case did not apply.

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an action for delivery of certain copper rollers belonging to the pursuer, and presently in the possession of the defenders. The defenders Messrs Heys & Sons, who are calico printers, claim right to retain the rollers by virtue of a lien created by a contract with the now insolvent firm of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company. It is admitted that the rollers in question are the property of the pursuers, from whom they were hired by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company for the purpose of being used in printing. Mitchell, Johnston, & Company were calico printers, who had no print works of their own, and it appears to be a common practice in the trade for printers in that position to send their cloth and rollers to the print works of others that the rollers may be used in printing patterns on the cloth. The rollers in question having been hired from the pursuer, were put into the hands of the defenders by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company to be engraved with patterns and used in printing according to the common practice, and the defenders claim to hold the rollers as well as the cloth for a general balance arising upon their account for engraving and printing. It is admitted, as the Lord Ordinary says, that according to the custom of trade, calico printers who, like the defenders, are actually engaged in printing, have such a lien over the rollers and cloth belonging to their customers. In addition to the general usage, it is admitted that a special contract was constituted between the defenders and their customers, including Mitchell, Johnston, & Company by a notice printed on the business papers passing between them, that all rollers sent to the defenders were subject to a general lien for their whole account for engraving and printing. I have not observed any paper in these terms in the voluminous print which has been laid before us, but it was admitted at the bar that the defenders' statement to this effect is correct, and further, that the subsequent course of dealing had established the assent of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company to the terms expressed in the defenders' notice. We must take it, therefore, that by usage of trade, and also by a special contract, the defenders have a valid lien which would admittedly be effectual as regards the rollers now in question if these were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company. But whether it be inferred from usage, or expressed in terms, this is a lien which rests upon contract, and to make it available against the pursuer, who was no party to the contract, it must be established either that he authorised Mitchell, Johnston, & Company to subject his property to a lien for their debt, or that he is barred by conduct or representations from exercising his rights as owner. Evidence has been adduced for the purpose of proving that the defenders have by custom of the trade a lien over cloth and rollers belonging to third parties. But that cannot be the effect of any custom of trade, and the evidence ought not in my opinion to have been admitted. Usage may determine the incidents of a contract, or explain its terms as between the contracting parties. But whether it affects the rights and property of others is a question to be determined by the settled rules of law, and not by the understanding or opinions of traders.

There can be no question as to the extent of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company's right under the contract of hiring between them and the pursuer. There were two agreements—one in 1885, and a second in 1889—and by both it was stipulated that the lessees were to use the copper rollers in their business of calico printers, but that they should be used for no other purpose whatever. They were to have no claim of property to the engraving in any roller, but the same should belong exclusively to the lessor, subject to a right of use during the currency of the hire; and it was further stipulated that the whole of the said copper rollers should be kept distinctly numbered, and also marked with the lessor's name, in order to identify them as his property, and that in the event of the lessees parting with the custody to any printer or other third person, they should deliver them to such person under a receipt which should bear expressly that they were received from William Mitchell—that is, from the pursuer by name, and not from Mitchell, Johnston, & Company. So far as this contract goes, therefore, there can be no question that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company had no authority to pledge the pursuer's property directly or indirectly, or to hold themselves out as the true owners of his rollers. There may be a question whether the stipulated precautions for identifying his property were in fact sufficient, but there can be none that as between the contracting parties the lessees had no authority to hold themselves out as owners of the hired rollers, but, on the contrary, were required to make it apparent to printers and others, in whose custody the rollers might be placed, that they did not belong to the lessees but to the pursuers.

The difficulty arises from a direct breach of this condition. This appears from the evidence of the defender Mr Heys, whose testimony, the Lord Ordinary tells us, is entitled to credit. This witness depones that when the terms of dealing were arranged between him and Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, it was laid down "as a special condition that they were to supply us with their own copper and their own cloth. These are the only terms on which we print to anyone. . . . These continued to be the terms until the stoppage took place." The obvious purpose of this stipulation was of course that the defenders' lien should attach to all the copper, as well as to all the cloth, which might be put into their hands by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company; and that firm by assenting to the defenders' terms, and by the course of dealing which followed upon their assent, undoubtedly represented that the rollers now in question were their own, and bound themselves on that footing to submit to the lien. In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to consider a question which the Lord Ordinary has discussed, whether the markings on the rollers, and the terms of the receive-notes which were asked and obtained from the defenders, would of themselves have been sufficient to shew that the rollers were not the property of their customers. I am disposed to think that when a customer takes receive-notes for cloth in his own name, and for copper rollers in the

No. 112. name of another, he gives a very significant indication that the rollers are not his own. But the defenders called for an explanation of this peculiarity and were satisfied by the answer they received. They therefore relied on the stipulation they had made, and upon the representation of their customers that they were acting in accordance with their contract. The question is, whether they can plead their contract with Mitchell, Johnston, & Company in answer to the pursuer's demand for delivery of his property.

Heys & Sons.

The general rule is perfectly well settled that the possessor of corporeal moveables can give no better title to a purchaser or pledgee than he has himself acquired from the owner. If this rule is applicable, the pursuer must prevail, and the defenders have, in my opinion, shewn no sufficient reason for excluding its application.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the doctrine of law upon which this question must be decided is that stated by Lord Herschell in the passage which he has quoted,—“The general rule is that where a person has obtained the property of another from one who is dealing with it without the authority of the true owner, no title is acquired against that owner, even though full value be given, and the property be taken in the belief that an unquestionable title thereto is being obtained, unless the person taking it can shew that the true owner has so acted as to mislead him into the belief that the person dealing with the property had authority to do so. If this can be shewn, a good title is acquired by personal estoppel against the true owner.” It is to be observed, upon this statement of the law, that it is not enough that the person taking the property should be misled. He must be misled by the act of the rightful owner; and what is meant by a misleading act of the owner is further defined by his Lordship's reference to the doctrine of personal estoppel. Estoppel has been defined by Lord Cranworth in the case of Jordan v. Money in language which was cited with approval by Lord Selborne in the later case of the Citizens Bank of Louisiana v. The National Bank of New Orleans, L. R., 6 E. and I. App. 360,—“Where one by his words or conduct willfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act in that belief, or to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.” If this be so, the doctrine of personal estoppel would appear to be identical with our own doctrine of personal bar; and according to the definition two things must be established in order to raise the plea. The party against whom it is taken must have made representations by words or conduct concerning existing facts, with the intention of inducing another to act in the belief that these representations were true; and the party raising the plea must in fact have contracted or altered his position, in reliance on the truth of the representations. It appears to me that neither of these points has been established. The conduct which is said to amount to a representation on the part of the pursuer is that he put his property into the hands of Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, without taking precautions to inform third parties that he was himself the true owner. But this was not done with the intention of inducing Mitchell, Johnston, & Company to deal with it as their own, or of inducing third persons to transact with them in that belief. The intention of the contract of hiring was the very reverse. It is said that by empowering his lessees to send his copper rollers to a printer for the specific purpose for which they were hired, he authorised or allowed them to represent that the rollers were their own. But there is no presumption of law that all the copper rollers in the possession of a jobbing printer are his own property. They may be borrowed or hired. And accordingly Mr Heys' evidence shews that the defenders did not in fact rely upon any inference of ownership arising from possession, but thought it necessary to stipulate expressly that all the copper sent to them by Mitchell, Johnston, & Company should be their own. He says that these are the only terms on which they print for anyone. But there would be no occasion for such terms if the defenders did not suppose that otherwise rollers might be sent to them that did not belong to their customers. The conclusion is, in the first place, that the pursuer made no representation by words or conduct on which he intended that the defenders should act; and secondly, that they did not in fact rely upon any representation of his, but solely on the false representations of his lessees.

Heys & Sons.

It is said that Mitchell, Johnston, & Company had an ostensible authority to deal with the pursuer's rollers as their own; and the defenders' counsel appealed to the cases in which it has been held that the authority of an agent is to be measured by the extent of his usual employment, and not by his private instructions. The rule applies where an agent is carrying on a public business and deals with goods entrusted to him in the ordinary course of that business. But a rule for determining the extent of an agent's authority cannot apply to a case where there is no relation of principal and agent. Mitchell, Johnston, & Company were in no sense the pursuer's agents. They had a definite right of use for a specific purpose. In the exercise of that right, they might deal with the lessor's property to the extent of the interest they had acquired under a contract of hiring. But they had no authority to make any contract on his behalf, or to affect in any way the right with which he had not parted. I see no ground on which it can be held that they could subject the pursuer's property to a lien, which would not equally support a pledge or sale. But I do not understand it to be maintained that they could have pledged the rollers for their own debt, or that they could have given a good title to a purchaser.

I am therefore of opinion that the case falls within the general rule stated by Lord Herschell, and not within the exception.

The cases cited by the defenders' counsel do not appear to me to create any difficulty in the application of the general rule of law. It is obvious that the decisions as to negotiable instruments have no bearing. It is settled law that such instruments, passing from hand to hand, like the ordinary currency of the country, may be retained by those who acquire them in good faith and for value, notwithstanding any defect of title in the persons from whom they are acquired. The cases in which principals have been held bound by the contracts of their agents are inapplicable for the reason already given. But it may be right to examine more carefully the three decisions which the Lord Ordinary has cited in his opinion.

Weldon v. Gould, 3 Esp. 268, was a decision at nisi prius, and the facts are very briefly reported. But, as I understand the statement, the plaintiff had put calicoes into the hands of one Pearce, as an agent to contract with the defendant or others for the printing of the calicoes, and the agent contracted in his own name. Lord Kenyon likened the case to that of a factor for sale, and cited George v. Claget as an authority in point. Now, George v. Claget, 2 Smith's L. C. 113, has been much discussed in more recent cases. The rule which it establishes is thus stated by Mr Justice Willes in Turner v. Thomas, L. R., 6

No. 112. C. P. 613—"Where a factor sells in his own name to a third person, who buys without notice that he is dealing with an agent, the latter has ordinarily a right to be put in the same position as if the factor were the real principal in the transaction, and may set up against the concealed principal any defence which he may have against the factor. That rule is founded upon principles of common honesty. Where one satisfies his contract with the person with whom he has contracted, he ought not to suffer by reason of its afterwards turning out that there was a concealed principal." The same distinguished Judge says, in Semenza v. Brinsley, 18 C. B. (N. S.) 467, that "in order to make the defence a valid defence within the rule, it seems obvious that the plea must shew that the contract was made by a person whom the plaintiff entrusted with the possession and ownership of the goods, that he sold them as his own, in his own name as principal, with the authority of the plaintiff, and that the defendant then believed him to be the principal in the transaction." The case is explained in the same way by the learned Lords who decided Cooke v. Eshelby in the House of Lords, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 271. It is true that their Lordships point out that the authority of the agent to appear as the contracting party may be inferred from conduct. But whether the agent's authority is expressed or implied, the rule which these cases illustrate appears to be, that where the agent of an undisclosed principal is allowed to contract in his own name, the persons with whom he contracts are entitled to consider him as to all intents and purposes the principal. But to bring the rule into operation a contract must have been made on behalf of the principal which the latter has right to enforce. It is inapplicable to a contract made by a lessee on his own behalf for delivery of goods which do not belong to him, and which he has no title to dispose of.

Pickering v. Bush is discussed by Lord Blackburn in Cole v. The North-Western Bank, L. R., 10 C. P. 364, and I think it will be useful to quote what his Lordship says, not only for his statement of the point decided, but also for his comment upon the passage cited by the Lord Ordinary from the judgment of Lord Ellenborough,—"In Pickering v. Bush, the plaintiff, the true owner, had purchased the goods through Swallow, who pursued the public business of broker and an agent for sale, and the goods were, at the plaintiff's desire, transferred into the name of Swallow. It was held that this proved that Swallow had an implied authority to sell, and consequently that the defendants were justified in buying of Swallow and paying him the price. Lord Ellenborough goes somewhat further. He says,—'If a person authorise another to assume the apparent right of disposing of property in the ordinary course of trade, it must be presumed that the apparent authority is the real authority. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that a broker's engagements are necessarily and in all cases limited to his actual authority, the reality of which is afterwards to be tried by the fact. It is clear that he may bind his principal within the limits of the authority with which he has been apparently clothed by his principal in respect of the subject-matter, and there would be no safety in mercantile transactions if he could not.' It is to be observed, however, that the other Judges based their judgment on the ground that the circumstances proved in fact an implied authority to Swallow to sell, and that Lord Ellenborough limits his more extensive doctrine to the case of a person 'authorising another to assume the apparent right of disposing of property in the ordinary course of trade,' or in other words, 'entrusting it to an agent whose business it is to sell,' and on Wilkinson v. King being cited in the argument, he says,—'That was the case of a wharfinger whose proper business was not to sell, and to whom the goods were sent for the mere purpose of custody,'—from whence it may be inferred that he limited his general doctrine to cases in which, as in that before him, the goods were entrusted to an agent whose ordinary business it was to sell, in the course of his business as such agent, and because he was such agent." No. 112.

Mitchell v.
Heys & Sons.

Neither of these decisions appears to me to be applicable to a case where the person from whom goods are acquired is not in possession either as owner or as agent, and has no authority, express or implied, from the true owner to make any contract on his behalf.

Brown v. Marr, 7 R. 427, depends upon a different principle, which seems to me altogether inapposite. A retail dealer had obtained articles of jewellery from wholesale firms on contracts of sale and return on pretence that he meant to trade with them, and without attempting to trade he straightway pawned them with various pawnbrokers. The main ground of judgment was that by such a contract all the substantial rights of ownership pass to the buyer. He has an option to return the goods within a stipulated time instead of paying the price. But whenever he exercises any right of property as by selling or pledging the goods, the option ceases, and accordingly the title he may give to third persons dealing with him in good faith does not depend upon any authority derived from the vendor on sale and return, but upon his own absolute right of property. The Lord Ordinary observes that the same judgment would have been given if the contracts had been sales on approbation, but if so, it would have been based upon precisely the same reasoning, for Lord Moncreiff points out that the two forms of contract differ in this respect only, that in a sale on approbation the goods may be returned if not approved which on sale and return may be returned if not sold, and in both the sale becomes absolute and the right to return is lost if the goods are retained beyond a stipulated or beyond a reasonable time, and therefore, if the contracts had been honestly obtained, there could be no question of the buyer's power to pledge in respect of his right of property, which, even if it were not absolute from the first, being subject to a resolute condition, necessarily became absolute as soon as he thought fit to determine the condition. The difficulty was that the contract had been obtained by fraud. But the answer is that contracts obtained by fraud are valid until they are rescinded, and therefore that they cannot be rescinded to the prejudice of rights and interests acquired by third parties in good faith and for value.

Lord Moncreiff may seem to lay down a wider doctrine in the passage cited by the Lord Ordinary, but his Lordship's observations must be read with reference to the case he was considering. The principle to which his Lordship refers,—that where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the fraud of a third, the loss must fall upon him who has enabled the wrongdoer to commit the fraud,—has been applied in cases where the wrongdoer has not merely been entrusted with goods or documents of title, but has also been clothed with an apparent authority to dispose of them. Where there is no such authority, the rule is that stated by Lord Cairns in Cundy v. Lindsay, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 463, that where it is necessary to determine as between two parties, both of whom are perfectly innocent, upon which of the two the consequences of a fraud practised upon both must fall, the Court "can do no more than apply ; rigorously the settled and well-known rules of law."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the defenders are not entitled to

No. 112. retain the rollers which are admittedly the pursuer's property. But it appears that 125 of the rollers which he claims were bought by the pursuer from Mitchell, Johnston, & Company, and were not delivered to him but had been sent to the defenders in the ordinary course of business by the vendors before the sale to the pursuer, and are still in their possession. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the right thus acquired by the defenders cannot be affected by a subsequent contract of sale. So far as regards these rollers the defenders should be assoilzied, and the pursuer should have decree for delivery of the remainder.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If there had been any difference of opinion among your Lordships I should have had no vote, as I was not present on the last day on which the case was argued, but I heard an excellent argument in the two opening speeches, and I should like to say that I entirely concur in the principles of law laid down by Lord Kinnear, and their application to the facts of the case.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and ordained the defenders to deliver to the pursuer 777 of the copper rollers.

Lord Low. Possil, in accordance with directions contained in his trust-disposition and settlement, power was given to the heirs of entail succeeding to the lands of Possil and others to infest their wives or husbands in a liferent annuity out of the rents of the entailed estate, providing that the annuity should not exceed a third part of the rents or free yearly value of the lands. C. N. Lamont-Campbell, heir of entail in possession, died in 1893, having, on the narrative of the deed of entail and of the Act of Parliament, 5 Geo. IV. cap. 87,* provided an annuity to his widow, Mrs Lamont-Campbell, equal to but not exceeding one-third part of the free yearly value of the lands, and a question having arisen between the widow and Mrs Carter-Campbell, the succeeding heir of entail, as to what constituted the free rent, the latter presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber to have the amount of the widow's annuity fixed.

Mrs Lamont-Campbell lodged answers, but took no objection to the application being made by way of summary petition.

Monteith v.
Belfrage.

Succession—Testament—Construction—"Survivor."—A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his sisters nominatim, equally in liferent, and for their children respectively in fee, "declaring that, in the event of the decease of one or more of my said sisters without children, her or their shares shall be held by my said trustees for the liferent use of the survivors and their children in liferent and fee as aforesaid."

In a competition with respect to the share of residue which had been liferented by one of the testator's sisters who had died childless, held that the word "survivors" in the clause above quoted ought to receive its natural meaning, and consequently that the share set free by the death of the childless sister fell to the testator's surviving sister and her children, in liferent and fee respectively, the children of a sister who had predeceased taking nothing.

Ward v. Lang, July 13, 1893, 20 R. 949, followed.

ANDREW TAIT, baker in Edinburgh, died on 6th February 1849, 2ND DIVISION. leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 30th January 1849, by which he, "for the love, favour, and affection which I have and bear for my relatives after mentioned," disposed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the following purposes:—"First, for payment of my whole just and lawful debts . . . Second, that my said trustees, or the trustees acting for the time, may have and hold the residue of the means and estate hereby conveyed, or at their discretion convert the same into cash, and in either case take the destination of the means and estate, or proceeds thereof, to themselves, for the liferent use of my sisters, Jane Tait or Belfrage, Christina Tait or Stenhouse, Ann Tait, and Margaret Tait, equally, and for their children respectively in fee: And declaring that in the event of the decease of one or more of my said sisters without children, her or their share shall be held by my said trustees for the liferent use of the survivors and their children in liferent and fee as aforesaid." The deed contained no further destination of the testator's estate.

The testator was survived by his four sisters. Ann Tait died unmarried on 24th March 1856, and on her death the share of his estate which had been liferented by her was liferented by her three sisters equally.

Margaret Tait (Mrs Monteith) died on 18th February 1892, survived by three children, among whom the fee of the share liferented by her was divided.

Christina Tait (Mrs Stenhouse) died on 18th March 1893, without leaving issue.

A question then arose as to the disposal of the share set free by the death of Mrs Stenhouse, and a special case was presented.

The parties were (1) the testator's testamentary trustees; (2) Mrs

Monteith v. Belfrage.

The questions in the case turned upon whether the word "survivors" in the clause of Mr Tait's settlement above quoted was to receive its natural meaning, or was to be construed as equivalent to "others."

The third party maintained that the word "survivor" ought to receive its natural meaning, and consequently that she, as the sole survivor of the testator's sisters, was entitled to the liferent of the whole share which had been liferented by Mrs Stenhouse. The fourth and fifth parties concurred in this contention, and maintained further that they were entitled to the fee of that share equally between them.

The second parties maintained that "survivors" was to be read as equivalent to others, and therefore that the fee of one half of that share fell to them in the same way as if their mother had survived Mrs Stenhouse, and that this one-half was divisible among them immediately ; or alternatively, that the fee of this one-half of the share had vested in them subject to a liferent in Mrs Belfrage, the third party.

Argued for the third and fifth parties (the fourth parties concurring in the argument) ;—The weight of recent authority was in favour of taking the word "survivor" in its natural meaning, and not as being equivalent to "others."¹ *Paterson's Trustees*² was special. The gift there was to two brothers and the survivor, and the issue of the survivor, all in fee ; and where the destination was of this description there might be room for the argument that the testator could not reasonably have intended the issue to take or not to take according to the accident of whether their parent died second or first ; but where, as here, the earlier generation took a liferent only, the testator may well have supposed that the children of those who predeceased a childless liferenter, by coming sooner into the enjoyment of the fee of the share liferented by their parent, were compensated for not sharing in the share set free by the death of the childless liferenter. Then in Paterson's Trustees, looking to the terms of the destination over, there would have been resulting intestacy if "survivor" had received its natural meaning.

Argued for the second parties ;—The testator proceeded on the narrative of the love, favour, and affection which he bore for his relatives after mentioned, and these were the only persons benefited by his settlement. It was therefore improbable that he should have dealt with them so unequally and capriciously as to make the right of the issue to depend on whether their parent died first or second. It was on the ground of this improbability that the Court proceeded in the recent case of Paterson's Trustees.³ That case ought to be followed here.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case counsel for the third and fifth parties referred us to the case of Ward v. Lang, which seems quite indistinguishable from the present. I think, therefore, that our decision must be to the same effect.

THE COURT answered the questions to the effect that the liferent of the share formerly liferented by Mrs Stenhouse accresced and belonged to the third party, and that the fee of the whole of the said share vested in the fourth and fifth parties.

Custody of children—Appeal—Execution pending appeal—Prayer for further order—Parent and Child.—It is incompetent in a petition for interim execution of a judgment pending an appeal to the House of Lords to add a prayer for any further or other order in the proceedings.

A wife having presented an appeal to the House of Lords against a judgment of the Court ordaining her to deliver up the children of the marriage to their father, the husband presented a petition craving the Court “to allow execution to proceed upon the said judgment notwithstanding the appeal,” and also “to grant warrant to messengers-at-arms and other officers of the law to take into their custody the persons of the said children, wherever they may be found, and deliver them into the custody of the petitioner.”

The Court granted the prayer for execution pending appeal, there being no reason to believe that the interests of the children would be prejudiced thereby, but quoad ultra refused the prayer of the petition as incompetent.

1ST DIVISION.

On 3d March 1894 Colonel James Stevenson of Braidwood presented a petition to the Court, in which he stated that his wife had appealed to the House of Lords against a judgment of the Court, dated 30th January 1894, ordaining her to deliver up the children of the marriage into the custody of the petitioner. He therefore prayed the Court “to allow execution to proceed upon the said judgment notwithstanding the appeal, to the effect of enabling the petitioner to obtain the custody of his children . . . in terms thereof; and also to grant warrant to messengers-at-arms and other officers of the law to take into their custody the persons of the said children, wherever they may be found, and deliver them into the custody of the petitioner, or any person or persons he may appoint to have and keep their custody, and authorise and require all Judges Ordinary in Scotland and their procurators-fiscal, to grant their aid in the execution of this warrant, and recommend to all magistrates in England and elsewhere to give their aid and concurrence in carrying this warrant into effect; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper.”

Mrs Stevenson opposed the granting of the prayer.

The petitioner argued;—The prayer for execution pending appeal was in accord with precedent.¹ The children would have been with the petitioner if they had not been surreptitiously removed by the respondent, and he was entitled, therefore, to have them restored to him until the question of their custody was determined. That would be to maintain the true status quo. Orders in terms identical to those of the second part of the prayer had been granted in many cases.² In the circumstances here such a warrant was essential to the effectual execution of the former order of the Court, and to prevent its ultimate evasion by the respondent in the event of her appeal being unsuccessful.

The respondent argued;—(1) The natural home of the children was with their mother, for they had not been born in their father's house, and in the course of their lives had resided but a very short time with him. There was no suggestion that the respondent intended to remove them out of England, and she had lost no time in appealing. In these circumstances, the ordinary rule should be followed, and the status quo maintained pending the appeal.³ (2) The interests of the children would be prejudiced if the petition were granted, for their health was delicate, and according to a letter which was produced from a qualified medical man, such as made it very undesirable that they should leave the south of England and travel north in winter. (3) The latter part of the prayer was quite inappropriate, for the order asked by it was only granted when a respondent was in open defiance of the Court. Besides, it was unprecedented and incompetent to include in a petition for execution pending appeal a prayer for an entirely new order, and that part of the prayer not being alternative to the first part, the whole petition fell to be refused.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In determining the question now before us we must have regard to the circumstances under which the order we pronounced on 30th January became necessary.

Mrs Stevenson admitted in her answers to the petition presented by her husband that the reason why the children were in England and not in their father's house was that she, by a trick played upon their father, had taken them from his home, alleging one purpose, but really intending to keep them away permanently.

We are now asked by the father to restore them to his custody, pending the appeal to the House of Lords. If we grant this request, we shall just be placing the children where they would have been if the question had been raised and tried on the footing on which it ought to have been tried. I am in favour therefore of granting interim execution. I would certainly not have acceded to the request of the petitioner, if there had been any reason to believe that the interests of the children would be injured by delivering them into the custody of their father. But all we are told—and that somewhat vaguely—is that their health is delicate, and would be liable to suffer in the event of their coming to Scotland for what is called the winter. Now, I have no doubt that Colonel Stevenson, when the children are handed over to him, will have which tends to throw doubt on the soundness of the conclusion that we shall best respect the principle of maintaining the status quo by restoring the children to the home from which they were surreptitiously removed.

As to the form of the petition, I think the petitioner has adopted a wrong style as regards the latter part of it. The latter part, by which I mean the part beginning "and also to grant warrant to messengers-at-arms," seems appropriate enough where a search has to be made. The invocation of Judges Ordinary and their procurators-fiscal shews that, in the cases to which that style is adapted, some extraordinary measures require to be adopted. The proper course will be to let the order run which is under appeal. That order is in the form craved by the petitioner in his original petition. It is now for the petitioner to work out that order, and for the respondent to obtemper it.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the prayer of the petition is somewhat unusual. The petition professes to be one for interim execution pending appeal, but it really goes beyond that. As regards the first part of the prayer, I am of your Lordship's opinion that it may be granted, for we were told by the lady herself that she had removed the children from their father's house for what was apparently a temporary purpose, but really with the intention of keeping them permanently away. Then, further, nothing has been set forth which satisfies me that such an order as is asked by their father would, if granted, prove prejudicial to the children themselves. It is indeed said that their health would suffer if brought to Scotland, but there is no reason to doubt that the petitioner will take all proper care if he gets their custody, and it does not necessarily follow that if he gets the order prayed for he will bring them down to Scotland, if to do so is really hurtful to them.

As regards the remaining conclusion of the petition, I am not for granting that. It is not appropriate in a petition for interim execution pending appeal. The lady should have an opportunity of obeying the order which the Court is about to pronounce. If she refuses, then it will be for the petitioner, if so advised, to take other steps, and it may be that the remaining conclusion of the petition may then be an appropriate order to ask. But I hope that the respondent will obey the order of the Court.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, both as to the granting of the application in general, and also as to the limitation of the order to be pronounced. While our former order is under appeal to the House of Lords no further steps are possible. All we can do is to grant execution pending appeal. That is the only thing which by statute we are entitled to do, and the execution is necessarily limited to the original order. I should think it incompetent to go beyond the original order in response to a petition for execution pending appeal.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Grant the prayer of the petition, in so far as it craves the Court to allow execution to proceed upon the interlocutor of 30th January 1894, to the effect of enabling the petitioner to obtain the custody of his children"

Right in security—Title to sue—Reparation—Injury to property—Evidence that a disposition ex facie absolute was really in security.—In 1880 A, the owner of house property, granted for onerous causes and considerations an ex facie absolute disposition thereof to a bank to which he owed £2500. The bank was infest. On 25th January 1889 the bank entered into an agreement with A that on his paying to them the sum of £500 they would reconvey the property to him, but that in the event of his failing to make this payment the agreement should be null.

In the course of the year 1890 the property was damaged by the operations of a railway company in the adjoining street.

In March 1893 the bank reconveyed the property to A on the narrative that the disposition granted by A in 1880, although ex facie absolute, was only in security, and that A had now paid the £500 in terms of the agreement.

Subsequently A raised an action against the railway company for the damage done to the property in 1890.

The railway company pleaded no title to sue, in respect that the property did not belong to A at the time the damage was alleged to have been done, and that his only interest therein was the personal obligation of the bank to reconvey it to him.

Held that it had been proved that A's disposition in 1880 was in security merely, and that as he had not been divested of the radical right to the subjects he had a good title to sue.

In December 1880 John Peter M'Bride, metal merchant, Glasgow, being indebted to the Clydesdale Bank, Limited, granted a disposition in their favour "heritably and irredeemably," of the subjects Nos. 39 to 55 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow. The disposition was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines.

By a subsequent agreement with the bank, dated January 1889, which proceeded on the narrative that M'Bride was due to the bank a sum of £1541, and that the bank held "an absolute conveyance" of the M'Alpine Street property, "formerly belonging to him," the bank undertook, on Mr M'Bride making full payment to them of the sum of £500 in the manner therein stipulated, to "reconvey and surrender to him their interest as it then may be in the said" subjects, and to discharge M'Bride of his whole debt.

Thereafter by a disposition and reconveyance dated 1st March, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 15th June 1893, the bank on the narrative that M'Bride had, by disposition dated December 1880, disposed to them the subjects after described, and "considering that although said disposition was ex facie absolute, it was truly granted in security of an advance of £2500 made by us to him: And now, seeing that he has made payment to us of certain sums of money, which we have agreed to accept in full satisfaction of said advance, and of all interest due thereon, and he has requested us to reconvey said subjects to him, which it is right and proper we should do: Therefore we do hereby dispoise and reconvey to and in favour of the said John M'Bride," heritably and irredeemably, the M'Alpine Street property, and "all our right, title, and interest, present and future, in or to the same." M'Bride v.

Caledonian
Railway Co.

Between December 1889 and June 1890 the Caledonian Railway Company had completed the construction of a large sewer in M'Alpine Street, under the provisions of sec. 41, subsec. (L), of the Central Glasgow Railway Act, by which it was provided that for the construction of such sewers as the one in question the Corporation of Glasgow should be bound to communicate their powers to the railway company.

In May 1893 Mr M'Bride raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Caledonian Railway Company concluding for £5500, in respect of loss and damage (including loss of business) sustained by him because of the operations of the defenders in connection with the construction of the sewer.

He described in detail the method adopted by them, and averred that they had "culpably and negligently interfered" with and injured his property in M'Alpine Street, and that their operations were conducted in a "reckless, negligent, and unskilful manner."

The defenders (who denied the averments of fault), inter alia, referred to the titles of the subjects and stated that "the pursuer was not heritable proprietor of the said subjects at the time the alleged injury was done."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

On 13th September 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed the following issue:—"Whether, in or about the period from 1st January to 10th May 1890, the pursuer was the heritable proprietor of the subjects forming Nos. 39 to 55 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, and the occupier of Nos. 39 to 41 thereof; and whether, through the fault of the defenders in their operations in M'Alpine Street aforesaid, the said subjects were injured, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer both as proprietor and occupier of the said subjects?"

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer had no title to sue, for he was not proprietor of the subjects at the date when the injury was said to have been done. The bank was then the ex facie absolute disponee and owner, with a property title in no way qualified. The agreement of 1889 did not affect the right of property in the bank. It was at most a pactum de retrovendendo. Any claim for damages was therefore vested originally in the bank, and was only capable of transmission by express assignation,¹ and the pursuer produced no such deed. Even taking the agreement of 1889 to be equivalent to an absolute disposition with a back-letter, the legal position of the bank remained the same. It was not a trustee or security-holder merely, but the proprietor.² If an issue were granted it should be so framed as to make it clear to the jury, that although damage had resulted to the property through the operations complained of, the defenders were not liable in damages unless negligence was proved against them.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had a title to sue for damages, because he had all along had the real beneficial interest in the subjects.¹ Whatever may have been the form of the bank's titles it was merely a security-holder, the substantial right of property being in the pursuer. A question of this kind must be decided according to the actual not the apparent position of parties. Further, and assuming that the right to claim damages had originally vested in the bank, the terms of the deed of 1893 were sufficiently wide to carry it to the pursuer.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders' plea to title was argued on the ground that, at the time of the alleged injury, the buildings were the property of the Clydesdale Bank and not of the pursuer. I need not say that the defenders are right in maintaining that the mere fact that the pursuer is now the proprietor will not give him a title to sue for damages on account of injury done to the buildings if at the time of the injury they did not belong to him. The damage is of course sustained by the person or persons who at the time have interests in the property, the value of which interests are diminished.

In the present case the titles are before us, and, in my opinion, the terms of the disposition and reconveyance of 1st March 1893 put an end to the defenders' argument; for that deed, granted by the Clydesdale Bank, declares that the disposition of 1880 (upon which the defenders' argument rests), although ex facie absolute, was truly granted in security of an advance of £2500. The bank were therefore all along, and at the time of the alleged injury, nothing but security-holders. Now it is quite plain that a man who has borrowed money on a house may in fact sustain loss if the house is injured, and the circumstance that the security-title is put in the form of an absolute disposition does not in law prevent his recovering damages for such loss, the true rights of parties being duly instructed. Upon that point there is therefore no question to be put to the jury, and we can shew this by describing the subjects in question in the issue as the pursuer's property.

As regards the form of the issue, I think there is force in the defenders' suggestion that it should be so framed as to keep the jury in mind that the mere fact that the defenders conducted operations which resulted in the houses being injured is not of itself a ground of liability. It is true that, scientifically speaking, the word "fault" which was proposed by the pursuer is accurate enough as a description of the negligence and unskilfulness which constitute the ground of action alleged on record. But the jury will be less likely to miss the point if the question which they have to try is explicitly put before their eyes, and in the present instance this can be done without prolixity.

The issue which I propose is as follows:—"Whether, on or about the period from 1st January to 10th May 1890, the defenders carried on operations for the construction of a sewer in M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, opposite the pursuer's property there, in an unskilful and negligent manner, in consequence of which the pursuer's property was injured, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £5500."

The record discloses that the damages claimed are in part for loss of business.

It was not suggested that any separate issue was required for this item of No. 116. damage, of which adequate notice is given on record.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT repelled the plea to title, and approved an issue in the terms proposed by the Lord President.

M'Millan &
Son, Limited.

Agent and Principal—Shipbroker—Commission.—Circumstances in which it was held that a shipbroker who had first introduced to a firm of shipbuilders the name of a person who afterwards bought a ship from them was not entitled to any commission, the introduction having in no way contributed to bring about the sale.

ON 12th June 1893 John J. Jacobs & Company, shipbrokers, London, brought an action against Archibald M'Millan & Son, Limited, shipbuilders, Dumbarton, concluding for payment of £290, as the amount of commission alleged to be due by the defenders to the pursuers in respect of the contract for building a sailing vessel, which the defenders had constructed for M. S. Bielich, an Austrian shipowner.

In May 1890 Bielich entered into negotiations with the pursuers through their manager Brosinovich for the purchase of a sailing vessel. The pursuers brought under his notice, among other vessels, the "Formosa" which had been built by the defenders, and suggested that he should have a similar vessel built for himself by the defenders, who were described in one of the pursuers' letters as "the celebrated builders M'Millan of Dumbarton." The pursuers obtained a quotation from the defenders for such a vessel, but in the end no contract resulted from these negotiations, and on 21st May the pursuers wrote to the defenders that Bielich, whose name they did not give to the defenders, could not then make up his mind.

On 29th July Bielich wrote to the pursuers, asking them "to let me know at what price you could build a sailing vessel, steel or iron, by good and well-known builders, of 1000 tons register, . . . I am decided to build if the price is reasonable."

The pursuers then on 1st August wrote to the defenders,—“Referring to our letter of 21st May, our friend, Mr M. S. Bielich of Austria, has now decided to build an iron or steel barque of 1000 T. regr. . . . We shall be glad if you will . . . state . . . lowest cash price, covering 2½% commission here, which please cover by separate note without referring to same in your general letter . . . should your price be satisfactory, we shall no doubt be able to place the order in your hands.”

The defenders replied on the 4th August,—“In reply to your esteemed inquiry of 1st inst., we beg to inform you that our present price for a steel barque of about 1000 tons net register . . . is £12,150. . . . This offer is made subject to approval of plans, and to a specification to be mutually arranged, as well as subject to the adjustment of terms and conditions of sale. Hoping to be favoured with the order.”

The defenders also wrote on the same date to the pursuers,—“In our 2ND DIVISION.

Ld. Wellwood.

No. 117. quotation to you of this date for proposed vessel we have reserved a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for you, payable on delivery of the vessel.”
 Mar. 8, 1894. On 25th October the defenders contracted to build a vessel for Bielich, Jacobs & Co. v. which was in all material respects the same as that described in their M'Millan & Son, Limited. quotation to the pursuers of 4th August.

The pursuers founded on the foregoing circumstances, and averred;—(Cond. 7) “The pursuers believe and aver that they were the first to mention Mr Bielich’s name to the defenders, and that the contract effected by the defenders with Mr Bielich was the direct result of the recommendation of the defenders to him, and that they are therefore entitled to commission as charged, in terms of the undertaking by the defenders already mentioned, as well as by the custom of trade among brokers in the same line of business as the pursuers. According to that custom the shipbroker who introduces a purchaser to the seller of a vessel is entitled to receive from the seller or builder of the vessel sold, through or in consequence of the introduction or recommendation, a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon the purchase price. . . .”

The defenders answered,—(Ans. 7) “Admitted that, according to custom, when the relation of buyer and seller has been directly caused and brought about by a broker, a commission of varying amount is generally paid. Denied that the contract in the present case was the direct result of the pursuers’ recommendation of the defenders to him, and that the pursuers are entitled to a commission, either under contract or by custom. . . . On the contrary, the defenders dealt with Mr Bielich as the client of Messrs Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company.”

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuers not having been the causa causans of said contract, are not entitled to commission.

A proof disclosed the following facts in addition to those already narrated:—Besides obtaining the quotation contained in the defenders’ letter of 4th August, the pursuers obtained quotations from Russell & Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, and from the Grangemouth Dockyard Company. To both these firms the pursuers named Bielich, and from both they asked for a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. On 5th August they sent the three quotations to Bielich, placing Russell & Company first, the Grangemouth Dockyard Company second, and the defenders third, that being the order according to price, the lowest being stated first.

Bielich continued to correspond with the pursuers with regard to the purchase of a vessel, and constantly changed his mind as to the kind of vessel which he wanted to have. It did not appear that in the course of this later correspondence the pursuers ever mentioned the defenders’ name to Bielich, or that, beyond forwarding their quotation to him, they took any steps to effect a contract between them and him. On the other hand, the correspondence shewed that the pursuers wished to secure the order either for Russell & Company or the Grangemouth Dockyard Company.

The pursuers did not acknowledge the receipt of the defenders’ letter containing their quotation.

Besides writing to the pursuers on 29th July, Bielich also wrote in similar terms, on the same day, to Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, shipbrokers, London, who on 1st August communicated with the defenders among other shipbuilders, but without giving Bielich’s name. The defenders replied on 4th August that they could build a vessel of the kind specified for £11,850. Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company did not forward this quotation to Bielich, it not being the lowest which they had obtained. On 16th October Bielich (who during August and September had been negotiating through a Liverpool firm of brokers for the building of a vessel by the defenders) wrote to Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company,—“As I have not made as yet my arrangements for building a vessel in iron, and wishing to arrive at a settlement, please inform me at what price Messrs M'Millan & Son of Dumbarton are now prepared to build an iron vessel of about 1100 tons register.” Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company in consequence, on 17th October, wrote to the defenders (being the first occasion on which they mentioned Bielich's name to the defenders),—“Referring to your letter of the 4th August last, Mr Bielich is now here and asks us to get your lowest quotation for a steel barque about 1100 tons net register, with date of delivery, and we shall be glad if you would kindly let us have it by return of post.” The defenders replied that £12,850 was their price. Some correspondence then followed between Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company and the defenders, with the result that on 25th October the defenders contracted to build a sailing vessel for Bielich of 1000 tons for £11,600. The pursuers then wrote to the defenders claiming their commission. The defenders declined to recognise the claim, and subsequently paid a commission to Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company.

Jacobs & Co. v.
M'Millan &
Son, Limited.

With regard to the custom of trade respecting shipbrokers' commissions, Mr J. I. Jacobs, of the pursuers' firm, deponed that in his opinion the introduction of a buyer to a shipbuilder entitled the broker making the introduction to his commission—“Subject to the contract being effected, whether through us or other brokers, if the builder accepts the name of the buyer from us it is tantamount to saying that he will pay us a commission. . . . So long as it is an offer of serious business, and we have anything founding a right to go to the builder and ask a quotation, we say that if the builder accepts the name from us he is bound to pay us a commission. . . . If the shipbuilder has a name submitted by more than one broker, it is the custom for the builder to intimate to the other brokers that he has already had the name submitted from somebody else, and to say that he cannot accept the name from them, or that he only accepts it under reserve, subject to the business coming through them.”

Victor Ressich, shipbroker, Leith, a witness adduced by the pursuers, deponed in cross-examination,—“(Q.) Is this a correct statement of the custom, that the broker who introduces a purchaser to the seller of a vessel is entitled to receive from the seller or builder of the vessel sold through or in consequence of the introduction or recommendation, a commission? (A.) Yes, that is generally the case. It is correct. (Q.) Then it is not the introduction alone by itself that entitles the broker to a commission from the builder? (A.) Certainly it is. (Q.) Not the introduction alone? (A.) The correspondence, and the whole affair. If you introduce, correspond, and give all the ins and outs, then you earn your commission, not otherwise.”

Frederick Gardiner, shipbroker, Glasgow, a witness for the defenders, deponed,—“As regards the conditions upon which a broker is entitled to claim commission, according to my understanding of the custom of trade, the broker, if he introduces a buyer to a builder and closes the contract, is entitled to a commission. That is one instance. If he introduces a buyer to a builder, and by some action of his contributes to the conclusion of the contract, again I would say he is entitled to a commission. But he must have done something which contributed to a certain degree to bring about the business, otherwise he would not be entitled to it. (Q.) Then, according to your understanding, the mere introduction is not sufficient? (A.) It is very difficult to speak in general terms, because the circumstances of each case vary so widely; but if a buyer were introduced to a builder, and then within a few days that buyer and builder were brought together again by a different broker, I would say that the first broker properly had a claim to a commission, unless it was shewn that he had no authority or right in the first instance to apply to the builder, but he must shew that his action contributed to the conclusion of the contract, and that the contract would not have reached the builder unless he had intervened."

On 6th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) assoilzied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—When a shipbroker introduces a buyer to a builder and business results from the introduction, the broker is entitled by custom of trade to a commission, to be paid by the builder. Bare proof of introduction is not sufficient; it must be shewn that, in a reasonable sense and to a material extent, the contract or sale which followed was due to the introduction. On the other hand, it does not necessarily disentitle the broker to his commission that the contract or the details of the contract have been carried through and arranged not by him but by the buyer or another broker employed by the latter. Such, stated in general terms is, as I understand, the custom of trade in regard to brokers' commission. But it is plain from the bare statement of it that each case must be judged of on its own circumstances, and in judging whether commission is due or not in a case in which the contract has not been made or completed by the broker who first introduced the buyer, it is material to inquire into the actings of the broker, not only before the introduction but between the date of the introduction and the completion of the contract, and also the grounds, if any, which the builder may have had for supposing that his negotiations with or through the first broker had fallen through when he came to deal with the buyer or the second broker.

"As the broker's commission depends on business being done, it is only right that after he has introduced a client to a builder he should be protected against the buyer thereafter depriving him of his commission by going behind his back, availing himself of the introduction, and completing the contract with the builder either without the intervention of a broker or through another broker. If such a thing were to occur within a short time of the original introduction, I do not understand it to be disputed that the builder would be liable to pay the first broker a commission, as he would virtually be in bad faith in concluding the contract direct with the buyer or through another broker. But, on the other hand, it would be hard on a builder if a broker by merely naming a client to him and asking for a quotation should be able to tie the builder's hands for months afterwards, although he took no steps to bring the client and the builder together, and actually was engaged during that time in trying to place the business in the hands of other builders.

"The present dispute is certainly due in a great measure to the conduct of the buyer, a Mr Bielich, an Austrian. . . . Bielich seems to have been a very troublesome client. He frequently changed his mind. At one time he said he wished to build a ship; at another he wished to buy a second-hand ship, and then he changed his mind again. Moreover, he frequently changed his brokers, or employed several brokers at the same time, and there are some grounds for suspecting that this was not unconnected with the share of commission which this or that broker was disposed to give him. But whatever view may be taken of Bielich's conduct, that will not solve the present question, unless it can be clearly shewn that the defenders were in bad faith in dealing with Bielich through Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, after the introduction by the pursuers on 1st August 1890. . . .

"On 29th July Bielich wrote to Brosinovich asking him to let him know at 'what price you could build a sailing vessel, steel or iron, by good and well-known shipbuilders, of 1000 tons register,' &c. The result of this order was that the pursuers obtained for Bielich quotations from various builders, amongst them the defenders, to whom they wrote on 1st August 1890. On that date

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—The broker who first introduced No. 117. a possible purchaser to a shipbuilder was entitled to his commission if a the pursuers, in addition to writing to the defenders, wrote in precisely similar terms to two other firms of shipbuilders, viz., Messrs Russell & Company, Port-Glasgow, and the Grangemouth Dockyard Company. To both firms they named Bielich, and from both firms they asked a covering commission of two and a-half per cent. From all three firms they obtained quotations, and on 5th August Brosinovich, who conducted the correspondence on behalf of the pursuers, forwarded those quotations to Bielich, who was abroad, placing Russell & Company first, the Grangemouth Dockyard Company second, and the defenders third, that being the order according to price, the lowest being stated first. Now, so far as appears from the evidence, that was the last step that was taken by the pursuers in the way of bringing Bielich and the defenders together. They did not even acknowledge the defenders' letter sending the quotation. I find no letters from the pursuers to the defenders between 1st August and 28th October 1890, by which time the contract had been completed through Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, and I find no evidence that even when Bielich was in this country in September and October 1890 the defenders' names were ever brought under his notice either by Brosinovich or the pursuers.

"Not only so, but it appears from the correspondence that in many communications which passed between the pursuers and Bielich, or letters written by the pursuers on Bielich's behalf in August, September, and October 1890, they were endeavouring to secure the business, not for the defenders but for other shipbuilders, in particular Russell & Company, of Port-Glasgow. . . .

"Now, in these circumstances I think that the defenders were entitled to assume that all chance of business being done through the pursuers was, with the assent of the latter, at an end. The defenders had not even received an acknowledgment of their quotation, and that of itself was almost enough to justify their action. But besides that there was complete silence on the part of the pursuers for nearly three months, and although it is impossible to specify any fixed time on the elapse of which a claim for commission would be lost, I think that in this case the lapse of three months following upon the pursuers' failure to acknowledge the defenders' quotation or to take any steps to bring Bielich and the defenders together is sufficient to disentitle the pursuers now to claim commission from the defenders.

"I have hitherto dealt with the actings of the pursuers and the defenders, which are probably sufficient for the disposal of the case. But if regard is to be had to Bielich's conduct and what influenced him in contracting with the defenders through Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, I cannot affirm that he was to any material extent influenced by the pursuers' introduction, such as it was. He knew all about the defenders from other sources.—[His Lordship then referred to the negotiations between Bielich and the Liverpool brokers, above mentioned.]

"A good deal of evidence has been led on both sides in regard to the custom of trade with which I cannot agree. On the one hand, I cannot agree with the view of some of the defenders' witnesses that an introduction is necessarily to count for nothing unless the broker who introduces the buyer carries through the contract, or at least does some of the work connected with it. But, on the other hand, I cannot agree with some of the pursuers' witnesses, who speak as if it were enough for a broker to introduce the client and obtain a quotation, and then sit with his hands folded, and if a contract is entered into some months afterwards, but not through him, to claim his commission. If this view were well founded, a broker, on being applied to by his client to obtain quotations from well-known builders on the Clyde, it being certain that the buyer intended to do business with one or other of the builders on the Clyde, might obtain quotations from all the building firms of repute, naming the client, and thus ensure his commission in any event without taking any further steps to bring the buyer and builder together.

"The evidence which I consider of greatest weight in the case is that of the

No. 117. contract followed between the shipbuilder and the possible purchaser. That rule was proved by the evidence here, and had been recognised in previous cases.¹ If the pursuers had been the only brokers concerned it could hardly be doubted that they would have been entitled to their commission; the fact that Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company had intervened did not derogate from the pursuers' right, but merely imposed on the defenders' the duty, if they wished to protect themselves, on receiving Bielich's name from Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, of intimating to them that they already had Bielich's name from another broker. Even taking the defenders' view of the law, the pursuers were entitled to prevail, for by their recommendation of the defenders to Bielich they had materially led to the contract being concluded.

Mar. 8, 1894.
Jacobs & Co. v.
M'Millan &
Son, Limited.

Argued for the defenders;—The mere introduction of a purchaser's name to a seller was not enough to entitle the broker making the introduction to a commission. The broker must do something to bring about the contract. The contract must be the direct result of the introduction.² The pursuers had failed to shew that the contract between the defenders and Bielich was the result of their introduction.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—It is not disputed, and it is clear, that if the pursuers, Jacobs & Company, procured the contract between the defenders and Bielich in terms of the quotation of 4th August, the pursuers would have been entitled by this letter, and also by the custom of trade, to a commission of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The question is, did they procure the contract in terms of that quotation? If they did they must prevail in this action, if they did not they must fail. The Lord Ordinary has held upon the evidence that they did not, and I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that they did not. They did not acknowledge the quotation. I do not attach very great importance to that, and anything about it may be dropped out of the case. They did no more in the matter. They heard even no more of the matter until after the contract was completed on the 25th October, and it was then that for the first time they came forward and said—"Oh, that contract has been effected through us; we were the brokers who effected it, and we are entitled to the commission in terms of the letter." Now, I think that that is an untenable position. What importance Bielich attached defenders' witness, Frederick Gardiner, who gave his evidence with great clearness and moderation, and at the same time with judicious caution. His evidence is in accordance with the views upon which I have proceeded. It is plain from the answers which he gives as to custom of trade, that, in his opinion (and I think it is sound), in each case it is a jury question, depending upon circumstances, whether the broker has or has not earned his commission.

"It appears from the evidence that in some cases the commission is divided between the broker who first introduces the buyer and the broker through whom the contract is ultimately completed. I fancy that these are usually cases of arrangement or compromise. But even if in the absence of arrangement such a division could be enforced in a Court of law, I do not think that in this case there are sufficient grounds for awarding the pursuers a modified commission."

to their recommendation of M'Millan as compared with the recommendation of other people I do not know. I shall assume that he had some confidence in their judgment, and did attach some importance to it, but the commission is due to those who recommend a shipbuilder and whose recommendation is acted upon. The commission is due in law, sense, and according to the custom of trade, to the broker through whom a contract is effected. There may be a dozen brokers recommending the same shipbuilders as being likely to build a desirable vessel at a low price, but it does not follow that all these are entitled to commission. Only the one who effects the contract is entitled to it. Now, M'Millan & Son were of opinion that this contract in October was not effected by or through the instrumentality of the pursuers, from whom they had heard nothing,—with whom they had had no communication whatever since they applied for the quotation, the receipt of which they had never acknowledged in the month of August preceding. I think that that was a just conclusion on their part, and that they were entitled accordingly to give a commission which I assume to be due,—but I have not to determine that,—to Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, through whom the contract was effected, and who had also applied for and received a similar quotation in the month of August preceding.

My opinion, therefore, upon the whole matter upon this very simple case, as I conceive it,—with very few facts in it, and very little law in it,—is in accordance with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which I therefore think ought to be adhered to.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. On the 2d August the defenders received two letters of the same date—1st August,—one from Jacobs & Company, the pursuers, and the other from Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, asking for a quotation for building a certain vessel. They sent replies to each of these letters, and as far as the pursuers are concerned the negotiations for that vessel there ceased. The pursuers did not acknowledge receipt of the quotation. What they did does not appear from the letters, but there their connection with the matter ceased. On the other hand, Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, having communicated the quotation which they had received from M'Millan & Son to Bielich, heard no more from him upon the subject until the following month of October, when he resumed communication with them in regard to this particular vessel for which they had asked and obtained a quotation from the defenders in the month of August. On 17th October Galbraith, Pembroke & Company resumed correspondence with the defenders, and their letter of 17th October is this:—"Referring to your letter of 4th August last Mr Bielich is now here, and asks us to get your lowest quotation for a steel barque about 1100 tons net register, with date of delivery," and so on.

From that date, 17th October, until the 25th October, when the contract was concluded, Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company busy themselves in the matter of the contract, and ultimately bring the parties together, and get the contract completed. In these circumstances I think it clear that the contract which was executed by M'Millan & Son was brought about through the agency of Galbraith, Pembroke, & Company, and through no other intermediary, and they are therefore, as the Lord Ordinary has held, entitled to

No. 117. the commission; and that Jacobs & Company are not entitled to any commission, in respect they had no direct influence in bringing about the contract.

Contract—Right in security—Assignment to bond and disposition in security—Unconditional offer and acceptance—Implement—Defect in bond.—The holders of a bond and disposition in security having advertised the security subjects for sale, the firm of A & B, who had a reversionary interest in the subjects, in consideration of the bondholders having agreed to withdraw the subjects from sale, bound themselves, by letter, personally to take an assignation of the bond and to pay the amount therein with interest. This was agreed to by letter, and the subjects were withdrawn from sale. Thereafter A & B refused to implement the contract, on the ground that they had discovered that the bond was not a valid security over the subjects quoad the interest, and that its validity in this respect was an implied condition of their obligation. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

DUNCAN FORBES AND OTHERS, the holders of a bond and disposition in security over the lands of Meethill, dated and recorded 20th June 1862, after intimation and requisition to the debtors, proceeded to advertise the security subjects for sale in Aberdeen on 21st July 1893. On 28th June 1893 Messrs Welsh & Forbes presented a note of suspension and interdict to prevent the sale. Thereafter an arrangement was concluded between the parties in terms of the following letters:—"Edinburgh, 18th July 1893.—Suspension at our instance against Forbes and others.—Dear Sirs,—With reference to this case, and in respect that you have agreed to withdraw the sale of the lands of Meethill advertised to take place on 21st inst., we undertake and bind ourselves personally to take an assignation at our expense to the bond of £3500 in favour of ourselves, or of a lender to be selected by us, and to pay the amount therein, with all arrears of interest thereon, the said interest to be calculated at 4 per cent, with simple interest at said rate upon the arrears of interest, and further to pay the expense of the notarial intimation, and of the advertising the subjects for sale, and withdrawing them from sale, as these may be adjusted between us, or taxed, if necessary, but said expenses to exclude the proposed charges for the articles of roup and inventory of titles. The settlement on this footing to take place at the ensuing term of Martinmas.

"In respect of this undertaking, it has been agreed that the note of suspension should be withdrawn, neither party being entitled to expenses.—Yours truly, WELSH & FORBES.

Forbes v.
Welsh &
Forbes.

Messrs Welsh & Forbes having declined to implement the contract, Duncan Forbes and others, the holders of the bond, raised the present action against them, concluding for declarator and implement.

The pursuers, in cond. 1, set forth the bond and disposition in security for £3500, dated and recorded 20th June 1862, and the note of suspension above mentioned.

Defences were lodged, in which the defenders stated that when they received the security writs on 13th September 1893 they, for the first time, became aware “that the bond and disposition in security is defective in its terms. The obligation is to repay the principal sums ‘with a fifth part more of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and the interest of the said principal sum, from the date hereof to the said term of payment.’ No rate of interest is specified, nor is it stated that the interest is to be at the legal rate. The defenders therefore maintain that, inasmuch as no unknown or uncertain incumbrance can be created over land by bond and disposition in security, the title tendered by the pursuers is not valid and sufficient. . . . The defenders maintain that they are entitled to receive, on making payment of the stipulated sums, a title which will enable them to exact payment of the interest out of the lands. The personal obligation in the bond is worthless. No interest has been paid upon the said bond since 1886. The arrears of interest claimed by the pursuers amount to £854, 16s. 7d.”

The defenders pleaded;—(2) According to a sound construction of the arrangement embodied in the defenders' letter of 18th July 1893, and relative acceptance, their obligation to take an assignation to the said bond is subject to the implied condition that they should thereby obtain a valid security over the lands for the payment of interest. (3) In respect the said bond is defective in the interest clause, the defenders are not bound to take an assignation thereto. (4) In any event, the pursuers are bound to establish to the satisfaction of the Court that they are in a position to grant the defenders a valid security over the lands for the payment of interest before calling on the defenders to take an assignation.

On 16th January 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the bond and disposition in security described in the summons being defective in the clause of interest, in respect that no rate of interest is specified therein, the defenders are not bound to accept an assignation thereof under the offer and acceptance of 18th and 19th July 1893 respectively: To that extent and effect sustains the pleas in law for defenders: Assolizies them from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns,” &c.*

* “OPINION.— . . . It is not disputed that the defenders are entitled to a valid heritable security for repayment out of the lands of interest as well as of principal, but the pursuers contend that the bond in question is of that character.

“The argument of the pursuers is as follows:—There is an obligation to pay interest, and the only effect of the rate of interest not being specified is, that the debtor can be compelled to pay the highest rate of interest for which a Court of law would, in the absence of agreement, give decree, namely, 5 per cent. The bond, therefore, did not fall within the rule that an indefinite amount could not be made a burden upon lands, because the rule was satisfied

 Forbes v.
 Welsh &
 Forbes.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The title offered by them was good. When no special rate of interest was mentioned in a bond legal interest was understood—that is to say, interest at 5 per cent, or, at all events, interest at not more than 5 per cent, which was quite sufficiently specific to make the incumbrance over the land valid.¹ Further, the letters of offer and acceptance completed the contract, and it must be taken in law that Messrs Welsh & Forbes took the bond just as it stood. They did not dispute that the bond in question was the one they agreed to take. On the contrary, their own averments in cond. 1 clearly shewed that it was the same, and they should have found out any objection patent on its face before they offered to take an assignation to it.

The defenders maintained that the title offered was bad in respect no interest was specified, and further, that what they agreed to take was a good title to an incumbrance over the lands in question. The offer was subject to an implied condition that the title they should receive should be valid.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has decided this case on a view entirely different to that presented to us in the latter part of the argument on the reclaiming note. We are now asked to determine what is proper implement of the contract embodied in the letters set forth in the record.

The offer made by Messrs Welsh & Forbes is as follows:—They bind themselves “to take an assignation at our expense to the bond of £3500 in favour of ourselves, or of a lender to be selected by us, and to pay the amount therein with all arrears of interest thereon, the said interest to be calculated at 4 per cent.” Now the bond is identified in a very distinct manner by the pursuers in their opening statement, for they begin their narrative by saying that they and the defenders went to law over a particular bond, dated and recorded on certain dates. It appears that the pursuers took proceedings for the purpose of bringing the security subjects to sale, and that Messrs Welsh & Forbes took if the maximum amount with which the lands were charged could be ascertained.

“The point is a novel one, and is not without difficulty. It may be that, in a question with the debtor under the personal obligation, payment of interest at the rate of 5 per cent could be enforced. But it does not follow that the interest is validly constituted a burden upon the lands. The law is settled and precise that, in order to the constitution of a valid security over lands, the amount secured must be definite, and the full amount of the charge must be capable of being ascertained by inspection of the records. Thus, in Tod v. Dunlop (1 D. 231), it was held that a security for the sum contained in certain acceptances was bad, because the amount for which the acceptances were granted was not stated, although they were identified by their dates.

“I think that it is very difficult to hold that a security for interest on a principal sum, which does not in any way specify the rate of interest, is anything else than indefinite. I am therefore of opinion that the defenders cannot be compelled to accept an assignation of the bond in question. It is not disputed that the defenders are entitled to a security which is good against the lands both for principal and interest, and I do not think that they are bound to accept a security under which it is at least extremely doubtful whether they can recover the arrears of interest.”

steps to prevent their doing so. Afterwards Messrs Welsh & Forbes made the offer I have read on condition of the pursuers "withdrawing the sale." Now, it cannot be taken as other than quite clear that, in making this offer, they were in full knowledge of the writ in question, and, at all events, it and nothing else was the subject of the bargain. No. 118.

Forbes v. Welsh & Forbes.

Taking then the averments in condn. 1 and 2, from which it appears that the litigation was to be settled by the bond in question being transferred from the pursuers to Messrs Welsh & Forbes, the latter parties agreeing to take an assignation to a particular writ, I think it is impossible to say that, because they find something wrong with the bond which was patent on the face of it, the defenders, who agreed to take it, are now to be relieved from doing so. They must be held to have agreed to take it just as it was.

Now, although the Lord Ordinary has not taken cognisance of this view, I think it gives a short and conclusive answer to the question before us, and that the bargain made must be implemented.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The persons who agreed to take an assignation to this bond describe and identify it in their letter making the offer. I think, therefore, that they agreed to accept an assignation to that specific bond, and that the case is the same in principle as that of a purchased estate, where the purchaser agrees to take the title as it stands.

It is, accordingly, not necessary to consider the question raised in the Lord Ordinary's note, but I think it right to say that I am not to be understood as concurring with his Lordship's view, if the question were before us. Whether the bond is a good security for interest may have to be determined hereafter, and on that point I desire to reserve my opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur, and I refrain from expressing any opinion on the question of interest referred to by Lord M'Laren.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and finding and declaring that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers an assignation of the bond, &c., and ordaining "the defenders to implement their part of the contract libelled, at or before the term of Whitsunday 1894, by making payment to the pursuers at or before said term, in exchange for an assignation of the said bond and disposition in security, of the said sum of £4276, 0s. 7d., in the following proportions, namely," &c.: "Continue the cause as regards the remaining conclusion of the summons."

Succession—Satisfaction of legacy by advances—Interest.—A truster bequeathed a share of residue to his daughters in liferent only and their children in fee, but declaring "that all advances which I have made, or

No. 119. may hereafter make, to my respective sons-in-law, shall be deducted from the respective shares" liferented by his daughters. On various occasions the truster had lent sums to a firm of which one of his sons-in-law was sole partner, and had further guaranteed the payment of a sum due by his son-in-law to another firm. The son-in-law's firm, and he, as sole partner thereof, suspended payment, and their affairs were wound up under a trust-deed, which declared that "it is a condition of this deed that the creditors who accede hereto, or who shall take payment of a dividend on their claims, shall be held to have discharged us of the whole debts due by us to them." The truster acceded to this deed, took payment of dividends, and granted receipts therefor, which bore that he accepted the dividends in terms of the trust-disposition, and discharged his son-in-law. At the date of the truster's death there was still a balance due to him on the above transactions. In a special case held that the balance of the truster's advances, which had not been repaid to him, but without interest, fell, as at the date of the truster's death, to be imputed as a payment to account of the share of residue falling to the daughter's children.

1ST DIVISION. ALEXANDER SMITH, of Auchentroig, Buchlyvie, died on 7th December 1891, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 28th April 1883.

By the third purpose of his trust-disposition the truster bequeathed one-half of the residue of his estate to his sons equally in fee, and the other half equally among his daughters in liferent for their liferent use only, and to their respective children in fee. That purpose contained the following declaration:—"Declaring that whatever sum or sums of money I may advance to any of my sons for the purpose of enabling them to commence business or otherwise shall be imputed to account of their respective shares of the residue of my said means and estate, and that all advances which I have made, or may hereafter make, to my respective sons-in-law, shall be deducted from the respective shares of the fee of the half of the said residue liferented by my said several daughters, their wives."

A question having arisen as to whether a sum of £3786, 2s. 4d. fell to be deducted from the share of the residue belonging to Margaret Muir Smith or Sellar, one of the testator's daughters, a special case was presented to the Court, to which the trustees under the trust-disposition were the first parties; the husband and children of the deceased Margaret Muir Sellar, the second parties; the sons of the truster, the third parties; and his remaining daughters and their children, the fourth parties.

The facts, as appearing from the special case, were as follows:—Mrs Margaret Muir Sellar predeceased the truster, survived by her husband William Sellar and nine children. William Sellar carried on business in Glasgow under the firm of Donald & Sellar, of which he was, after 15th March 1876, the sole partner. On 19th May 1876 the truster lent to the company of Donald & Sellar a sum of £2500, conform to receipt therefor,* and on the 28th December 1880, in terms of a minute of agreement between J. & W. Campbell & Company, warehousemen, Glasgow, the said Donald & Sellar, and William Sellar, and the truster, dated 28th and 29th December 1880, he advanced in loan to the said Donald & Sellar a further sum of £1000.† The truster also guaranteed the ultimate

* The receipt bore that £2500 had been received from Alexander Smith to the credit of his deposit-account, and was signed "Donald & Sellar."

† The minute of agreement contained these clauses:—

"First, Without prejudice to, but in corroboration of the previous agreement between the parties dated 30th March and 7th April 1876, the second [Donald & Sellar and William Sellar] and third parties [the truster] hereto acknowledge that the second party is still indebted and owing to the first party the said sum of £7000, the ultimate payment of which to the extent of the first £2750 the payment by the said William Sellar of the sum of £4250 to the said J. & W. Campbell & Company, being part of the debt of £8500 due by the said William Sellar to them, all conform to minute of agreement between the said J. & W. Campbell & Company, William Sellar, and the truster, dated 30th March and 7th April 1876. Further, the truster also by said minute of agreement of 28th and 29th December 1880 of new guaranteed the ultimate payment to the said J. & W. Campbell & Company of the first £2750 of the sum of £7000, being the amount of the debt then due by the said William Sellar to the said J. & W. Campbell & Company. On 3d April 1883 the firm of Donald & Sellar, and the said William Sellar, as sole partner thereof, and as an individual, suspended payment, and their affairs were wound up under a trust-deed dated 3d April 1883. The truster, the said Alexander Smith, acceded to the trust-deed, and lodged a claim with the trustee thereunder, amounting to £3162, 12s. 1d. This claim was duly admitted, and in respect thereof the truster received and granted receipts for dividends from the trust-estate amounting to £1189, 5s. 5d., leaving a balance unpaid on the claim of £1973, 6s. 8d.* The truster was also called upon, under his guarantee to Messrs J. & W. Campbell & Company, to pay, and made payment to them of £1812, 15s. 8d. The difference between the amount paid by him on behalf of his son-in-law and the amount received by him was £3786, 2s. 4d. At the date of the said trust-disposition and settlement four daughters of the testator were married, and three of his sons-in-law survived. None of the testator's sons or sons-in-law had, so far as known to the parties received any advances, with the exception of William Sellar.

The trust-deed by Donald & Sellar and William Sellar contained the following clause:—"Declaring further that it is a condition of this deed that the creditors who accede hereto, or who shall take payment of a dividend on their claims, shall be held to have discharged us of the whole debts due by us to them."

The questions for the opinion and judgment of the Court were:—"(1) Does the said sum of £3786, 2s. 4d., or any part thereof, fall to be deducted by the first parties from the share of residue belonging to the children of Margaret Muir Smith or Sellar? (2) Is interest chargeable upon the said sum of £3786, 2s. 4d., and, if so, at what rate?"

The third and fourth parties maintained that the whole sum of £3786, 2s. 4d. should be deducted, and interest charged thereon at five per cent. It was true that the advances were not all made to William Sellar personally but partly to his firm, but practically they came to be advances to him.¹ It was probable that the testator had them in his mind when he made his settlement. The discharge in the trust-deed by third party hereby of new guarantees. So soon as payments to the extent of £2750 have been made by the second party to the first party, the third party shall be relieved of his obligation for the payment thereof.

"Second, On the execution and delivery of these presents by all the parties hereto, the first and third parties agree to advance or pay the sum of £3000 in loan to the second party, £2000 of said sum being advanced by the first party, and the remaining £1000 by the third party, which loan shall bear interest at the rate of five per centum per annum until repaid."

* The receipts granted by the truster in respect of dividends from the estates of Donald & Sellar and William Sellar all bore, "which dividend I accept in terms of the said trust-disposition and assignation, and discharge the said William Sellar."

No. 119. Donald & Sellar and William Sellar did not discharge the debt in favour of William Sellar personally; the clause itself distinctly negatived that view. Interest should be charged in the ordinary way at 5 per cent from the date of the advances.

Mar. 9, 1894.
Smith's Trustees v. Sellar.

Argued for the second parties;—The sum in question was not an advance within the meaning of the clause in the trust-deed. It was simply a debt due by Donald & Sellar, and was discharged in so many words by the receipts for dividends. The children of Mr Sellar were not responsible for his debts, but a deduction such as was proposed practically made them so. Even if the sum was treated as an advance, no interest could be charged, as there was no direction in the trust-deed to that effect.¹ At all events it could only be charged from the date of the testator's death.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The first question has reference to a clause in the trust-settlement of the testator, providing "that all advances which I have made or may hereafter make to my respective sons-in-law shall be deducted from the respective shares of the fee of the half of the said residue liferented by my said several daughters, their wives." The trust-deed is dated 28th April 1883, and prior to that date the truster had advanced to his son-in-law William Sellar the sums set out in the third article of the case. On 3d April 1883 William Sellar, who carried on business under the firm of Donald & Sellar, suspended payment, and of the same date granted a trust-deed under which the business of the firm was wound up. The testator acceded to the trust-deed, claiming to the amount of £3162, 12s. 1d. His claim was admitted, and he received dividends from the trust-estate amounting to £1189, 5s. 5d., leaving an unsatisfied balance of £1973, 6s. 8d. By accepting a dividend the testator of course discharged his right to recover the unpaid balance. The testator also made a payment under a guarantee which he had undertaken on behalf of Mr Sellar, and the difference between the total amount which the testator paid on behalf of his son-in-law and the amount received in the form of dividends is stated to be £3786, 2s. 4d.

1. The first question in this case is whether the difference ought to be deducted by the testamentary trustees from the share of residue which is given to Mrs Sellar's children?

But for the direction which I have quoted, it is evident that the proposed deduction could not be made. Mrs Sellar predeceased the testator, the liferent intended for her did not take effect, and the fee of the share of the residue appropriated to the Sellar family went to her children, who are not responsible for their father's debts. Moreover, the debts of William Sellar were discharged, and even if he had been the residuary legatee of the share in question, the testamentary trustees could not have treated a debt which had been discharged as a subsisting debt of which they were entitled to operate payment by retention.

But a direction to testamentary trustees to impute advances to account of succession may be, and generally is, intended to empower the trustees to apply to advances made in the testator's lifetime a principle which would not be applicable if the will were silent on the subject, i.e., to treat such advances not as debts but as payments to account of children's shares of succession. The object of such a direction is of course to secure equality in the distribution of the

and settled that, in the construction of such directions, the word "advances" is not to be confined to advances by way of loan for which the father might have sued or claimed in bankruptcy, but is to include money advanced of which a record is kept, but which the son or daughter was under no obligation to pay. Mar. 9, 1894.

v. Sellar.

Now, if the direction to impute advances to account of shares of succession would include, for example, money given to a daughter on her marriage, or to a son to purchase an interest in a business, for which no receipt or obligation was taken at the time, it is difficult to see why money lent to a child upon an obligation to repay should cease to be an advance because that obligation is discharged, either by the voluntary act of the father, or by the operation of the principles of the law of bankruptcy.

Another consideration, to which our attention was directed by counsel for the Sellar family, is that, while the advances were made to their father, payment is to be made by deducting the sums advanced from the children's provisions. But this is the very thing which the testator has directed, and the fact that he has so directed shews that he was not thinking about getting payment to his estate of a debt, but only of dividing his succession equitably by a per stirpes division in which advances made to a parent were to be imputed to the account of the children's succession. This conclusion is, I think, in accordance with the opinions expressed in the House of Lords in Hutcheson v. Skelton, 2 Macq. 492, and Berry v. Downie, 1 D. 1216, 19 Scot. Jur. 447.

2. It follows from what has been said that the advances in question only became imputable to account of succession at the testator's death, and that interest is not due for the antecedent period. In making up the residue account as at the testator's death, the sum of £3786, 2s. 4d. will be added to residue, and then the account of the Sellar family will be debited with this sum as a sum already paid.

LORD KINNEAR.—By discharge of these debts on a composition they ceased to be debts enforceable by action, but still they were advances which were in part unsatisfied, and they were made to one of the truster's sons-in-law. It was, therefore, quite in the power of the truster to say that they should be deducted from the share of the residue falling to the children of that son-in-law. The question is whether, on a sound construction of the will, he intended such a deduction to be made. I read the deed as referring to the state of the circumstances at the date of the truster's death. At that date he was certainly out of pocket for advances to his son-in-law, and I think there is no room for doubt that when he directed that deductions should be made for advances to his sons-in-law, he had these advances in his mind. I therefore concur.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare, with reference to the first question, that the sum of £3786, 2s. 4d. is an advance which falls, in terms of Alexander Smith's trust-disposition and settlement, to be deducted from the share of fee of the half of the residue of his estate thereby appointed to be liferented by his daughter Margaret Muir Smith or Sellar: Find and declare, with reference to the second question, that such advance only became imputable to account of succession at the testator's death, and that no interest is due thereon."

Succession—Trust—Charitable trust—Uncertainty.—Held that a direction to trustees to pay and apply the residue of the testator's estate "to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions" as the trustees in their discretion might think proper, was not void from uncertainty.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

DAVID COBB, of Taypark, near Dundee, died in January 1892, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d October 1888, by which he conveyed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and with respect to the residue, directed them in the following terms:—"I further direct my said trustees to pay and apply whatever residue and interest thereon may remain in their hands to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions as they in their discretion may think proper, it being hereby declared that the decision of my said trustees or the majority of them, in regard to said useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions, shall be final and binding upon all concerned."

In September 1892 Peter Cobb, one of the testator's next of kin, brought an action against the trustees, in which he averred that the bequest of the residue was "vague, indefinite, and uncertain, and its terms are in law impracticable and incapable of being carried out," and concluded for declarator that the bequest of the residue was void, and that the residue fell to be distributed as intestate succession of the deceased, and for an accounting.

The trustees, in defence, pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (3) The residuary bequest in the said trust-disposition and settlement not being invalid on the grounds stated, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 2d February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) sustained the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuer cannot point to any Scottish decision in support of his contention, but he cites a number of English authorities which, if I understand them aright, establish the rule that a bequest for distribution at the discretion of trustees for any other than charitable purposes is void, and that where other purposes of an indefinite nature are named along with charitable purposes, so that the whole might be applied for either purpose, the English Courts will not sustain even the charitable part of the bequest which, if it stood by itself, would be good. The reason for this somewhat artificial rule seems to be that as the execution of every English trust is held to be under the control of the Court, it must be of such a nature that the Court itself can, if necessary, execute the trust. It can execute a trust for charitable uses, because the word 'charitable' has in England a well ascertained legal meaning (much wider than its natural meaning), derived from the Statute of Elizabeth and the decisions of the Court of Chancery thereupon; but other words, though of similar import, are held to constitute too vague a direction for the Court to administer, and if for the Court, so also for trustees.

"I refer particularly to the judgment of Lord Eldon in Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (1805), 10 Vesey, 521, now reported in 7 Revised Reports, 232.

"It seems to me that there is no such rule in Scotland, and that the reason

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—This bequest of residue was void from uncertainty. The pursuer admitted that a bequest to “charitable for it does not exist. Our Courts do not supervise or execute trusts, and the recent case of Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae, 20 R. 358, shews that they will not transmit to a judicial factor appointed by them the discretion as to the selection of objects of the testator's bounty which had been validly committed by the testator to his own trustees.

“Nothing can illustrate more strongly the vital distinction between the two systems than to contrast the English cases of Williams v. Kershaw, 5 Cl. and Fin. 111, and In re Jarman's Estate, 8 Chanc. Div. 584, with the judgments of the House of Lords, sitting as a Court of Appeal from Scotland in Hill v. Burns, 2 Wilson and Shaw, 80, and Millar v. Black's Trustees, 2 Sh. and Maclean, 866. In Williams v. Kershaw, Lord Cottenham, when Master of the Rolls, held that a direction by a testator to his trustees to apply the residue of his personal estate to and for such benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes as they in their discretion should think most advantageous and beneficial, was void for uncertainty. In Jarman's Estate, Vice-Chancellor Hall decided that a direction to trustees to apply the residue to any charitable or benevolent purpose they might agree upon was indefinite and inoperative, and therefore bad. But in Hill v. Burns the House of Lords sustained a bequest whereby a testatrix appointed the residue of her estate to be applied by her trustees in aid of the institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes established, or to be established, in the city of Glasgow or neighbourhood thereof, coupled with a declaration that they should be the sole judges of the appropriation of the residue for these purposes. Still more significantly, in Millar v. Black's Trustees, the House decided that a bequest to trustees to apply the residue to such charitable and benevolent purposes as they might think proper, was not void for uncertainty. In Crichton v. Grierson, 3 Wilson & Shaw, 329, Lord Lyndhurst stated the rule of Scots law in perfectly general terms. That was a case where the testator declared his wish to be that the residue should be applied in such charitable purposes and in bequests to such of his friends and relations as might be pointed out by his wife, with the approbation of the majority of his trustees. Lord Lyndhurst, in holding the direction to be good, stated (at p. 338) the question to be ‘whether it is competent for the disposer by a deed of this description to point out particular classes of persons and objects which are intended to be the object of his favour, and then to leave it to an individual, or a body of individuals, after his death to select out of those classes the particular individuals or the particular objects to whom the bounty of the testator shall be applied’? And he added,—‘I apprehend that according to the authorities in the law of Scotland it is quite clear a party has this power.’ Towards the end of his opinion (at p. 343) his Lordship took occasion to say that, in respect to bequests for charitable purposes, the law of England was ‘more strict than the law of Scotland.’

“It seems to me impossible, in the face of these decisions, to say that this bequest is void. The testator here has been more precise than some of the testators in the cases I have mentioned, because he does not content himself with the phrase ‘useful, benevolent, and charitable purposes,’ he points out ‘useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions’ as the objects of his bounty. The trustees have a free hand in selecting the particular objects, but they must be ‘institutions,’ which implies a definite organisation and some element of permanence. Except for the introduction of the word ‘useful,’ the case is precisely ruled by Millar v. Black's Trustees. Now, does the word ‘useful’ vitiate the whole bequest? I think not. Suppose the expression ‘useful institutions’ had stood alone. They are a class of objects as to which no doubt opinions might widely differ, but I know of no authority in the law of Scotland for saying that a testator might not delegate to his trustees the duty of selecting from among that class, according to their own opinion of what constituted a useful institution. Some fanciful illustrations were put by the pursuer's counsel of institutions which most men would admit to be useful, but which would not be appropriate recipients of a testator's bounty. Similar things might be said of

No. 120. institutions" was effectual,¹ as also, by the law of Scotland, a bequest to "benevolent institutions,"² but a bequest to "useful institutions" was bad, the word "useful" being so vague that it practically gave the trustees no criterion by which to exercise their discretion.³ A testator was not entitled to delegate his power of testing absolutely to trustees.⁴ To be effectual a trust must be for purposes sufficiently definite to enable the Court to determine whether the trustees in disposing of the trust-estate were in breach of trust or not.⁵ The Courts in Scotland had power to superintend the administration of trusts,⁶ and although they might not have adopted the technical meaning of the word "charitable," recognised in England, the trust purposes must be definite, otherwise such superintendence was impossible. In Hill v. Burns,⁷ and Millar v. Black's Trustees,⁷ and in the prior decisions referred to in these cases, the trust purposes were all definite. Here the purposes were not sufficiently definite, for the trustees might, if they thought fit, give the residue of the trust-estate, or part of it, to institutions which they chose to consider "useful," but which were neither charitable nor benevolent. The expression "useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions," was to be read disjunctively,—that was to say, "and" was to be read as equivalent to "or," for the expression meant "useful institutions and benevolent institutions and charitable institutions," thus giving the trustees the power of handing over the residue to institutions belonging to any one or more of these three classes that they thought fit, and therefore to "useful institutions" if the trustees so decided. By the law of England a gift to "benevolent or every discretionary trust, because all discretion is liable to be abused. This Court has power to restrain abuses in the administration of trusts at the suit of the testator's next of kin, or perhaps of the Lord Advocate, however wide the discretion of trustees may be. But we are not to anticipate the abuse of discretion. It seems to me that the word 'useful' may to some extent be explained and controlled by the company in which it stands, but that even by itself it sufficiently designates a large class of institutions to which the testator's bounty might properly enough be applied, and which might not in strict language be covered by the words 'charitable' or 'benevolent.' The word 'charitable' in England, according to the definition in the Statute of Elizabeth, covers schools of learning and scholarships in universities, and it has been held to extend to such bodies as the British Museum and the Geographical Society, and to such purposes as public religious instruction (Jarman on Wills, 208-9). These are purposes which might not fall within the ordinary meaning of 'charitable,' or even of 'benevolent,' and it would be a singular result if the freer scope of the law of Scotland with respect to bequests of this kind were found to leave less latitude to testators than the narrower rule of the law of England. But while my own opinion is that the trustees might allocate the testator's money to institutions which are useful without being either charitable or benevolent, there is another construction of the clause which would remove all difficulty on this head—I mean the construction that any institution receiving benefit must be at once charitable, benevolent, and useful. Such a construction is by no means a forced one, and at all events I should prefer it to holding that there was intestacy. . . ."

charitable institutions," would be bad,¹ as also would a gift to "useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions,"² but a gift to "benevolent and charitable institutions" would be good.³ [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—
 Why should the construction be distributive when there are three adjectives, and conjunctive when there are two?] Because when there were three adjectives it was doubtful what was to be read between the first and the second.⁴ So also in America, a gift to "charitable, educational, and scientific purposes" had been construed disjunctively, and had therefore been held void.⁵ [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But do not these adjectives require the disjunctive construction? Can you combine them in a single institution? Here you may construe the bequest to mean a bequest to "useful benevolent institutions, and useful charitable institutions."] That was virtually to read "useful" as an adverb. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But am I not bound to adopt a construction which sustains a will rather than one which destroys it?] No doubt a benignant construction of words in a will was in general to be adopted, so as if possible to avoid intestacy; but that principle did not apply to cases in which the testator had not taken the trouble to dispose of his property for himself, and had simply handed over the disposition of it to trustees.

Argued for the defenders;—The law of Scotland with respect to public trusts differed from that of England. In England trusts for charitable purposes eo nomine, or for purposes which, in the estimation of the law, were charitable purposes, would be sustained, because the Court knew what charitable purposes were and consequently could execute, or control the execution of, such trusts; on the other hand, public trusts for purposes which were not charitable would be held void for uncertainty; the Court, having no knowledge of the nature of such purposes, could neither execute, nor control the execution of, trusts for carrying them into effect. By charitable trusts the law of England understood a trust for one or other of the purposes enumerated in the preamble to the Statute 43 Eliz. cap. 4, or for a purpose which the Court held to be within the spirit and intendment of the statute. This whole doctrine had no place in the law of Scotland. It was the policy of the Courts in Scotland, with respect both to public and to private trusts, to leave the trustees as far as possible in the administration of the trust. Hence trusts, although they gave the trustees the largest discretion as to the distribution of the trust funds, would be sustained.⁶ It was not the law of Scotland that a testator could not put the disposal of his property at the will and discretion of another.⁷ Therefore a bequest to trustees to distribute trust property among such "useful institutions" as they thought fit was not void from uncertainty. But even if a trust for "useful institutions" was void from uncertainty, the gift of residue here would not fail if a construction was possible which would give it validity. Testamentary deeds, and particularly testamentary deeds for charitable purposes, always received a benignant construction so as to sustain the deed, if possible; and the law of Scotland was peculiarly favourable to charitable bequests.¹ If then the gift, in so far as it was in favour of "useful institutions," was void from uncertainty, the word "useful" ought to be held pro non scripto.² But it was not necessary to read the gift as a gift to "useful institutions"; the gift of the residue might be read either as a gift to "useful benevolent institutions and useful charitable institutions," or as a gift to institutions which were at once useful, benevolent, and charitable. Either of these constructions was grammatically admissible, and ought to be adopted rather than that the gift should fail from uncertainty.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here is whether a bequest to trustees, with directions to them to apply the amount to "useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions," is void from uncertainty. There can be no doubt that a bequest which directs trustees to apply its amount for the benefit of charitable institutions would be valid. The cases leave that matter in no uncertainty. But it is contended that the word "useful" in this testament renders the bequest void, because useful is a vague expression, and is separable from the other expressions. The contention is that the three expressions, "useful, benevolent, and charitable," are not to be read together, but to be read as alternatives to one another, as if they were connected by the word "or." I do not think that they should be so read if a reasonable meaning can be found when they are read as they stand, joined by a copulative and not a disjunctive. And I am of opinion that the words can, without any straining, and rather in accordance with their natural sequence, be read so as to refer to institutions of a benevolent and charitable character such as the trustees may select, they being called upon in doing so to consider and form an opinion as to whether the institutions being benevolent and charitable are also doing useful work in the community. The words "benevolent and charitable" may be held to form one expression in which the words are truly used as exegetical of each other respectively, the word "useful" overriding both. That is my view of how this phrase may be read and should be read. So reading it, the contention that this bequest is null from uncertainty must fail, and I think that your Lordships should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

I do not go into the matter more fully or into the consideration of the question whether if the words of the bequest were to be read as disjoined the bequest might not be valid, for I have had an opportunity of reading an opinion prepared by Lord Trayner in which I entirely concur.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The testator in this case directed his trustees, inter alia, "to pay and apply whatever residue and interest thereon may remain in their hands to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions as they in their discretion may think proper." This direction, the pursuer maintains, is void through uncertainty, and if that contention were sustained, the result would be that quoad the residue thus directed to be distributed according to the discretion of the trustees there would be intestacy. That is a result not easily to be arrived at, because the truster certainly did not intend that his estate or any part of it should be distributed according to the law of intestate succession, but intended it to go according to another rule, namely, the discretion and choice of his trustees. It may be, however, that a direction by a testator is so vague and uncertain as to be void, although the Court will be disposed, if it can, so to read the direction that it may have effect, rather than construe it so as to render it unavailing. It does not appear to me to be necessary in this case in order to sustain the direction in the will before us to have recourse either to our general rules of construction or to that tendency of our law to avoid intestacy where this can reasonably be done, for in my opinion the direction in question cannot be considered as void through uncertainty when regard is had to a series of decisions already pronounced, and of authority, in our Courts.

Cobb v. Cobb's
Trustees.

The view of the direction in question which the pursuer presents is that there are three classes of institutions mentioned therein, to any one of which the trustees may give the benefit of the testator's bounty,—namely, useful institutions, benevolent institutions, or charitable institutions; that while the two latter are sufficiently defined to sustain the direction, the first, "useful institutions," to which according to his view the whole of the directed residue might be given, is too vague. I reserve my opinion upon the question whether a direction to trustees to give a portion of the trust-estate under their charge to "useful institutions" would be void through uncertainty according to the law of Scotland. It is not necessary, in the view I take of this case, to consider or decide that question, for in my opinion the testator here did not direct anything to be given to merely "useful institutions." I read his direction as one to his trustees to favour benevolent and charitable institutions, which are at the same time useful. The word "useful" is used to qualify both "benevolent" and "charitable." In that view of the clause it is a matter of indifference whether the "and" is read as conjunctive, or as equivalent to the disjunctive "or." Now, if the clause can fairly be read as I propose to read it, the pursuer's argument fails. He does not dispute that a gift or direction to benefit a "useful benevolent institution," or a "useful charitable institution," would be valid. He argues against this construction however, that it is employing two adjectives, the one to qualify the other; whereas in his reading of the clause "useful" is used to qualify the substantive, just as the other adjectives do. I think this, in any view, an extremely narrow ground on which to proceed with the result of frustrating the intention of a testator. But I find no difficulty in reading the two words as adjectives qualifying each other, as well as qualifying the substantive which follows, and I see that the same view about the use of double adjectives was taken by Mr Justice Pearson—in the case of Sutton, L. R., 28 Chan. Div. 464—cited during the debate.

The pursuer relied very much upon the decision pronounced in Williams v. Kershaw, 5 Cl. and Fin. 111, where it was held that a direction by a testator to trustees to apply the residue of his estate "for such benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes" as they should think right, was void through uncertainty. In that case, the Master of the Rolls held in construing the direction before him that the intention of the testator was to leave his trustees a discretion in the choice of purposes which were benevolent, or charitable, or religious. So read, the deed gave the trustees the power of bestowing the whole of the truster's residue on objects which were, in their opinion, benevolent; and that

No. 120. being by the law of England void through uncertainty, the truster's residue was held to be undisposed of. The decision in that case was not cited as an authority in any way binding upon us, or as one which we ought to follow, and indeed it could not be so, for the law of Scotland recognises as sufficiently certain to be valid, a direction to trustees to distribute or bestow trust-estate on benevolent objects or purposes. The case was cited, I understood, chiefly as an instance where a learned Judge had construed the language in a will as disjunctive which apparently was conjunctive, and it was suggested that the same course should be followed here, so as to make the direction before us read as if the truster had directed his trustees to bestow his bounty on useful or benevolent or charitable institutions, and so to read the word "useful" as qualifying institutions, and as altogether independent of the terms benevolent and charitable. But even for this limited purpose I think the case of Williams does not help the pursuer. The terms there used were such as might lead, and in fact did lead, to the conclusion that they must be read as descriptive or designative of independent objects and purposes. "Benevolent" would scarcely be used as qualifying "charitable," and "benevolent and charitable" if read together as qualifying "religious" led to the result, as the Master of the Rolls said, that "every application must be to a religious purpose," a construction which he rejected. But here there is no such difficulty to contend with; "useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions" are terms which may fairly, and I think in this case properly, be read as indicating institutions benevolent or charitable in their character and useful in their operations. The adjectives used are such as may reasonably be read together as qualifying the substantive, and do not point to their being used as independently designative. I am on these grounds for affirming the judgment reclaimed against.

THE COURT adhered.

COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE COUNTY OF ARGYLL, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Asher—Graham Stewart.

County Council—Assessment—Burgh—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50).—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, a county council is entitled to levy the county general assessment on the annual value of lands and heritages in parliamentary burghs within the county, which have less than 7000 inhabitants and have no police establishment.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

ON 4th May 1893 Martin Brydon Lawrence, clerk to and as representing the Police Commissioners of Oban, brought an action against the County Council of Argyllshire, for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to levy county general assessments on the annual value of lands and heritages within the bounds of the burgh of Oban, and, in particular, were not entitled to levy from the Police Commissioners certain specified sums in name of county general assessment in respect of property belonging to the commissioners within the burgh, and for interdict.

Oban was a parliamentary burgh, which had a population of under 7000, and had adopted the General Police and Improvement (Scotland)

Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), but had not a police force of its own. The defenders maintained that, as Oban was a burgh in this position, they were entitled to levy the county general assessment on the annual value of the lands and heritages within the burgh.

On 2d November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) granted decree of declarator and interdict, as concluded for.*

* “ OPINION.— . . . That Act [the County General Assessment Act, 1868], commences with the preamble that it is expedient to abolish the power of levying ‘rogue money,’ and in ‘lieu thereof to confer upon Commissioners of Supply of counties in Scotland the power of levying a ‘county general assessment.’ The second section abolishes ‘rogue money,’ and the fourth section contains the enactments by which the general county assessment is established. It is there provided that the Commissioners of Supply ‘of every county in Scotland’ shall, once in each year, impose an assessment to be called the ‘county general assessment upon all lands and heritages within such county, according to the yearly value thereof as established by the Valuation-roll for the year.’

“That enactment seems to me to admit of only one construction. The assessment is to be imposed upon lands and heritages within the county, according to the value established by the Valuation-roll of the county. The power to assess, therefore, is limited to the lands and heritages appearing in the Valuation-roll of the county. There is, however, no definition of county in the Act, and therefore it is necessary to go to the Valuation of Lands Act to see what is included in the Valuation-roll of the county.

“By the first section of the latter Act it is provided that the Commissioners of Supply of every county and the magistrates of every burgh respectively, shall annually cause to be made up a Valuation-roll, shewing the yearly value of the whole lands and heritages within such county or burgh respectively. By the 42d section it is provided that the word ‘burgh’ shall apply only to a ‘city, burgh, or town, being a royal burgh, or which sends or contributes as a burgh to send a member to “Parliament,” and it is also provided that the word “county” shall include “stewartry,” and shall include and apply to a county exclusive of the burghs situated therein.’

“It therefore appears to me that an assessment which is to be laid on according to the Valuation-roll of the county upon the lands and heritages included in that Valuation-roll cannot possibly extend to a burgh which contributes to send a member to Parliament.

“The defenders, however, argued that the County Police Act of 1857 shewed that the word ‘county’ in the County General Assessment Act, ought to be read as including burghs which had not a police establishment. The former Act provides (section 29) that the Commissioners of Supply of every county shall impose a police assessment ‘upon all lands and heritages within such county, according to the yearly value thereof, as established by the Valuation-rolls in force for the year of assessment.’

“There is no doubt that the word ‘county’ as there used includes burghs which have not a police establishment; but I do not think that that can affect the construction of the County General Assessment Act, because the Act of 1857 has a special definition of the word ‘county.’ That word is defined by the 78th section as including ‘all burghs and places within the county or stewartry not being a burgh or town which has a Police Act or an establishment of police,’ under one of the General Police Acts then in force. It is also not unimportant to observe that under the 29th section the police assessment is to be laid on according to the Valuation-rolls, thus recognising that both the county Valuation-roll and the burgh Valuation-roll may require to be used. In the County General Assessment Act, on the other hand, the Valuation-roll alone is referred to.

“I am therefore of opinion that Commissioners of Supply had no power to assess for the county general assessment lands and heritages within a parliamentary burgh.

“I am confirmed in that view by the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1889. . . .

“No doubt it would be more easy to arrive at the conclusion that the County Council had the right of direct assessment upon lands within a burgh which was represented upon the County Council than within a burgh which had no representation; but I think that it is clear that the Act did not contemplate any such direct assessment, except in the case of police burghs, and of burghs having a population of more than 7000, but which have no separate police force. Such burghs are represented upon the council, but are not subject to the provisions as to contribution to the county fund, the assessments continuing to be levied directly by the County Council.

“The position under the Act of a parliamentary burgh with a population of less than 7000 is as follows. By section 8 such a burgh is entitled to be represented on the County Council, and by sections 13 and 14 the administration of the Police and of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts is transferred to the County Council. By section 60, subsection 3, it is provided that every such burgh shall contribute to the county fund in aid of the expenditure upon Police and the Contagious Diseases Act; and by subsection 4 of the same section it is provided that the amount of the contribution shall not be assessed by the County Council upon lands and heritages within the burgh, but shall be paid by the town-council out of the police assessment or other assessment levied in the burgh, or out of the common good. In contradistinction to that enactment, it is provided by subsection 5 of the same section that police burghs with a population of less than 7000 shall be assessed by the County Council for Police and the Contagious Diseases Acts in the same manner as other lands within the county. Finally, by the 66th section it is provided that the County Council shall annually send a requisition to the town-council of a burgh liable in contribution requiring them to pay the amount of the contribution.

“Now, it seems to me that these provisions were intended to deal exhaustively with the relationship between parliamentary burghs with a population of less than 7000 and the County Council, and that it was not contemplated that the Council should in addition have the power of direct assessment within such burghs. If, in addition to the contribution to the county fund which such burghs were bound to make, the Council, as coming in place of the Commissioners of Supply, had power to levy the county general assessment within the burgh, I think that, in order to make the scheme of the statute clear and complete, it would have been necessary to make special provision in regard to the matter. . . .”

1889 there are vested in the County Council "the whole powers and duties of No. 121. the Commissioners of Supply," except as otherwise mentioned in the Act. The power of the Commissioners of Supply as regards assessment was fixed by the Reform Act of 1832 and the Rogue Money Act, 1839, by which the Commissioners were empowered to assess for rogue money and for constabulary expenses, and by the County General Assessment Act of 1868, by which a county general assessment in lieu of rogue money was established. Under the former Acts the Commissioners of Supply were entitled to assess all lands and heritages within the county, with the exception, under section 3 of the Act of 1839, of royal burghs or any burgh or town having a Police Act or having taken advantage of an Act of Will. IV. enabling burghs to establish a general system of police. The burgh of Oban does not fall within either of these exceptions.

Mar. 9, 1894.
Police Commissioners of Oban v. County Council of Argyll-shire.

If the burgh of Oban, not falling under either of the above exceptions, were simply a burgh and nothing else, no question could be raised. There could be no doubt that the county authority would have the power, under the old Acts giving authority to the Commissioners of Supply to assess on the lands and heritages within the burgh. But the burgh of Oban maintains that being a parliamentary burgh the County Council has no power to levy on it the general county assessment. The burgh maintains that there was no power of assessment under the Act of 1868, and separatim, that if there was, it was not transferred to the new County Council by the Act of 1889.

The argument upon which it is maintained that there was no power to assess under the Act of 1868 is one which depends upon implication only. By the Act of 1868, section 4, power is given to the Commissioners of Supply to impose an assessment to be called the "general county assessment, upon all lands and heritages within such county, according to the yearly value thereof as established by the Valuation-roll for the year (commencing at Whitsunday) in which such assessment is imposed." The first question here is what is included in the words "within the county," and that must be determined by the definitions and exceptions in the previous statutes. Now, the only parts of the area of a county which have been excluded from the operation of rogue money assessment by the previous statutes were royal burghs and burghs which had a Police Act or which had been brought under the Police Act of Will. IV. Therefore Oban, which is not in any of these categories, was within the county for assessment prior to 1868. The words "within the county" in the Act of 1868 must include Oban, unless by some other words of that Act it must be held to be excluded. There is no expression indicating that the word "county" means anything different from what it bore in the previous Act. There are certainly no enacting words to that effect. And therefore, as I said before, it must be by implication that the position of such a burgh as Oban is to be changed by the Act of 1868 as regards liability to assessment. Such an implication, by which an area of assessment is to be held to be altered, would require to be clear and unambiguous. In this particular case we have this somewhat extraordinary state of matters, that from the date of the passing of the Act of 1868 down to the passing of the Local Government Act of 1889, it never seems to have occurred to any ratepayer in Oban, or indeed to any ratepayer in any similar burgh, that his liability to contribute to the county expenses was abolished by that Act. The implication can therefore scarcely be a very clear one.

From the argument addressed to us, and from the Lord Ordinary's note, it appears that the implication is to be derived from a consideration of that part

No. 121. of the enactment which relates to the mode in which the assessment is to be imposed. The Act directs that the assessment is to be levied according to the yearly value as "established by the Valuation-roll for the year." It is the contention of the pursuer—and the Lord Ordinary has given effect to the contention—that as the word "roll" is given in the singular, it is the same as if it had said Valuation-roll for the county only, and that therefore there can be no power to assess in any area in which there is a separate Valuation-roll under the Valuation Act. I cannot concur in that view. It appears to me that if at the time of the passing of the Act of 1868, the authority which assessed for rogue money did so over burghs which were not exempted under the previous Acts authorising the levying of rogue money, as that authority undoubtedly did, the new authority must, in the absence of express enactment to the contrary, assess on the same burghs, and that if the order is given that the new authority is to use the Valuation-roll as the basis of assessment, then it must be the roll applicable to the burgh in the case of a burgh which previously formed part of the county for rogue money assessment. They are to obtain their basis from the Valuation-roll, and that must be the roll of the county or the roll of the burgh respectively.

Mar. 9, 1894.
Police Commissioners of Oban v. County Council of Argyllshire.

I should have been of that opinion upon the Act of 1868 alone, but I am confirmed in that opinion by what I find in the Valuation Act itself. For section 40 of that Act clearly empowers the commissioners to assess for rogue money on the statutory valuation. But as by the Valuation Act the parliamentary burgh roll was made up separately, they could only complete their assessment on that valuation by using the burgh roll to ascertain the value of those subjects whose owners or occupiers were liable to contribute to the rogue money, but which were within the burgh. If it be contended that the direction of the Valuation Act that a separate roll for a parliamentary burgh should be made up excluded any assessing by the commissioners within the burgh, that is, I think, conclusively answered by the latter part of clause 41 of the Valuation Act, which declares that "nothing contained in this Act shall exempt from or render liable to assessment any person or property not previously exempt from or liable to assessment." Therefore the commissioners were bound to assess those in burghs who had been assessed for rogue money before as not having been previously exempt, and were in doing so entitled to proceed on the valuation under the Valuation Act. If they did so, they must in the case of a burgh have done so on the Valuation-roll of the burgh.

If this view be sound, I am unable to find anything in the Local Government Act of 1889 which alters the position of such a burgh as Oban in regard to the county general assessment which came in lieu of the rogue money. The powers and duties of the County Council are those of the Commissioners of Supply, and the Act, while repealing some of the clauses of the General Assessment Act of 1868, by so doing expressly leaves in force that part of the Act by which, taking it along with the Rogue Money Acts, the area of assessment is fixed and the power to assess conferred.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be altered, and the defenders assolizied from the conclusions of the action.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. The view which I take of this case may be briefly stated.

Under the Police Act of 1857 the Commissioners of Supply were authorised to levy an assessment for rogue money and other purposes on "the whole county," and "county" was declared to include, inter alia, "all burghs and places within the county not being a burgh or town which has a Police Act, or an establishment of police" under the provisions of certain recited Acts. Oban being within the county, and not having a Police Act or establishment of police, was liable to be assessed for rogue money, and it was so assessed. By the Act of 1868 rogue money was abolished, and in lieu thereof the Commissioners of Supply were authorised (sec. 4) to levy a county general assessment upon all lands and heritages within the county according to the value thereof as appearing on the Valuation-roll for the year, but that only (sec. 10) on lands and heritages then liable to be assessed for rogue money. When the Act of 1868 passed Oban was liable for rogue money, and was therefore liable under that statute for the county general assessment authorised to be levied in lieu of rogue money. The county general assessment was accordingly imposed on lands and heritages in Oban down to the passing of the Local Government Act of 1889, by which the whole powers and duties of the Commissioners of Supply were vested in the County Council. The latter body, the defenders in this case, have imposed the county general assessment on lands and heritages in Oban, and the pursuers' purpose in bringing this action is to have it declared that the defenders are not entitled to do so. I think that they are. They are only doing what the Commissioners of Supply did without complaint. They are exercising one of the powers and fulfilling one of the duties of the Commissioners of Supply, and therefore seem to me to be acting within their statutory right. The view that the powers of the County Council are restricted by the direction that they are to assess according to the value appearing in the Valuation-roll and not Valuation-rolls appears to me untenable. The Valuation-roll referred to is the Valuation-roll in which the subjects assessed are appropriately entered.

Process—Expenses—Parent and Child—Parent suing as tutor and administrator for pupil child.—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that a father who sues an action as tutor and administrator for his pupil son is liable personally for expenses if he is unsuccessful in the action.

Observations as to the grounds upon which the unsuccessful party to an action is found liable in expenses.

In May 1893 William White, furniture-broker, Glasgow, as tutor and administrator of his pupil son, Robert Frew White, raised an action in the Court of Session against Elizabeth Steel and others, concluding for damages in respect of injuries sustained by the child through falling through the railing of the area of a house belonging to the defenders.

The cause was tried before Lord Kincairney, with a jury, and a verdict was returned for the defenders.

 White v. Steel.

* "OPINION.—The sole pursuer of this action is William White, as tutor and administrator-in-law of his pupil son, and he concludes for damages on account of injury suffered by his son through the fault of the defenders. The pupil is not a party to the action. A jury has returned a verdict for the defenders, who have moved for application of the verdict, and for decree for expenses against the pursuer personally. The pursuer contends that he is not liable for expenses personally, but only in his character of tutor and administrator-in-law of his son,—in other words, that the defenders can only recover their expenses from the estate of the pupil, which means practically that they cannot recover them at all. The point is very important, and I was informed that it has not been decided.

"I have studied our authorities bearing on the question, and, so far as I have been able to discover, they seem to stand as follows:—

"It is, I think, settled that trustees litigating for their estate, whether a sequestrated estate or a trust-estate, will in general be liable in expenses to the opposing party succeeding in the litigation. It was decided, in a case which presented no specialty, that a liquidator of a joint stock company was personally liable for the expenses of an action in which he was unsuccessful. That liquidator was appointed by the Court.—The Consolidated Copper Company of Canada v. Peddie, 22d December 1877, 5 R. 393.

"On the other hand, it was decided in the case of Fraser v. Pattie, 9th March 1847, 9 D. 903, that a curator ad litem could not be made liable in expenses.

"The case of a guardian appointed by the Court, such as a curator bonis or judicial factor, has always been distinguished from the case of a trustee, and their appointment to these offices by the Court has been regarded as an important distinction. But that specialty occurred in the case of the Consolidated Copper Company. In Forbes v. Morrison, 10th June 1845, 7 D. 853, that distinction between a trustee and a curator bonis was taken, and it was held that a curator bonis who had been sisted in an action 'in room of' the pursuer, who had become insane, and who was unsuccessful, was not liable in the expenses of the action. A judgment finding 'the pursuer liable to the defender in the expenses of the action' had been pronounced, and the question of the liability of the curator bonis personally was tried in a suspension of a threatened charge. The Lord Ordinary (Cunninghame) suspended the letters. It appears from his note that he proceeded on the ground that tutors and curators were exempt from personal liability for expenses. His judgment was affirmed; but Lord Mackenzie observed that in certain cases a curator might be made personally liable, and that 'if the curator knew that there were no funds out of which expenses could be paid, that would be sufficient if it were clearly made out'; and Lord Fullerton said that there might be a great many cases in which such liability would be held to exist.

"In Ferguson v. Murray, 20th December 1853, 16 D. 260, Lord Anderson, as Lord Ordinary, decided that a party who on the failure of trustees, had been appointed 'curator bonis or judicial factor,' and had unsuccessfully defended an action of mails and duties, had not subjected himself to liability for expenses personally. But this interlocutor was recalled, and an interlocutor was pronounced which appears to signify that the party would be individually liable so far as the expenses could not be recovered out of the curatorial estate. I so understand the interlocutor, but it is so expressed that I cannot be confident that my interpretation of it is correct.

"In Drummond v. Carse, 27th January 1881, 8 R. 449, and 18 S. L. R. 272, a party to certain actions was decerned as judicial factor to pay certain sums to his opponent, and he was found liable in expenses without that qualification being expressed. He paid the expenses out of the trust-estate, and thereby reduced it below the sum which had been decerned for. In a suspension of a charge for this sum, the Lord Ordinary (Curriehill) repelled the reasons of suspension, on the ground—as explained in his note—that the judicial factor was personally liable for the expenses, as a trustee would have been. The interlocutor, however, was recalled, and the Lord Justice-Clerk expressed the opinion that the position of a judicial factor was to be distinguished from that of a trustee on a sequestrated estate, and that the decisions as to such trustees were inapplicable to questions with judicial factors. Lord Young's opinion, however, proceeds on the assumption that the judicial factor was liable for the expenses personally, although he reserves his opinion on the point. The report seems to bear that the judgment was pronounced by these two Judges.

"In an early case, Chalmers v. Douglas, 19th February 1790, M. 6083, a pursuer who succeeded in an action of damages against a married woman for defamation, defended by her with consent of her husband, was found entitled to expenses against the husband personally; but on appeal that finding was reversed, and it was declared that the husband was responsible for the conduct of the cause 'in so far as the same is malicious, vexatious, and calumnious,' and the cause was remitted for inquiry how much of the expenses had been occasioned by his conduct in the cause—Baillie v. Chalmers, 6th April 1791, 3 Paton's Appeals, 213.

"In the recent case of Whitehead v. Blaik, 20th July 1893, 20 R. 1045, the question whether a husband should be found liable in the expenses of a process brought by his wife was raised, but the motion to that effect was not granted, because it was held that the husband had not appeared in the cause.

"In Fraser v. Cameron, 8th March 1892, 19 R. 564, a judgment by the Sheriff in an action brought by a minor aged nineteen, with consent and concurrence of her father as her curator, finding the father personally liable in expenses, was approved of in the Second Division. Lord Young qualified his judgment by the remark, that 'if a father consented to make an action formally competent there might be just grounds for not subjecting him to liability for expenses.'

"Lord Fraser has expressed the opinion that, in general, a tutor will not be found liable in expenses, and he quotes, in a note, a passage from the Code (which he considers to be in accordance with the Scottish authorities), to the effect that tutors and curators might be found liable in expenses si nomine pupillorum vel aduultorum scientes calumniosas instituant actiones, which he regards as implying that in the general case tutors and curators would not be so liable—Fraser on Domestic Relations, ii. 135; also Parent and Child, 276.

"The pursuer referred to the 12th section of The Guardianship of Infants Act, 49 and 50 Vict. c. 27, and the first section of The Pupils Protection Act, 12 and 13 Vict. c. 51, as putting a father in the position of a tutor-at-law or tutor-dative. But I do not see that these statutes affect the question.

"In that state of the authorities, I have found very great difficulty in deciding this question. But I have come, although with much hesitation, to think that my judgment should be for the defenders.

"William White is the only pursuer of this action. His son is but a boy, only seven years old, and there can be no doubt that the action was raised in the knowledge that the son had no estate. It is the very case supposed by Lord Mackenzie in Forbes v. Morrison. The pursuer had the whole control of the case. He is responsible for the record, and it cannot be suggested that the boy interfered at all. Further, I think it clear that nothing which the boy did affected the result of the action. There was really no ground for charging the boy with contributory negligence. One question,—and what appeared to me the chief question,—was whether the factor for the defenders had due notice of the dangerous state of the property. On that point the evidence of the pursuer and that of the factor were in direct conflict. It was impossible to believe both. Each was supported by other witnesses. I do not say that the jury disbelieved the evidence of the pursuer, but they at least held that he had not proved his case. I am not prepared to censure the pursuer for

No. 122. to be found liable personally in expenses only if in bringing the action he had acted improperly. Otherwise, a pupil, who could not sue on his own behalf,¹ would in many cases lose his right to recover damages, as fathers would not risk such a liability as decree being given against them for expenses. There was no case in the books in which a father suing for his pupil child had been found personally liable. He was practically in the same position as curators ad litem, who had been held only to be personally liable when they had acted outwith their duty.² The case of fathers suing as tutors was much nearer that of officers of Court, such as curators ad litem, judicial factors, &c., than that of trustees, as their duty in the eye of the law was to see that their children got everything they were entitled to, and in many cases that could only be insured by an appeal to the Court.

White v. Steel.

Argued for the respondents ;—The ground on which the unsuccessful party in a litigation was found liable in expenses was, not as a penalty, but to indemnify his opponent for expense which he had been put to by his action.³ The theory was that the decree of the Court shewed what the rights of parties truly were, and that the unsuccessful party should have known that his opponent's defence or ground of action was sound.⁴ There was a discretionary power in the Court as to awarding expenses, and that was the way in which officers of Court were sometimes allowed to escape. That rule was not, however, invariable, as was shewn in the case of the Copper Company of Canada v. Peddie, 5 R. 393, cited by the Lord Ordinary, in which a liquidator appointed by the Court was found personally liable. Curators ad litem had, it appeared, invariably been allowed to escape personal liability, but their appointment was peculiar, and they were often appointed in the interest of the party who proved successful. A father was not appointed tutor to his child by the Court, and where there were no tutorial funds he ought not to litigate.⁵ Further, bringing the case, nor to affirm that his record and evidence were consciously false. These were questions, I apprehend, for the jury. But neither is it a case for treating the pursuer with exceptional indulgence; and I think, on the whole, that it is in accordance with principle, and not against the balance of authority, to hold the pursuer liable. I am unable to hold that a party is entitled to bring an action into court under the condition that he shall not be liable for the expenses. A tutor entering into any ordinary contract on behalf of his ward is liable personally to see that it is fulfilled, and if it be permissible to represent an action as a contract of litiscontestatio, or as analogous to a contract, there seems no good reason for relieving a tutor from the obligations which arise out of it. I am disposed to doubt whether Lord Fraser's statement of the law does not go slightly beyond the authorities which he quotes, and it occurs to me that the practice of the Court in reference to questions of expenses has been greatly modified since 1790, when the case of Chalmers v. Douglas was decided.

"If it be said that the result of holding a tutor or father liable in such cases might be to deprive a pupil of the benefit of a just action, I think the answer may be that in such a case an action in name of the pupil alone might possibly be sustained, the defect in the instance being remedied by the appointment of a curator ad litem."

the father was truly the dominus litis, and liable as such. He had a direct personal interest, as he could, if successful, have applied the damages awarded to pay debts which otherwise he would have been bound himself to pay, e.g., medical attendance, education, &c. The pursuer was practically in the same position as a voluntary trustee, and such trustees were invariably found liable if they litigated unsuccessfully.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. From the carefully balanced statements in his Lordship's opinion, I gather, and I assume, that there has been nothing in the conduct of the cause to introduce any specialty into the question which we have to determine, that is, whether a man who has sued an action of damages in his character of tutor to his pupil child, and has lost it, is liable personally for judicial expenses to which his successful opponent is found entitled. I understand that the ratio of the modern rule which makes costs, in the general case, follow the event is, that the rights of parties are to be taken to have been all along such as the ultimate decree declares them to be; and that, as Lord Jeffrey said in Irvine v. Kirkpatrick (10 D. 367),—"If any party is put to expense in vindicating his rights, he is entitled to recover it from the person by whom it is created." Now, the person who has caused the expense to the present defenders is William White; for it is he, and not the pupil, who has raised and followed forth this action. The fact that he has done so in the interests of another is not, in my opinion, a matter which affects his liability to third parties. A father who thinks that his child has been wronged may come into Court, or he may not; neither his opponent, nor anyone else, can restrain him from doing so, on the ground that the child has no money. If, as is the case here, he litigates, and is found to be wrong, it makes no difference to his opponent that the costs have been incurred in an action in which the non-existent claim was ascribed to a child. No decision can be pointed to in which the father of a pupil has been exempted from personal liability on the ground now stated, and I am therefore for deciding it on the principle thus stated by Lord M'Laren in the case of testamentary trustees:—"The existence of trust funds is now held to be immaterial, and the inconvenience to the trustee of having to pay the expenses is just as little considered; because expenses are not awarded as in the nature of penalty, but as compensation to the successful party for the cost to which he has been put in establishing a right which his opponent ought to have known to be well founded."—(M'Laren on Wills, ii. p. 558.)

LORD ADAM.—I agree that the rule as to the finding or not finding of expenses against a pursuer in such cases as the present is correctly stated by Lord Jeffrey in the case of Kirkpatrick v. Irvine, 10 D. 367, and repeated by him in the case of Torbet v. Borthwick, 11 D. 694. That rule is, that a person put to the expense of vindicating his rights by another is entitled to recover that expense from the party opposing him who led to the expense being incurred. The difficulty is when we come to the case of a person suing or being sued in a representative character.

¹ See also Mackay's Practice, 2d edit. p. 61, and cases there; Jeffrey v. Brown, June 11, 1824, 2 Sh. App. 349; Young v. Nith Commissioners, June 10, 1880, 7 R. 891; Drummond v. Carse's Executors, Jan. 27, 1881, 8 R. 449; Ferguson v. Murray, Dec. 20, 1853, 16 D. 260, 26 Scot. Jur. 116, and cases cited by the Lord Ordinary.

No. 122. So far the case of a trustee in a sequestration is settled by the case of Gibson, 11 S. 656, and the case of Torbet v. Borthwick, already referred to. The practice in such cases is now quite recognised. A liquidator has been put in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy by a recent decision in the other Division. Then voluntary trustees have been found to be personally liable, the rule being as stated by Lord M'Laren in his book.

Mar. 10, 1894.
White v. Steel.

On the other hand, we find that curators ad litem are not personally liable in expenses, and it is obvious that their position is such that they could not be found so liable. I think also that a curator, who merely consents to an action, is not personally liable.

As regards curators bonis and judicial factors, the law is not very well settled, and I prefer to reserve my opinion as to whether these officers of Court are personally liable, or in what circumstances they might be so.

So far the question is pretty clear. But the present case is that of a father suing as administrator for his pupil child. I agree that, when we are asked in which of the above categories a father so suing should be placed, we must answer that he falls into the class of voluntary trustees. I think, therefore, that we should adhere.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. The pursuer is the person who has created the expense of which the defender is entitled to be relieved, and I therefore think that we should adhere.

LORD M'LAREN was absent at the advising, but the Lord President intimated that he concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT adhered.

A letter accepting the offer was posted on the evening of Monday, the 6th, and did not reach the offerer until the next day. Held that the offer had been timeously accepted.

2D DIVISION. ON 2d March 1893 E. Underwood & Son, Limited, hay and straw salesmen, Brentford, who had an office at 8 Bernard Street, Leith, offered through Argyll Lindsay, their Leith agent, to buy from Jacobsen, Sons, & Company, merchants, Edinburgh, and at Bona, Algiers, 150/200 tons Algerian straw, to be shipped in March. The offer bore, "This for reply by Monday, 6th inst." On 6th March Jacobsen, Sons, & Company wrote to Underwood & Son accepting the offer. The letter of acceptance was addressed "E. Underwood & Son, per Argyll Lindsay, Esq., Leith," the name and number of the street being omitted. It was posted in Edinburgh on the evening of the 6th March, but, owing to the insufficiency of the address, it did not reach Underwood & Son's office till the noon postal delivery on the following day, instead of by the morning delivery. Underwood & Son returned the letter of acceptance to Jacobsen, Sons, & Company, intimating that as they had not received the acceptance on March 6th the contract was off; and subsequently they refused to take delivery

Jacobsen,
Sons, & Co. v.
Underwood &
Son, Limited.

In defence Underwood & Son averred;—"By the terms of said letter (the offer of March 2d), and according to the understanding and custom of trade and of business men, the defenders' offer contained in said letter was open for acceptance until the end of business hours on Monday 6th March, and no longer"; and pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having failed to accept the defenders' offer in terms thereof, there was no concluded contract, and the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. The evidence, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and the Court, failed to establish the custom of trade alleged by the defenders. Mr Jacobsen deposed that he had been in the habit of addressing letters to the defenders in the way the letter in question was addressed, and that he never had had any complaints on the subject.

On December 23d the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) granted decree as concluded for.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The defenders aver on record what they call an 'understanding and custom of trade and of business men,' to the effect that when a limit of time is fixed for reply to an offer, the reply must be not merely despatched, but received within that limit of time. They add the further restriction, 'before the end of business hours' on the day named. But their witnesses to custom do not all go so far as that. I suppose they felt the difficulty of fixing the end of business hours. At all events the majority contented themselves with saying that the reply must be received on the day named.

"Now, I do not doubt that usage of trade may affix to the language of a contract a secondary or non-natural meaning, provided it be so notorious that both parties must be presumed to have used the language in that sense, and provided also it be consistent with law. But I regard this alleged usage as failing in both of these respects, especially the latter. The defenders' witnesses speak rather to their own interpretation of this particular contract than to any experience of a general understanding. And their interpretation of it, whether or not it be according to reason, is not, I think, according to law.

"Professor Bell in his Commentaries (Lord McLaren's edit. i. p. 344) states the law thus:—'It is the act of acceptance that binds the bargain, and in the common case it is not necessary that the acceptance shall have reached the person who makes the offer. An offer to sell goods is a consent provisionally to a bargain, if it shall be accepted within a certain time fixed by the offer or by the law. Until the expiration of that time the consent to the sale is held to subsist on the part of the offerer, provided he continues alive and capable of consent at the time of acceptance. From the moment of acceptance there is between the parties in idem placitum concursus et conventio, which constitutes the contract of sale. To this, however, an exception may be made by the offerer limiting it so that the arrival of the acceptance only shall bind the bargain.'

"The rule thus stated by Professor Bell is not limited to the case of an acceptance despatched by post. But authoritative decisions, and particularly the judgment of the House of Lords in Dunlop v. Higgins, 6 Bell's App. 195, and of the English Court of Appeal in Household Fire Insurance Company v. Grant, L. R., 4 Exch. Div. 216, have established that where an offer is made which, expressly or by implication, authorises the sending of an acceptance by post, the posting of the letter of acceptance completes the contract, whatever delay there may be in its delivery. In the latter case, indeed, the letter never reached its destination at all. On that special ground Lord Bramwell dissented, but even he conceded that 'where a posted letter arrives, the contract is complete on the posting.'

"Here I cannot doubt that the offer was made in such circumstances as to

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The words,—“This for reply by Monday, 6th inst.,” were open to construction, and the evidence, even if it did not amount to proof of custom of trade in the strict sense, shewed how mercantile men engaged in this particular line of business would construe such words. The Court ought to adopt that construction.¹ In any case, the pursuers having caused an unnecessary delay, through the insufficiency of the address on the letter of acceptance, were not entitled to recover.

Argued for the pursuers;—There was no proof here of custom of trade, and, in the absence of a special custom, the meaning of the defenders’ offer was clearly settled by authority. It was that the posting of the letter was the punctum temporis at which the acceptance of the offer was concluded.² The pursuers had addressed the letter as they had addressed former letters to the defenders, who had made no complaint on the subject.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is whether the defenders having offered to buy certain goods from the pursuers, and having in their letter used this expression, “this for reply by Monday, 6th inst.,” and the pursuers having posted their acceptance to the defenders on the 6th, the pursuers had timeously accepted under the above condition.

The defenders maintain that the condition in their letter was not fulfilled; that it could not be fulfilled unless the pursuers’ acceptance reached them within what they call “business hours” on the Monday, and they aver that there is what they call a “custom of trade” to that effect in Leith, where the transaction took place. They have brought evidence to substantiate this alleged custom, but having considered the evidence, I come without difficulty to the conclusion that they have entirely failed to substantiate their averment. There is certainly no satisfactory evidence of an established and accepted understanding of the kind alleged. No doubt some of the witnesses say that they would so understand such words, but that is quite a different thing from proving that there exists a universal or even general understanding such as the defenders maintain, which is and has been acted on in the trade. It could hardly be seriously maintained that such an established understanding was proved by the evidence. I think therefore that as matter of fact the defenders’ defence fails.

But, further, there is in my opinion ground for holding that the law is established to the effect that such an acceptance as that given by the pursuers is a good acceptance. When a letter of acceptance is posted, it is out of the power of the accepting party. He has committed it to a medium of communication authorise an acceptance by post. The offerer was in Leith, the acceptor in Edinburgh. The offer, though made verbally, was confirmed by letter, and the defenders’ agent admits that he expected a letter of acceptance.

“In neither of the cases to which I have referred was any day fixed for reply. But the principle which Mr Bell states, and which these cases illustrate, is just as applicable to a case like the present as to one where the reply is to be given in due course. The principle is that the reply is made and the contract concluded when the acceptance is despatched. To the same effect (though complicated by a question as to retraction) is the case of Thomson v. James, 18 D. 1. . . .”

which is bound to hold it and safely deliver it to the other party in due course. No. 123. The dispatcher of the letter has effectually bound himself the moment he has committed his acceptance to the mail. He has done that act of acceptance which, in the language of Mr Bell in his Commentaries, "binds the bargain." If Mr Bell be correct in his statement of the law,—and there is nothing to be found to the contrary, so far as I can see,—viz., that an offer to sell goods is a consent provisionally to a bargain, if it shall be accepted within a certain time fixed by the offerer or by the law, then I feel compelled to hold that when the offerer names a time such as a certain day of the month, there is given to the person to whom the offer is made the whole of that day to make his decision, and that if within that day he accepts, in a manner to bind himself, the bargain is closed. Up to the end of the time named, the consent of the offerer must be held to subsist, so that it may be taken advantage of by the other party. Now, it has been made matter of distinct decision that acceptance by post, that is by posting a letter of acceptance, completes the contract. It is in this case undoubted that acceptance by post was a suitable mode, and indeed was contemplated, and that the defenders' representative expected that the acceptance would so come. I have no doubt in holding (1) that the pursuers were entitled to accept at any time on the Monday, and (2) that they effectually accepted by posting their letter of acceptance on the Monday.

Mar. 10, 1894.
Jacobson,
Sons, & Co. v.
Underwood &
Son, Limited.

A point was raised on the fact that the acceptance did not reach the defenders' agent till noon on the Tuesday, and this was said to have arisen from the pursuers' fault in using an insufficient address. No such point is raised in the pleading, but even if it had been, I should have no difficulty in denying any effect to it. The address upon the letter was the same as was regularly used by the pursuers in their communications to the defenders, and appears not to have led to any delay on other occasions. It probably arose from some defect of acquaintance with the district on the part of some less informed official than the one who usually took charge of letters for the district. It is certain that the defenders' agent never informed the pursuers that their letters were unsatisfactorily addressed, and it is not proved that they were delayed in consequence of the address.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I arrive at the same conclusion. I do not think that the case is absolutely clear, but on the best consideration that I have been able to give it, I think that it is ruled by the principle stated by Professor Bell in the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary.

With respect to usage of trade, I do not think that any usage such as is here alleged has been proved to exist. The doctrine of usage of trade is quite clear. If persons in any trade use language to which by custom a special or peculiar meaning is attached, they will be presumed to have used it with that meaning in any contract which they make, and the contract will be interpreted accordingly. The Lord Ordinary says,—“I do not doubt that usage of trade may affix to the language of a contract a secondary or non-natural meaning, provided it be so notorious that both parties must be presumed to have used the language in that sense.” So far, that is just the doctrine which I have stated, but the Lord Ordinary goes on to add, “and provided also it be consistent with law.” In one sense that is true enough. Any usage must be con-

No. 123. istent with the public law of the land. But his Lordship goes on to say that he regards "this alleged usage as failing in both of these respects, especially the latter." Now, I cannot assent to that. I think that, if the usage here alleged had been proved to exist there is nothing whatever in it that is inconsistent with law. My judgment proceeds entirely on this, that no usage of trade has been proved to exist, and I therefore think that the case must be decided in accordance with the doctrine stated by Professor Bell.

Lease—Trade fixtures—Right in security.—Trade fixtures attached by a tenant to the solum become the property of the landlord subject to the tenant's right to remove them.

A tenant assigned to his landlord certain trade fixtures on the subjects let, in security of advances. In a question between the landlord and the tenant's creditors, held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the fixtures being partes soli were the property of the landlord, and that the tenant's assignation operated as a valid renunciation of his right to remove them so long as the debt was not paid.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

BY lease dated 14th April 1892 James Muirhead let to the Photolyptic Company, Limited, certain ground and premises in St Bernard's Row, Edinburgh, for ten years from Whitsunday 1892, it being, inter alia, provided that the company should be entitled to make at their own expense certain alterations and additions, but under the condition that they should, "at the termination of this lease, restore the premises hereby let to the same order and condition in which they were at the date of the company's entry under these presents; and shall remove and clear the ground of any additional buildings which they may have erected for the purposes of their business."

Thereafter, by assignation dated 31st May 1892, the company, in security to Muirhead and two other persons for certain advances made by them to the company, assigned to Muirhead, inter alia, "All and Whole the whole machinery and plant specified and enumerated in the inventory annexed, and signed as relative hereto, and presently in the premises belonging to the said James Muirhead at St Bernard's Row, Edinburgh."

The company carried on business in the premises let by Muirhead, and used the plant and machinery therein until 21st August 1893, when the company went into voluntary liquidation (subsequently continued subject to supervision), on the ground that by reason of their liabilities they were unable to continue their business.

On 4th January 1893 the liquidator and Muirhead presented a note in the liquidation for determination of the question whether Muirhead had obtained a valid and effectual right to such portions of the machinery and plant assigned to him as consisted of proper trade fixtures.

The note stated,—“The parties are agreed that the said plant and machinery consist, to a very considerable extent, of proper trade fixtures; that is, of fixtures which have been attached to the heritable subjects for the purposes of trade, and which in a question with his landlord a tenant would have a right to sever from the heritable subjects, and to remove at or prior to the expiry of his tenancy, but which would in a question between heir and executor be held to be sufficiently affixed to the heritable subjects to render them heritable quoad succession.”

No. 124.
Mar. 10, 1894.
Miller v.
Muirhead.

The liquidator maintained that the assignation was ineffectual, in respect that it was a conveyance of moveables in security without delivery of possession to the assignee.

Muirhead maintained that he was entitled to the machinery and plant so far as consisting of trade fixtures, because these had been affixed to the heritable subjects belonging to him, and the company had by the assignation abandoned in his favour the right of severing these fixtures from the heritable subjects which they would otherwise have possessed.

On 3d February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) answered the question in the negative.*

Muirhead reclaimed, and argued;—The trade fixtures were not moveable property, but were partes soli, and belonged to the reclamer, subject to the company's right to remove them at the end of the lease.¹ Under the deed of assignation the company must be held to have assigned this right to the reclamer, who therefore was entitled to retain the fixtures, unless the company paid the debt in security for which the fixtures were assigned. As they could not do this, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the question answered in the affirmative.

Argued for the liquidator;—The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that this was a security over moveables, which was ineffectual, as Mr Muirhead had had no possession of the security subjects.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The only question before us relates to the trade fixtures. They were specially assigned, so that it is not disputed that they were comprehended in the assignation.

* OPINION.—(After deciding against Muirhead the question whether he had a valid security over the plant and machinery other than proper trade fixtures, a judgment which Muirhead acquiesced in)—“There are also included in the assignation certain machines which are of the nature of trade fixtures, and it was contended for Mr Muirhead that he had, at all events, a good security over these machines, because, being affixed to the heritage, they became part of it, subject only to the company's right as tenants to remove them, and that the effect of the assignation was truly to operate a renunciation on the part of the company in favour of Mr Muirhead of their right to remove the trade fixtures.

“There is no doubt of the right of the company to remove the machines in question, not only under the common law in regard to trade fixtures, but under their lease, by which they are taken bound at the termination of the lease to restore the premises to the same condition as they were in at the date of the company's entry.

“The machines were therefore, during the currency of the lease, the moveable property of the company, and they so dealt with them in the assignation. The effect of the assignation appears to me simply to have been to make over to Mr Muirhead whatever right the company had in the machines, and to put him in their room and place as regards the machines, in so far as that could be done without delivery. But I think that it is impossible to construe the assignation as a renunciation by the company of their right to remove the machines, or as an agreement between them and Mr Muirhead that the machines should no longer be regarded as moveables belonging to the company but as part of the heritage belonging to Mr Muirhead.

“I am therefore of opinion that, not having obtained possession, Mr Muirhead has not got a valid security over the trade fixtures.”

Miller v.
Muirhead.

The law with respect to trade fixtures was very authoritatively settled by the House of Lords in the case of Brand. Though the case was between heir and executor only, the noble Lords who took part in the judgment were at pains to state the general law.

In his opinion Lord Gifford had said that a fixture never becomes attached to the inheritance so as to be capable of being called a part of the inheritance. Commenting upon this dictum the Lord Chancellor says:—"It appears to me that this is an error; it does become attached to the inheritance; it does form part of the inheritance; it does not remain a moveable quoad omnia; there does exist on the part of the tenant a right to remove that which has been thus fixed, but if he does not exercise that right, it continues to be that which it became when it was first fixed, namely, a part of the inheritance." Again, Lord Chelmsford speaks thus:—"When the tenant brings any chattel to be used in his trade and annexes it to the ground, it becomes a part of the freehold, but with a power as between himself and his landlord of bringing it back to the state of a chattel again by severing it from the soil. As the personal character of the chattel ceases when it is fixed to the freehold, it can never be revived as long as it continues so annexed."

No language could be clearer. The trade fixture, by being attached to the ground, becomes "a part of the inheritance," "a part of the freehold." So long as it is so attached it must belong to the owner of the soil, for he is necessarily owner of everything which is part of it. The tenant possesses it as a part of the subject of the lease, but in no other character. He has a right to make it his own by severing it from the soil, but until that right is exercised, he can have no right of property.

In this case the tenant assigned to his landlord the trade fixtures in security of certain debts. At the date of the assignation he could not assign any existing right of property. For the fixtures being still attached to the soil were the property of the landlord. The Lord Ordinary says that during the currency of the lease the fixtures were "the moveable property" of the tenant. This cannot be if they were part of the soil. They could not be at the same time part of the heritable estate of one man and the moveable property of another. But the assignation necessarily carried all the right which was vested in the tenant, and therefore, in my opinion, operated as a renunciation of the right of severance until the debts were paid.

The Lord Ordinary says that "it is impossible to construe the assignation as a renunciation by the company of a right to remove the machines." It seems to me to be impossible not to put that construction on the assignation. If I assign a thing which is not mine, I assign all the rights I have to make it mine. If I assign a thing which I have bought, but which remains in the possession of the seller, I assign what is not my property, but I also assign the right to obtain delivery. The law implies that a cedent confers on his assignee everything which is necessary to make the assignation effectual.

If, therefore, these fixtures had been assigned to a stranger, I cannot doubt that the assignation must be construed to comprehend the tenant's right to remove them, for under no other right could he reduce them into his possession. When the assignation is in favour of the landlord it must be equally comprehensive. Inasmuch as the things assigned are the property of the landlord, there is no necessity to vest him with a right to remove. But as the tenant could not remove the fixtures without defeating the assignation, he must be held to renounce that right, and the assignation operates as a renunciation of No. 124.

 it. When the assignation is in security only, it will operate as a renunciation ^{Mar. 10, 1894.}
 till the debt is paid. If the landlord bought the fixtures, he would get a good ^{Miller v.}
 title by an assignation, though it could be nothing more than a renunciation of ^{Muirhead.}
 the right to remove. An assignation in security must have the same force, though it is qualified by a condition.

There remains the question whether it was necessary to do more in order to make the assignation effectual as against the liquidator. I do not think that it was. The tenant had nothing more than a right to remove, though the act of removal vests him with the property of the thing removed. If he renounces that right absolutely it is gone by the mere force of the renunciation. If he renounces it until he shall pay a certain debt, he cannot exercise it until he fulfils that condition. We are not dealing with the property of the tenant, but with his right to do an act by which property may be acquired. To extinguish or modify that right nothing more is required than a completed agreement between the person who may do the act and the person who must suffer it to be done.

In the case of a stranger, I think that the assignation would be completed by intimation to the landlord, and that thereafter neither the tenant nor a trustee in bankruptcy could exercise the right to remove. And if the landlord is to be regarded as being merely an assignee, the assignation will be effectual without intimation, for the landlord would not require to make intimation to himself. But I think that the landlord is in a better position than a stranger, for the assignation does not convey to him any property. It is no more than a renunciation or discharge of a claim competent to the tenant, and as such is competent by mere agreement.

I am therefore of opinion that the trade fixtures are at present the property of Mr Muirhead, and that he can prevent the liquidator from removing them till his debt is paid.

Property—Superior and Vassal—Feu-charter—Construction—Servitude—Road.—In 1806 a proprietor feued to A a piece of ground bounded on the south by a road, and on the west by another feu granted to B. At the northern extremity of A's feu, 140 feet from the road, was a well, and his charter contained this clause,—“But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.”

B had built a house fronting the road, with its eastern gable resting upon but not beyond the verge of his feu, with a boundary wall in continuation to the back, also just within his feu.

A, in building his house, instead of building a western gable, made use of B's gable, leaving a passage below the house 6 feet wide close to B's gable. Behind the house a passage to the well 6 feet wide was left unbuilt on close to B's boundary.

No. 125.

In 1866 B's successors made openings in their boundary wall, which were used as an access to the passage.

Mar. 14, 1894.
Blair v.
Strachan.

In 1892 A's successor in his feu brought an action against B's successor for declarator that he was entitled to build a wall on the extreme west of his feu, the effect of building such a wall being that the passage would require to be moved eastward to an extent equal to the breadth of the proposed wall, and that B's successor would not have access to the passage through the doors in his wall.

Held that, on a sound construction of his titles, the pursuer was entitled to decree (diss. Lord Young, on the ground that the line of road had been definitely fixed by the feu-charter and the actings of A and B following upon it).

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By feu-charter, dated 29th December 1806, Thomas Leys and others feued out to Andrew Brodie a piece of ground bounded on the south by a road, which was afterwards known as Hadden Street, in the burgh of Woodside, near Aberdeen, and on the west by ground feued out by the same superiors to James Rust. On the northern extremity of Brodie's feu was a well 140 feet from the road, with reference to which his feu-charter contained this clause,—“But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.”

Rust had built a house fronting the road, on the south portion of his feu. This house, which was afterwards known as 124 Hadden Street, had its eastern gable resting upon but not beyond the east verge of Rust's feu, and there was a boundary wall, in continuation of the gable to the back, also just within the feu.

Shortly after obtaining his feu-charter Brodie erected a building, subsequently known as 120 and 122 Hadden Street, on the south portion of his feu, fronting the road. Instead of building a western gable Brodie made use of Rust's eastern gable, leaving a passage close to the gable of Rust's house, 6 feet wide, about 70 feet long, and 8 feet high from the floor of the passage to Brodie's building above. This passage or entrance came to be 122 Hadden Street, the rest of Brodie's house being No. 120. Behind the line of the houses a passage in continuation, 6 feet wide, led for about 70 feet northwards to the well on the northern extremity of Brodie's feu.

About 1866 the successor in Rust's feu made four entrances into the passage. One of these entrances opened into the portion of the passage which was covered over by buildings erected by Brodie, and formed the entry to the back part of the house erected by Rust, No. 124 Hadden Street. The other three opened into the uncovered part of the passage, and gave access to stables, bakehouse, &c., on Rust's feu.

On 4th April 1892 James Blair, who had acquired Brodie's feu in 1887, brought an action against Charles Strachan, the successor in Rust's feu, concluding for declarator that the pursuer, as heritable proprietor of the piece of ground described in the feu-charter granted to Brodie, with the buildings thereon, was “entitled to erect upon the said ground, at the west boundary thereof, and where it adjoins the property of the defender, a fence or boundary wall between his said feu and the property of the defender, but so as not to obstruct the door or entry to the back part of the defender's dwelling-house, No. 124 Hadden Street, Woodside, and provided always a road or passage of 6 feet wide is left out in the west end of pursuer's feu as an access to a pump-well in the back part of the said feu, in terms of a provision in said feu-charter,” and for interdict against the defender interfering with the pursuer erecting such a wall.

The effect of building the wall as the pursuer claimed right to do would have been to move the passage eastward to an extent equal to the breadth of the proposed wall, and to prevent the defender from having access to the passage through the three doors in the back portion of his feu, which in the proceedings were styled entrances Nos. 2, 3, and 4. With respect to the door opening into the closed part of the passage, styled entrance No. 1, the pursuer conceded that he was not entitled to obstruct the defender's use of this entrance.

No. 125.

Blair v.
Strachan.

The ground behind the pursuer's houses, 120 and 122 Hadden Street, was not built upon, and there was no wall separating the rest of that ground from the passage corresponding to the continuation wall on the defender's feu.

The defender had several different grounds of defence; in particular, he averred that he had acquired a prescriptive right to use the entrances Nos. 2, 3, and 4 as accesses to the passage; but he abandoned this plea in the Inner-House, where the discussion was confined to the question raised by the following plea stated by the defender:—“(5) On a sound construction of the pursuer's title, the pursuer is not entitled to erect a wall so as to exclude the defender from access or passage to said well.”

The pursuer produced a plan shewing the buildings in question, and the passage between them, but no plan was referred to in his titles or in any way incorporated therewith.

On 10th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) (after a proof which was mainly directed to the question of prescription) granted decree of declarator and interdict as craved.*

* “OPINION.— . . . There can, I think, be no doubt that if the matter stood upon the titles of parties, the defender would be out of Court. Both parties derive their rights from a common superior, and the only servitude affecting the pursuer's property—which, as I have said, includes the space now forming the close—is thus expressed in the pursuer's title:—‘But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.’

“It seems plain upon the construction of this clause that at the date of the grant the defender's author had no higher right than the other feuars round about, and that so long as a passage was left to the well of the prescribed width and height, the pursuer's author might, if he had so desired, have built a wall on the extremity of his ground all the way down the close. Indeed, the reference to the height of the close shews that what the title had in view was a covered close passing under and through the pursuer's houses.

“It appears, however, to have been decided, or at least conceded, in a previous litigation between the parties, that the defender, besides the common access from the street, was entitled to a special access to the close by a door or opening in his buildings, which I have called the entrance No. 1. And to this extent it is not disputed that the defender is now at least in a different position from the other feuars. But the defender maintains that he has acquired, by prescriptive use, a right of access to the well through a second opening or entrance half-way down the close, viz., the opening which has been described as entrance No. 4; and what I have to decide in this case is, whether he has made good this contention. The facts have been ascertained by a proof, which, after a discussion in the Procedure Roll, I allowed before answer, and which has extended to a length which, I am afraid, is rather out of proportion to the value of the subject.

“I am of opinion, on the whole matter, that the defender has failed to make good his point.”

[The Lord Ordinary then adverted to the question of prescription, in the course of which his Lordship observed]:—“Further, I am, in the next place, disposed to doubt whether, in point of law, any amount of prescriptive use

 Mar. 14, 1894. At advising,—
 Blair v.
 Strachan.

LORD YOUNG.—The parties are owners of adjoining properties held in feu of a common superior. The march between them, so far at least as concerns this case, is a straight line running north, from Hadden Street, Aberdeen, on the south, for a distance of about 140 feet, the pursuer's property being on the east and the defender's on the west of that line.

The first and leading conclusion of the action is for declarator that the pursuer is proprietor of the ground on the east of the march, and "is entitled to erect upon the said ground at the west boundary thereof, and where it adjoins the property of the defender, a fence or boundary wall between his said feu and the property of the defender, but so as not to obstruct"—a certain door of the defender's house—"and provided always a road or passage of 6 feet wide is left out in the west end of the pursuer's feu as an access to a pump-well in the back part of the said feu in terms of a provision in said feu-charter," viz, a feu-charter dated 29th December 1806, by which the pursuer's feu was originally acquired from the superior.

The pursuer's right of property is admitted, but his right to build a wall along the line of march is disputed, because, and only because, of the existence of a servitude road on his property along the whole line of march, the defender's feu being the dominant tenement in the servitude.

The pursuer admits the servitude, and also that the solum which it now occupies, and has done since 1806, extends up to and along the whole line of march between the dominant and servient tenements, i.e., between his feu and that of the defender. But he maintains that he is entitled to change the line of solum which it occupies, and has heretofore occupied, to the extent of taking the thickness of a wall off it on the one side and adding to it an equivalent on the other, so that it shall thereafter be of the same width as before. In support of this contention he refers to the jurisdiction of the Court, as illustrated by several cases which his counsel cited, to define and limit a theretofore more or less indefinite right of way or passage, or equitably allow a change in the line of such road or passage which the Court, on inquiry and consideration, thinks may be made with advantage or reasonable relief to the servient tenement, and without an appreciable or reasonably conceivable detriment to the dominant tenement.

To this the defender answers, first, that we cannot deal with this action as an application to the Court to limit and define the line of a road (heretofore indefinite), or to sanction a reasonable change, but must consider and determine can extend the exercise of a servitude constituted by grant beyond what is reasonably necessary to satisfy the terms of the grant. The exercise of a servitude may, I take it, always be regulated so as to make it as little burdensome as possible to the servient tenement. For example, a right of servitude, say over a field, may be confined to a single line, although for forty years it has followed several lines to the same point. And if this is so when, as generally happens, the grant is only presumed from possession, the principle would seem to apply a fortiori where, as here, the grant is in writing, and its terms are ascertained."

the alleged legal right which we are asked to declare ; second, that (irrespective of the form and character of the action) the Court has not jurisdiction to change the line and limits of a servitude road as prescribed by valid title or as arranged by the owners of both the dominant and servient tenement in conformity with the title, and as it has existed from time immemorial ; and third, that assuming such jurisdiction there is nothing in the case to call for or warrant the exercise of it.

No. 125.
Mar. 14, 1894.
Blair v.
Strachan.

After full consideration I am of opinion that the pursuer has not the right which he asks us to declare,—I mean of course to erect the wall,—for his right of property is not and never has been questioned.

The original charter of the servient tenement (1806) constitutes the servitude “of road or passage,” and, according to what I think the true construction of its language, prescribes the exact line and limits of it. It is to be “6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high,” and is “to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.” I cannot regard the words “to be left out” as insignificant or meaningless. I think they import that the road or passage is not to be enclosed by any wall or building on the servient tenement, but is to be left outside any wall or building thereon. It cannot be left out of the tenement itself, for it must be on it, and so I think the words can only have the meaning I have stated. Such accordingly is the meaning which the grantee by the charter accepted and acted upon—I must assume with the assent of the owner of the dominant tenement adjoining. The admitted facts of the case shew that this is so, and the pursuer in his record avers that it is so. In condescendence 3 he says that Mr Brodie (the grantee of the charter) or his successors “built the house property presently on the said lot or piece of ground,” “but in building the said property they left a road or passage on the west end thereof, and where it adjoins the defender’s property, in terms of the reservation of issue and entry contained in the said feu-charter,” and to shew more distinctly what was thus done he produces a plan “shewing the said road or passage.” And it does shew it as distinctly defined and limited in its line, its length, and its width as a plan can possibly shew a road or passage. Its length is from the street on the south to the pump-well on the north 140 feet, and its width 6 feet measured from the line of march between the dominant and servient tenement. Nor does it signify that the buildings on the servient tenement extend only to 70 feet in length. These were erected, I must assume, not accidentally but purposely, along a line parallel to the march and exactly 6 feet from it, so that the road or passage of that width should be “left out upon the west end” as required by the charter. But assuming, contrary to my opinion, that the charter left the owner of the servient tenement at liberty, if he pleased, to enclose the road or passage by a wall on the servient tenement between it and the dominant tenement, he was certainly entitled, if he thought it for his advantage, or on any consideration satisfactory to himself, so to leave out the road that there would be no room for the erection of such wall, and he did so leave out the road to the extent of 70 feet, or one-half its length. The road as so left out and enclosed on both sides by buildings has existed and been used for nearly one hundred years.

It seems to me not merely probable but certain that what was thus done so long ago was done by agreement between the owners of these two adjoining tenements. In condescendence 5 the pursuer states that the buildings on the defender’s tenement (including the east gable of his house and on which the west side of the pend is built) extend "the whole length of both properties, and are built wholly upon the defender's property." Therefore they are not march fence or mutual walls, but are the exclusive property of the defender. It follows that when the pursuer's predecessor in 1806 built the west side of his pend on the gable of the house (now the defender's) on the adjoining feu, he built outside his property necessarily with the consent of the adjoining proprietor. I think we cannot reasonably separate this from what was done to fix the line of the servitude road and the exact solum which it should occupy. Further, it seems to me that what was thus agreed to and done was for the benefit of both parties—at least according to their own judgment. On the one hand, the owner of the eastmost feu thus satisfied the servitude on it by leaving out a strip of ground exactly 6 feet in width which he could never be required to increase, and was relieved of his proper share of the cost of a mutual house gable and mutual fence wall between him and his neighbour, and the contribution of his share of the site thereof. On the other hand the owner of the westmost feu thus secured that the servitude road should touch and run along his property without the intervention of even a mutual wall, or hedge, or paling, there being according to the arrangement not an inch of space left for the erection of anything.

No. 125.

Blair v.
Strachan.

In accordance with this arrangement, and indeed in pursuance of it, the defender allowed the pursuer to build on the wall of his house,—“built wholly on the defender's property,”—and the servitude road which comes up to it and runs along it cannot be changed while the pursuer's house exists, the width of the ground between the walls being exactly the 6 feet occupied by the solum of the road. And this is equally true to the extent of the whole line of the pursuer's buildings, about 70 feet. I asked if any intention had been stated or existed of taking down and altering the position of the pursuer's house and buildings, and was answered in the negative. But the Lord Ordinary's judgment of declarator and interdict applies to this 70 feet as well as to the remaining 70 feet of the road's length, in view of a possible future change in the position of the buildings, although no intention of making such change has ever been expressed or contemplated. In such circumstances there is, I think, no expediency or propriety in a declarator of right and relative interdict.

With respect to the northern half of the road (about 70 feet), the physical obstructions in the way of a change are not the same, but the legal objection to a change is, in my opinion, of the same character and validity. I think that the line and position of the road for the whole length of it was fixed as stated by the pursuer in condescendence 3, and shewn on the plan which he has produced in order to shew it. It is thus averred and shewn to be on the west end of the servient tenement, and where it adjoins the defender's property. As shewn on the plan, and as it has existed and been used in all past time, it comes up to the defender's property without a hair's-breadth of ground between them. Nor is the absence of buildings (a wall or any other) on the opposite or east side material, for if the bounding line on one side is fixed, that on the other is fixed also, as it must be parallel with the other, and exactly 6 feet apart from it. Further, I think that the arrangement on which the line and exact position of the road was thus fixed (sufficiently onerous on the part of the dominant tenement) applies to the whole length, and is not limited to the southern half. The legal and equitable considerations thence arising are, I think, obvious.

The pursuer seems to have contended before the Lord Ordinary that the defender had not a right of access into the close from all parts of his property, No. 125. but only from the end of it at Hadden Street, having "no higher right than the other feuars round about," and the Lord Ordinary expresses a clear opinion in favour of this contention. It is, in my opinion, true or not according as the close adjoins the defender's property or not. If it does not adjoin, he cannot have access by passing over a part of the pursuer's property, however narrow, which intervenes, for that would be trespass; but if it does adjoin, with no intervening property of the pursuer's to be passed over, it seems to be too clear to admit of dispute that he may legitimately have access wherever he finds it most convenient for the exercise of his servitude right. That right is to take water from the servitude well for the use of his property, which extends along the whole length of the road down to the well. The place where he immediately needs the water may be in fact as close to the well as you could figure for illustration, and with nothing between it and the well from which he has right to take water except the road which he has right to use as an access to it—say 6 feet of it—or it may be for half its width. The contention that the law of servitude with respect to the road is such that he must on every occasion use the road for the whole length of it or not at all does not seem sensible or rational. With respect to the servitude use of the road, the defender has (as the Lord Ordinary says) "no higher right than the other feuars round about," but the right of access to it—that is to say, where access to it may be had—is another matter. The same distinction with respect to access is familiar in regard to every public road or street or close between those of the public who have property adjoining it and those who have not.

Mar. 14, 1894.
Blair v.
Strachan.

The Lord Ordinary observes in his opinion that "the reference to the height of the close shews that what the title had in view was a covered close passing under and through the pursuer's houses."

I think the inference is illegitimate, and also immaterial. First, I think it illegitimate to infer that the title had in view what the facts shew was never in view of the parties,—“a covered close passing under and through the pursuer's houses.” I think it is at least more reasonable to infer that “what the title had in view” was what was done under it immediately after it was granted, and has remained undisturbed ever since. The pursuer's predecessor who erected the buildings did not build a wall on the extremity of his ground all the way or any part of the way down the close, and the idea of building such wall never, so far as we know, occurred during a period of over eighty years. On the contrary, the buildings were so erected, and the close or passage so left out, as to be utterly inconsistent with the possibility of building such wall. At the same time, legitimate arrangement was made for the erection of a pend without any need for such wall, and consistently with the gable-wall of the pursuer's house, being within 6 feet of the edge of his property, which he (or his predecessor) no doubt regarded as a substantial advantage to him. “The reference to the height of the close” in the title applies to this pend, which was built accordingly. The title prescribes nothing—and indeed says nothing—about the erection of a pend or any covering over the passage, although it prohibits any structure whatever above the solum within 8 feet from the ground. It applies to prohibit any projection from the adjoining wall, however much within 6 feet, and requiring no opposite wall to support it. Again, these two adjoining feus might become the property of one owner, or any legal contract whatever might be made between the

No. 125. owners thereof as to building, but subject to this, that the servitude road in which "the other feuars round about" are interested shall be left "at least 8 feet high." Full effect is thus given to the reference to height in the title without any such inference as is suggested.

Mar. 14, 1894.
Blair v.
Strachan.

Second, I think the inference (viz., that the owner of the servient tenement was at liberty to erect a wall on the extremity of his ground all the way down the close) is immaterial. He was certainly at liberty not to erect such wall and to leave out the passage so that it should occupy the extremity of his ground where it adjoins the dominant tenement. That this was done is, I think, indisputable, and also that it was done on arrangement with the owner of the adjoining dominant tenement, who on that footing allowed the use of his house wall and dispensed with any mutual march or fence wall between the properties.

I am of opinion that this is conclusive as to the site and position of the solum of this servitude passage, and that no case whatever has been stated for judicially authorising a change which would manifestly, and indeed admittedly, be to the detriment of the dominant tenement.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The feu-disposition dated 6th December 1806, under which the piece of ground belonging to the pursuer was given out, contains this clause,—“But reserving always to our said feuars and their tenants and servants free entry and issue to and from the said well, by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end of the piece of ground hereby disposed.”

The servitude road or passage has from time immemorial been on the extreme west of the pursuer's ground, so as to adjoin the property of the defender. The pursuer proposes to build a wall between his property and that of the defender, and the site of the wall will necessarily occupy a portion of the servitude road. But he undertakes to leave a road or passage as wide as that required by the feu-disposition, or in other words, to add to the road on the east as much as he takes away on the west. The question is whether he is entitled to do so.

It is contended by the defender that according to the just construction of the feu-disposition, the road must come up to the extreme verge of the pursuer's property, and that the road as it has in fact existed is the only road which would satisfy the obligation created by the disposition. He claims the benefit thence arising—that is to say, he claims the right of using the road from any part of his own property.

It is to be observed that the road is common to the whole feuars, and that the servitude was created merely as an access to a well at the back of the pursuer's tenement. With such an origin I think it unlikely that the defender took a higher right than the other feuars, though it is quite possible that he might derive a benefit from the situation of his feu. It is true that in a previous litigation he was found entitled to use the road as an access to his property at a point a little way distant from the street. But this right was not conferred by the disposition, and it is certain that the road has never been used as an access to the well, except from the street or in the case of the defender from the above-mentioned point. Therefore I think it to be very improbable that the road was to be made on “the west end of the piece of ground” with any view to the peculiar benefit of the defender or his predecessors, so that the pursuer should be so far restrained in the use of his property as to be disabled from building a boundary wall. No. 125.

The feu-disposition provides that the servitude is to be exercised by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high. This means a covered way, indicating, as I think, very plainly that the only entrance to the road is to be from the street. There is no limit to the covered way, and if it extended, as it might, for the whole depth of the pursuer's property, there could be no other entrance. For a covered way could not be constructed without building a wall along its western side. Mar. 14, 1894.
Blair v.
Strachan.

It follows of necessity that as matter of right the defender cannot under the title require that the servitude road shall be open to him from his own property, and by consequence there is nothing to prevent the pursuer from erecting a boundary wall.

That such a wall has not been built is not in my judgment of any consequence. All the powers competent to the pursuer as the owner of the feu remain entire, except in so far as the defender has acquired any rights by which they are limited. He has, in my opinion, acquired none. He has had no access to the servitude road, except from the street and the point to which I have already referred. There is, I think, no pretence for saying that the defender is in the possession of any prescriptive right which disables the pursuer from erecting the proposed wall. The uses which he has had of the servitude road are fully preserved to him.

Nor is it material that the pursuer does not propose to build a covered way, but only to erect a boundary wall. I have referred to the covered way merely to shew that it is not part of the right reserved under the feu-disposition that the road shall be bounded by the pursuer's property. If it be not, the pursuer is not restrained from erecting a boundary wall. He may do any act competent to a proprietor which is not inconsistent with the right of servitude, and I need hardly say that a proprietor is never restrained in the use of his property except by very plain and express stipulations. I do not see that any restraint has been imposed by the title except that the pursuer shall allow an access on the west end of his ground to the well. If there were nothing more, I should hesitate to affirm that he was thereby prevented from building a boundary wall. But when I find that the road may be covered, I must say that all doubt is removed from my mind. Nothing could shew more clearly that the pursuer was not bound to keep the road unfenced on the defender's side.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the judgment which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced.

The pursuer is the proprietor of the ground in question, and as such is entitled to build thereon in so far as his right to do so has not been validly restricted. The question therefore is, whether there is any restriction on the pursuer's right which disentitles him to the declarator which he seeks, or which is the same thing, disentitles him to build a wall on the west boundary of his ground as he proposes to do. The only restriction on the pursuer's right is that set forth in his title which reserves to the defender and other neighbouring feuars free entry and issue to and from a well on the pursuer's property, "by a road or passage of 6 feet wide and at least 8 feet high, to be left out upon the west end" of that property. The pursuer proposes to leave such a passage or road as an access to the well—but his operations, if carried out, would remove the passage some 9 or

No. 125. 12 inches, the breadth of his wall, east of his west boundary line. Is he entitled to do that? Now, I think, by the fair and indeed necessary implication of his title, that the pursuer is entitled to do so. The passage is to be at least 8 feet high, which implies that the pursuer is to be entitled to have a building over the passage. But in that case he must have a wall on the west boundary to support his building. Nor does such a wall prevent the pursuer leaving a 6 feet passage on the west end of his property. It need not be, to comply in the strictest way with the terms of the reserved right, the most westerly 6 feet of his subjects that are devoted to the passage. It is enough if he leaves a 6 feet passage at the "west end" of his property. That is in every sense a correct description of the passage which the pursuer proposes to leave. It is to be 6 feet wide, and at the west end of his property. It is noticed, however, that the 6 feet passage is "to be left out" upon the west side of the property, and it is said that to be left out implies or suggests that the 6 feet for the passage are to be left out, that is, outside of the pursuer's building. That, in my opinion, is not the meaning of the reservation. Such a reading is inconsistent with the idea of any building over the passage, for that as I have said implies some building west of the passage on which the structure over the passage can rest. It affords no answer to this view to say that there are buildings at present over the passage in question which do not rest on a wall belonging to the pursuer. Under what conditions the pursuer's author was allowed to rest the present building on the building belonging to the defender we do not know. But the pursuer may at any time take down the present building, and it does not appear that he would be entitled to rest any new building on the defender's property. He might not be inclined to ask, and if he asked might not get, leave to support his new buildings as the present buildings are supported; but as he is entitled, in my opinion, as matter of right, to build over the passage, it follows, as I have said, that he must have right to the necessary support for it on his own ground. I regard the words "left out" as meaning that the 6 feet are to be excluded from the pursuer's feu as ground on which he may not build as he may build on all the rest. In short, "left out" does not mean "left outside" of the buildings on the feu, but left out unbuilt upon when the rest is built upon. The particular line of the passage was never laid down on any plan or made matter of contract, in the same way as the passage in dispute in the case of Hill v. Maclaren to which we were referred—and indeed this case could be distinguished, if necessary, from Hill's case in other respects.

But then it is said that the defender has had access to the servitude passage from almost any part of his own adjoining boundary, and has acquired right of access in that way by prescriptive use. That view has been negatived by the Lord Ordinary, on the ground that the proof adduced does not support it, and that part of the Lord Ordinary's judgment has not been assailed. It appears, I think, clearly enough that any use which the defender has had of the passage by access to it, from his own land instead of from Hadden Street, has been merely the consequence of the pursuer's neighbourly tolerance—and in no respect the exercise of a right. The pursuer or his authors could at any time (if I am right in the view which I have expressed as to the meaning of the pursuer's title) have prevented access by the defender from his own ground on to the servitude road by building the wall which is now proposed to be built, whether for the purpose of resting a superstructure thereon, or merely for the purpose of fencing his property.

MISS VIOLET COLQUHOUN AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—N. J. Kennedy. No. 126.

Nobile Officium—Trust—Advances out of income directed to be accumulated. Mar. 15, 1894.
—A truster, who died in 1884, directed his trustees to invest the whole residue of his estate in their own names, and to retain out of the income thereof, which was to be paid to A during her life, the sum of £1000 annually for the benefit of A's two daughters, and to invest the same, along with the income accruing thereon, for behoof of the daughters equally, and of the survivor, and in the event of A dying, to continue to set aside £1000 annually, "until, with interest on said sums, there be accumulated a sum of £10,000, for behoof" of A's two daughters "equally between them, or the whole to the survivor, in the event of the predeceaser not leaving issue." Payment was to be made on A's death, provided they had then attained majority or been married.

In 1893 it was decided by the Court of Session that the accumulation of the income did not cease on £10,000 being accumulated, but must go on during A's life.

In 1894, after £11,000 had been accumulated, A's daughters, who were respectively seventeen and sixteen years of age, presented a petition for advances to be made for their maintenance and education out of the income directed to be accumulated. They stated that they were entirely dependent on their mother A, whose income was about £1100. The Court, in respect that the main purpose of the truster had been effected by the accumulation of £10,000, and that the advances were desirable in the interests of the children, granted the petition, and authorised the trustees to advance £200 a-year for each of the petitioners.

WILLIAM COLQUHOUN, residing at Rossdhu, Luss, Dumbartonshire, died 1st DIVISION. on the 22d March 1884, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th March 1876, by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees. By the fourth purpose thereof he directed his trustees to invest the whole residue of his means and estate, heritable and moveable, in their own names, and to hold the same for a period of twenty years from and after his decease, and also to invest the rents, interests, dividends, and other income thereof from time to time as the same might accumulate; and by the fifth purpose he directed them, at the expiry of said period of twenty years, to apply the said accumulated fund, both principal and interest (so far as not then already invested in land), to the purchase of land in Dumbartonshire, or wherever else they might judge most expedient, and to settle the estate or estates so purchased in a specified manner.

By codicils, dated 25th November 1882 and 6th December 1883, the truster directed his trustees, in the event of his being survived by Mrs Anna Maria Colquhoun, wife of his nephew, Colonel James Colquhoun, and in case the latter should die without having succeeded to the estate of Luss, and should leave her a widow, to pay and make over the income of the residue to her, so long as she survived, instead of accumulating it for twenty years, in terms of the fourth purpose of his settlement.

By a codicil dated 12th February 1884 the truster directed his trustees, out of the income directed to be paid to Mrs Colquhoun, "to retain and reserve £1000 annually for the benefit of Violet Colquhoun and Helen Colquhoun, her two daughters, and to invest the same, along with the annual interest or income accruing thereon, in my said trustees' and executors' own names for behoof of the said Violet and Helen Colquhoun, equally between them, share and share alike, or in the event of one dying

No. 126. without leaving lawful issue, then the whole to the survivor, and in the event of the said Mrs Anna Maria Colquhoun dying or marrying again (in which latter event I hereby revoke and recall the provision of the rents, interests, dividends, and other income left to her by the foregoing codicil), then I direct my trustees and executors nevertheless to continue to set aside annually £1000, until with interest on said sums there be accumulated a sum of £10,000, for behoof of the said Violet and Helen Colquhoun, equally between them, or the whole to the survivor, in the event of the predeceaser not leaving lawful issue as aforesaid: Declaring that said sums shall be payable to the said Violet and Helen Colquhoun on their mother's death, provided they have attained the age of twenty-one or have been married; and further declaring that said sums shall be alimentary, and shall not be affectable by the acts and deeds of the said Violet or Helen Colquhoun, nor assignable by them, nor attachable for their debts, or the debts of any husband to whom they may be married."

Mar. 15, 1894.
Colquhoun.

The testator was predeceased by the said Colonel James Colquhoun, who did not succeed to the estate of Luss, and survived by the said Mrs Anna Maria Colquhoun and her two daughters, Violet and Helen.

Various questions having arisen as to the future administration of the estate after the trustees had accumulated £10,000, a special case was, on 28th February 1893, presented to the Court, in which it was decided that the accumulation of the fund for behoof of the daughters did not cease on the sum of £10,000 being accumulated, but must continue during Mrs Colquhoun's lifetime, so long as she remained unmarried.

On 9th January 1894 a petition was presented to the Court by Miss Violet and Miss Helen Colquhoun, with consent of their curators and the persons having the residuary interest in the fund, craving the Court to authorise Mr Colquhoun's trustees to pay to their curators a sum sufficient for the petitioners' "maintenance and education, having regard to their position and prospects in life," out of the free annual income directed to be accumulated for their behoof.

They stated that they were now seventeen and sixteen years of age respectively, that the trustees had accumulated upwards of £11,000 for their behoof, that their father, Colonel James Colquhoun, did not leave any estate from which they could be alimented, and that they were therefore entirely dependent on their mother, whose income consisted of £200, under her marriage-contract trust, and of between £800 and £900 from Mr Colquhoun's trust.

"The petitioners are now at an age when a considerable sum is required annually for their maintenance and education. Mrs Colquhoun is unable out of her own funds to afford the expense of a proper education for her daughters, which is at present not less than £300 per annum, and at the same time to maintain for them the home to which they are entitled."

A remit having been made to T. M. Murray, Esq., W.S., to report upon the petition, he reported in favour of an advance being made.

The undernoted cases were cited in support of the application.¹

LORD ADAM.—This is an application made by the two daughters of Mrs Colquhoun, aged seventeen and sixteen respectively, for advances to be made to them out of a certain fund left by a granduncle. The application is made with the consent of their mother and also of the persons interested to claim the funds in question if these, and assuming that these, were to fall into residue. No. 126.

Now, with regard to the residue of his estate we find that Mr William Colquhoun, the granduncle, at first directed the whole income arising therefrom to be paid to the mother of the petitioners, but by a subsequent codicil he directed it to the extent of £1000 a-year to be retained by his trustees for the benefit of her two daughters, and invested along with the annual interest or income arising thereon until there should be accumulated a sum of £10,000 for behoof of the daughters equally, and then each of the daughters is substituted to the other. The accumulated fund is to be paid over to the daughters on the death of their mother, provided they have then attained twenty-one years of age or been married. The form of the destination therefore is, that the trustees are to hold the fund for behoof of the girls, with a direction to pay it over to them on a particular event. We are now asked in the circumstances explained to us to award payments out of the income of the accumulated funds for the maintenance and education of these girls, having regard to their position and prospects in life. We are informed that their mother, Mrs Colquhoun, has an income arising out of funds of her own of about £200 a-year, and of about £900 derived from the trust-funds of Mr William Colquhoun. We are also told—and I think this is a very material point—that the accumulated funds have reached the sum of £10,000. I say that is very material, for I think that the main object of the truster was that by the date of their mother's death her daughters should have accumulated for them a small fortune of £5000 to each or £10,000 to the survivor. That his main object and immediate purpose has been effected, and so we are left free—without in any way defeating that purpose—to deal with the application of the income of the fund in the meantime as a source for providing for the maintenance and education of the daughters. Now, looking to the authorities that have been quoted, I think that in the circumstances it is desirable and appropriate that the income of this fund should be so far paid over for their benefit, and accordingly that the prayer of the petition should be granted. Mar. 15, 1894.
Colquhoun.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. This cannot be represented as a case of pressing necessity, but there is no doubt that the mother of the petitioners will be able to provide for their suitable maintenance and education much more conveniently and advantageously for them and for herself if the payment is allowed, and that is a ground which the Court will always take into consideration in dealing with applications of this kind. I doubt whether we could give effect to the petition but for the consideration to which Lord Adam has adverted, for if there were were no such provision in Mr Colquhoun's settlement as that which shews that the truster thought the sum to be accumulated should be £10,000, I should have some difficulty in saying that he had not himself contemplated the question we are now considering and decided it against the petitioners, for of course he knew what provision he was making for their mother, and he directs that the rest of the income should be accumulated. I think, however, that the special point which Lord Adam has mentioned is extremely important, and taking the same view of it as his Lordship does, I agree in thinking that the petition should be granted.

Henderson v.
Louttit & Co.,

JAMES LOUTTIT & COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Dickson—M'Lennan.

Company—Winding-up—General meeting—Quorum—The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), Schedule I, Table A, Articles 37, 38.—The Companies Act, 1862, by article 37 of Table A, Schedule 1, enacts,—“No business shall be transacted at any general meeting . . . unless a quorum of members is present at the time when the meeting proceeds to business. . . .” Held (1) that “members” mean members entitled to vote; and (2) that a quorum must not only be present at the commencement of the meeting but also at the time when the business is transacted.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 22d February 1894 Mrs Jane Henderson and other shareholders of James Louttit & Company, Limited, presented a petition craving the Court “to order the voluntary winding-up of the said James Louttit & Company, Limited, resolved on by the extraordinary resolutions [after-mentioned], to be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, in terms of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1892; or otherwise, as an alternative to the foregoing prayer, to order the said company to be wound up by the Court under the provisions of the said Companies Acts.”

The company was registered on 31st March 1873, and incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867. Its capital consisted of £6000, in 600 shares of £10 each. The memorandum of association was registered without articles of association, and consequently Table A of the Companies Act, 1862, formed the regulations of the company.

The petitioners averred that on 5th February 1894 at an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders, a resolution was unanimously adopted requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily, and that at a subsequent meeting on 20th February 1894 that resolution was duly confirmed and a liquidator appointed.

They further averred that the creditors of the company would be paid in full, and that the shareholders alone had any interest in the winding-up, and stated, as a reason for the winding-up being placed under the supervision of the Court, the risk of injury to the company by the possible separate action of a small section of the shareholders. No reason was stated in support of the alternative prayer for a compulsory winding-up.

Answers were lodged by James Louttit & Company, Limited, and the directors and secretary of the company.

The respondents stated, and it was not disputed, that the number of shareholders at the date of the meeting on 5th February was fifty-five.

They further stated,—“Said second meeting was duly convened, but at the time and place fixed only twelve members entitled to vote at the meeting presented themselves. Mr Daniel Wares Georgeson, solicitor, Wick, who had acquired certain shares in the company on the day previous to the meeting, also presented himself, but under Article 47 of Table A he was disqualified from voting, not having held his shares for three months prior to the meeting. There being thus no quorum present, No. 127. no business was or could be transacted. In the view of ten of the twelve qualified members who assembled, Mr Georgeson could not be reckoned for the purpose of making up a quorum, and these ten members accordingly left the place of meeting. There remained, in addition to Mr Georgeson, only two members, the petitioners Mr Alexander Laing, S.S.C., and Mr James Sutherland. These gentlemen proceeded, notwithstanding the provision of the said 37th and 38th Articles of the said Table A, to pass the pretended resolutions set forth in the petition. There having been no quorum present when the said two shareholders proceeded to business, the said pretended resolutions were wholly incompetent and inept. The resolution of 5th February in favour of liquidation remains unconfirmed, and the company is consequently not now in liquidation.*

Mar. 15, 1894.
Henderson v.
Louttit & Co.,
Limited.

It was admitted by the petitioners that Mr Georgeson had not held his shares for three months, and that ten of the members who came to the second meeting had left before the consideration of the resolution was entered upon.

The petitioners argued ;—There were thirteen members of the company present at the second meeting. That constituted a quorum. It did not matter that one of them had not held his shares for three months. Art. 37 did not say that a quorum must be of members entitled to vote, but simply of members. Further, it was enough that a quorum was present at the commencement of the meeting, which then proceeded to business, and there was nothing in the Act which made it necessary for a quorum to remain throughout the proceedings. The resolution, therefore, having been confirmed at a duly convened and duly attended meeting the company was in voluntary liquidation, and it was obviously for the advantage of all parties that the winding-up should now be placed under the supervision of the Court.

The respondents argued ;—A quorum of members meant an effective quorum of members entitled to vote and take part in the business of the meeting.¹ Any other construction of the expression was extravagant. It was equally extravagant to contend that provided a quorum of members was present at the commencement of a meeting before the business of it was entered upon, fewer members than a quorum were entitled at any time thereafter at the same meeting competently to transact the business.

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), Schedule 1, Table A, enacts, Article 37,—“No business shall be transacted at any general meeting, except the declaration of a dividend, unless a quorum of members is present at the time when the meeting proceeds to transact business, and such quorum shall be ascertained as follows, that is to say, if the persons who have taken shares in the company at the time of the meeting do not exceed ten in number, the quorum shall be five, if they exceed ten there shall be added to the above quorum one for every five additional members up to fifty, and one for every ten additional members after fifty, with this limitation that no quorum shall in any case exceed twenty.”

Article 38.—“If within one hour from the time appointed for the meeting a quorum is not present the meeting” shall be dissolved or stand adjourned.

Article 47.—“ . . . No member shall be entitled to vote in respect of any share that he has acquired by transfer at any meeting . . . unless he has been possessed of the share in respect of which he claims to vote for at least three months previously to the time of holding the meeting at which he proposes to vote.”

No. 127. No reason whatever had been suggested for a compulsory winding-up. The shareholders admittedly were the only persons interested, and no valid expression of their views had yet been obtained on the question.

Mar. 15, 1894.
Henderson v.
Louttit & Co.,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this petition fails in both its branches. The application to have the voluntary winding-up continued subject to the supervision of the Court, of course, postulates the existence of a voluntary winding-up, and that depends on the validity of the proceedings at the confirmation meeting. Now, on the face of these proceedings, it appears to me that there was not a quorum present. It is impossible to hold that when the word "quorum" is used it has any other sense than a quorum of effective members—members qualified to take part in and to decide upon questions brought before the meeting. Accordingly, it appears to me that in regard to the meeting in question the proceedings disclose two fatal faults:—First, Mr Georgeson was not a member qualified to vote, and could not therefore, in my view, count as a member in ascertaining the quorum. Second, when the meeting proceeded to the business for which it had been called there were present only two members qualified to vote, and I think it would never do to construe sec. 37 of Table A as the petitioners propose. It would be a highly inconvenient, not to say unnatural meaning to attribute to it, to hold that all that is necessary to the validity of the proceedings is, that at the earliest stage of the meeting a quorum should be present, but that after the real business of the meeting is started and under consideration the quorum might go away. I think, therefore, that there is no liquidation in existence which can be continued under the supervision of the Court.

As regards the second branch of the application, the petitioner clearly shews that this is not a creditors' liquidation, as all the creditors are to be paid in full. Accordingly the persons interested in the matter, and entitled to be heard, are the shareholders. Now, the proceedings in question having miscarried, it would be quite premature for us to grant the application for a winding-up by the Court without waiting to see what opinion is entertained by the shareholders.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Husband and Wife—Bankruptcy—Wife's furniture in husband's house—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1.—In the case of a marriage contracted in 1885 held that furniture which had belonged to the wife before her marriage, and had been taken by her to the house in which she and her husband lived after marriage, had not been imixed with her husband's funds nor lent or entrusted to him, in the sense of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, and did not pass, on his sequestration, to his trustee.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN November 1893 Mrs Janet Adam, wife of George Adam, sometime spirit-dealer in Airdrie, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against James Craig, C.A., trustee on her husband's sequestrated estates, praying the Court to interdict the defender, as trustee, from selling, removing, or in any way interfering with certain specified articles of No. 128. furniture in the house at Airdrie in which she resided.

The pursuer averred, and the defender admitted, that the furniture in question had been purchased by her before her marriage (which took place in 1885) with money received from her father. She further averred,—(Cond. 2) “The said articles are thus the sole property of the pursuer, the said Mrs Adam, and have still remained hers, she having been married after the Married Women’s Property Act, 1881. The said articles had only been immixed with other estate of the said George Adam in respect they were in the same house as his furniture, and they were capable of easy identification.” The defender answered,—(Ans. 2) “Denied. The said articles have been immixed with the furniture and other estate of the said George Adam.”

tee.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The said articles having been immixed with the estate of the said George Adam, and being part of his sequestrated estate, belong to the defender as trustee thereon.*

On 6th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds . . . (3) that in virtue of section 1 of the Married Women’s Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the said articles were vested in the petitioner as her separate estate, and were not subject to her husband’s jus mariti, and were not subject to arrestment or other diligence of the law for her husband’s debts; (4) that although the said articles were in the petitioner’s husband’s house, along with articles of furniture belonging to him at the date of his sequestration, they were not, in the sense of subsection 4, section 1, of the said Act, lent or entrusted to the husband, or ‘immixed with his funds,’ but were capable of being identified and distinguished from the estate of the husband: Finds in law that the said articles were the separate property of the petitioner, that they did not form part of the assets of her husband, and that the defender, as trustee on the husband’s sequestrated estate, is not entitled to take possession of the same: Therefore declares the interim interdict formerly granted perpetual: Finds the petitioner entitled to expenses,” &c.†

* The Married Women’s Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1, enacts,—“Where a marriage is contracted after the passing of this Act, and the husband shall, at the time of the marriage, have his domicile in Scotland, the whole moveable or personal estate of the wife, whether acquired before or during the marriage, shall, by operation of law, be vested in the wife as her separate estate, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti. . . .”

(3) “Except as hereinafter provided, the wife’s moveable estate shall not be subject to arrestment, or other diligence of the law, for the husband’s debts, provided that the said estate (except such corporeal moveables as are usually possessed without a written or documentary title) is invested, placed, or secured in the name of the wife herself, or in such terms as shall clearly distinguish the same from the estate of the husband.”

(4) “Any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the husband’s estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife’s claim to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money or other estate after but not before the claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money’s worth have been satisfied.”

† “NOTE.—The findings in the above interlocutor speak for themselves, and I have only to refer in support of it to the passage in Lord Fraser’s Treatise on Husband and Wife, p. 1517, where his Lordship says,—‘The investments in which the wife may put her earnings may be furniture or any other corpora mobilia as well as stocks or heritage, and thus although the two spouses be living together, Adam v.

Adam's Trustee.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The furniture having been taken to the husband's house after the marriage, had been immixed with his funds, or had been lent or entrusted to him, in the sense of the Act, and consequently it had passed to his trustee.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—The Sheriff-substitute's judgment was right. The furniture here was admittedly the wife's property before marriage; and the effect of the Act was to put the wife's property (subject to the exceptions provided by the Act) into the position in which it would have been had the husband's jus mariti been excluded, in which case the property was not open to the diligence of his creditors.² It was said that the furniture was within the exception of having been immixed with the husband's funds, but furniture was not capable of being "immixed" with the husband's funds. The exception of immixing and of lending or intrusting to the husband, applied only to money, or its equivalent—not to corporeals such as furniture. Anderson's case really went on the ground that the furniture was not in bona fide the wife's property.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The question in this case arises under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. It relates to fifteen articles of furniture,—I should think the whole articles of furniture found in the house of this publican. He became bankrupt and these articles are now claimed by his trustee. The wife says that the articles are hers, that they were purchased before her marriage with her own money, and that averment is admitted by the trustee. Therefore in the case of these articles of furniture there was no immixing of them with any furniture of the husband. The question is whether under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, the wife is entitled to the furniture or whether it belongs to the husband's creditors. Prima facie the wife is entitled to the furniture unless the case falls under section 1, subsection 4, of the Act, which the trustee says it does.

Now, it is not stated on record, and it is not the defender's case, that the furniture was entrusted or lent to the husband. The defender's case, as stated in answer 2 and in his second plea in law, is that these articles of furniture have been immixed with the furniture and other estate of the husband, and therefore that it now belongs to the defender as trustee on that estate. But as I have said there was no immixing in this case, at least no immixing that was not capable of immediate separation or unmixing. I am, therefore, of opinion with the Sheriff-substitute, who in deciding the case has proceeded on the law stated by Lord Fraser in his treatise on Husband and Wife, that this furniture, and any furniture in a similar position, is the estate of the wife, and does not pass to the husband's trustee in bankruptcy.

The Sheriff-substitute refers to the case of Anderson v. Leith, 19 R. 684, but he is of opinion that that case was a special one and does not derogate in any way from the law laid down by Lord Fraser. I agree with the Sheriff-substithe whole of the plenishings apparently his may be the wife's property, and cannot be taken by the husband's creditors.'

"Reference was made at the debate by the agent for the defender to the case of Anderson v. Leith, 18th March 1892, 19 Rettie, 684, but in my opinion that case was a special one, and does not derogate in any way from what is laid down by Lord Fraser."

tute. I think the case of Anderson was a very special one, and I do not think that it was decided on any ground of immixing. The case was that of a clergyman who on the eve of bankruptcy, having a considerable number of small debts, and being tormented by his creditors, in order, as I thought,—and as I think all the Judges who heard the case thought,—to put his furniture beyond the reach of his creditors had made a sale on paper of his furniture to his wife. No change had been made in the possession of the furniture; there was nothing but the document to shew that the furniture had become the property of the wife. I was of opinion that the transaction was not in bona fide. But the case there was not one of immixing; the case was that even if there had been a valid sale the wife had lent or entrusted the furniture to her husband. There were some observations made by some of the Judges in that case tending to this, that a wife may lend or entrust furniture belonging to her to her husband. That may be; I do not think that is impossible. But where a woman who is in possession of furniture marries a man who has no furniture at all, or very little, and brings it into his house, or it may be into her own house, I do not think that she thereby lends or entrusts it to her husband within the sense of section 1, subsection 4, of the statute. I do not think, therefore, that there is any case of lending or entrusting made out here at all.

On the whole matter, I agree in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and in the law as stated by Lord Fraser, on which the Sheriff-substitute proceeds.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In my opinion the furniture belonged to the wife, and was not lent or entrusted to the husband or immixed with his estate. I therefore concur.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I also agree. If we decided this case in favour of the defender, I do not think that there could ever be a case in which a wife's furniture when brought into her husband's house could be prevented from becoming his property.

Succession—Trust—Vesting—Repugnancy.—A testator directed his trustees, after payment of an alimentary liferent of the residue of his estate to his brother, Joseph Ritchie, to "hold and apply" one-half of the residue "for the uses and behoof of Alexander Ritchie, son of Joseph Ritchie, and of any other child or children that may yet be procreated of his marriage, equally among them if more than one, and if only one child should be left, then for the sole use and behoof of such child, and that in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as my trustees shall think best, and of which they shall be the sole judges."

Joseph Ritchie survived his brother, the testator, and as one of his brother's two next of kin was entitled to one-half of such part of his brother's estate as might be undisposed of.

Joseph Ritchie died leaving a will by which he bequeathed the fee of his whole estates to his only son Alexander.

JAMES RITCHIE, sometime merchant in San Francisco, died at Newton-on-Ayr on 27th May 1871, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which, after providing for the payment of certain legacies and of an alimentary liferent of the residue of his estate to his brother, Joseph Ritchie, and his brother's wife, Mrs Margaret Boyd or Ritchie, he directed his trustees, inter alia,—"In the third place, on the death of the survivor of the said Joseph Ritchie and Margaret Boyd or Ritchie, my trustees shall hold and apply the residue of my means and estate to and for the uses and behoof of Alexander Ritchie, son of the said Joseph Ritchie, and of any other child or children that may yet be procreated of his marriage, equally among them if more than one, and if only one child should be left, then for the sole use and behoof of such child, and that in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as my trustees shall think best, and of which they shall be the sole judges." The testator farther provided, that in the event of his brother John Ritchie, "who has not been heard of for many years, being alive and returning to this country, my trustees shall hold and apply the one half of the residue of my means and estate to and for his use and behoof, and in that case the provision to the said Joseph Ritchie, my brother, and his wife and family shall be restricted to the other half of the residue of my means and estate."

The testator was survived by his brother Joseph and his wife, and by their only son Alexander.

Joseph Ritchie died on 13th May 1876, leaving a general disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estates to his widow in liferent, and his son Alexander and his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee.

Mrs Ritchie, Joseph Ritchie's widow, died on 17th September 1893.

Alexander Ritchie, Mr and Mrs Joseph Ritchie's son, then called on James Ritchie's trustees to denude in his favour to the extent of one-half of the residue of the trust-estate in their hands, and the trustees having declined to do so, a special case was presented. The trustees were the first parties, and Alexander Ritchie was the second party.

The case stated that James Ritchie's next of kin at the time of his death were his brothers Joseph Ritchie and John Ritchie, if John Ritchie was then alive. The case farther stated that Alexander Ritchie, the second party, had presented a petition under the Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1891, to have it found that John Ritchie was to be presumed to have died on 31st December 1853, and that intimation of this petition had been ordered.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Are the first parties bound to denude in favour of the second party, and to convey to him one-half of the residue of the said trust-estate? or (2) Are the first parties entitled to retain the said residue for the purpose of applying the same for the use and behoof of the second party, in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as the first parties, as trustees foresaid, shall think best?”

Argued for the first parties;—Under the third purpose the first parties had a discretion to pay or withhold payment of the fee of the residue in whole or in part from the second party; or in other words they were empowered to restrict his right to a liferent. No right of fee, therefore, vested in the second party until he received payment.¹ In Miller's

*Trustees*¹ and *Wilkie's Trustees*² there was, in the opinion of the Court, No. 129. a direction to pay over; here the direction was "to hold and apply" merely. Even if there was vesting a trust would be kept up unless it was cumbrous and unnecessary,³ which here it was not. If then the trust ought to be kept up, it was immaterial that the second party took a vested right of fee ab intestato. Mar. 16, 1894.
Ritchie's
Trustees v.
Ritchie.

Argued for the second party;—The fee had vested in the second party under the deed;⁴ the trustees had no such discretionary power to restrict as occurred in Chambers' Trustees,⁵ and similar cases cited on the other side. In any case the second party took the fee as representing the testator's next of kin. For, if the second party did not take the fee under the will, then one-half of the fee passed ab intestato to the second party's father as one of the testator's two next of kin; and the second party took that half in virtue of his father's will. If, therefore, the fee had vested in the second party, the trustees were bound to denude in his favour.⁶ Even if a trust might be kept up as being reasonable, a limitation which, as here, was indefinite in point of time was prima facie unreasonable.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question in this case about which there is any doubt, after the decisions which have been pronounced by the Court, is whether under this deed a fee is given to Alexander Ritchie. I do not think that it is necessary to decide that question, because it is clear that either under the deed or ab intestato Alexander Ritchie takes a right of fee, and that being so, it is impossible to distinguish this case from several recent cases, particularly Miller's Trustees, 18 R. 301, and Wilkie's Trustees, 21 R. 199, in which it was held that where a person who is sui juris takes a right of fee he cannot be restricted as regards his possession and enjoyment of the subject by any such trust limitation as we have here. I think that we must hold this to be the law—in the meantime at all events—and I therefore think that Alexander Ritchie is entitled to have this estate handed over to him.

LORD YOUNG.—The question here relates to the residue of the means and estate of the testator, James Ritchie. Now, unless otherwise disposed of by this will, the fee belongs to the claimant, Alexander Ritchie. He is the fiar of the whole residue, the fee of which is not otherwise disposed of. It may be a question whether the residue is given to him by the will. If it is, then he is fiar under the will; if it is not, then it is certainly not given to anyone else, and he consequently takes it under the law of intestacy. That being so, it is, I think, according to the decisions,—certainly the later decisions, particularly Miller's Trustees, Wilkie's Trustees, and Mackinnon,—that such a trust direction as this with respect to the fee of an estate is ineffectual to limit the right of the fiar, and that, if there is no other interest involved, he is entitled

My own view, I confess, is that it would be expedient that the owner of property, even with respect to property which he leaves to his heir, should be at liberty by means of a trust to protect the object of his bounty from wasting the property, and therefore that such a trust direction as we have here ought to be effectual, and ought not to be defeated by any technical considerations based on the doctrine of repugnancy. But my views have been overruled, and are contrary to the law as it has now been established by the decisions.

Burgh—Street—Regular line of street—Setting back buildings—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 162.—In 1877 the corporation of a burgh resolved to widen a street in the burgh to an uniform width of 40 feet. In 1893 the width of the street, with the exception of one place in which three houses projected 13 to 15 feet into the street, was at least 40 feet, but the buildings were not in any regular line, some being further back from the 40 feet line than others. One of the three houses which projected beyond that line having been pulled down with a view to its being rebuilt, the Magistrates sought to have the proprietor ordained to set the new building back to "the regular line of the street," in terms of sec. 162 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the "regular line of the street" contemplated by the Act was the line of the existing buildings in the street, and that there was, in point of fact, no such regular line to which the Magistrates were entitled to have the new building set back.

Burgh—Street—Restriction on height of building—General Turnpike Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43)—Adoption of Act by Local Act.—Sec. 91 of the Turnpike Act, 1831, provides that no houses, &c. "above 7 feet high shall be erected without the consent of the trustees . . . within the distance of 25 feet from the centre of any turnpike road." That and other sections of the General Act were adopted by the Local Police Act of a burgh "so far as said clauses are applicable to the roads and streets within" the burgh, "and in so far as the same are not inconsistent with this Act and the Police Act." Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that sec. 91 applied to a street in the burgh, and that the Magistrates were entitled to prevent the proprietor of vacant land bordering on a street from erecting thereon buildings of a greater height than 7 feet within 25 feet of the centre of the street.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

IN 1878 the Corporation of Galashiels resolved to improve Channel Street, one of the leading thoroughfares of the burgh, by widening it to 40 feet conform to a plan.

The Corporation, by agreement with various proprietors, were able to widen the greater part of the street, but three of the proprietors on the north side of the street, Messrs Gillies, Mr M'Queen, and Mr Schulze, refused to transact, and their buildings, having a frontage of from 40 to 50 yards, projected beyond the proposed line of street shewn on the plan.

Mr Schulze, whose property consisted of two houses on the north side of the street and of a vacant space adjoining them on the west, after taking down the two houses, proposed to erect new buildings upon their site and on the ground adjoining.

No. 130.
Mar. 16, 1894.
Magistrates of Galashiels v.
Schulze.

In 1893 the Corporation presented a note of suspension and interdict against Mr Schulze to prevent him doing so.

The objection to the respondent building on the site of the two houses was rested upon sec. 162 of the General Police Act, 1862, which enacts, "When any house or building, any part of which projects beyond the regular line of the street, or beyond the front of the house or building on either side thereof, has been taken down in order to be altered, or is to be rebuilt, the Commissioners may require the same to be set backwards to or toward the line of the street, or the line of the adjoining houses or buildings, in such manner as the Commissioners may direct, for the improvement of such street, subject always to payment of compensation to the owner of such house or building for any damage he thereby sustains which compensation may be settled in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845."

The objection to the building to be erected on the ground previously unbuilt on was rested upon sec. 91 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831, which, along with other sections, was incorporated in the Galashiels Municipal Extension Police and Water Act, 1876, by sec. 40 thereof, which enacts that these clauses, "so far as the said clauses are applicable to the roads and streets within the extended burgh, and in so far as the same are not inconsistent with this Act and the Police Act, shall from and after 15th May 1877 extend and apply to all the roads and streets within the extended burgh."

Sec. 91 of the Turnpike Act, 1831, enacts,—“No houses, walls, or other buildings, above 7 feet high, shall be erected without the consent of the trustees previously obtained in writing, and no new enclosures or plantations shall be made within the distance of 25 feet from the centre of any turnpike road.”

The respondent averred with reference to the first objection that in Channel Street as a whole there was no regular line of street, "and that the two small houses belonging to the respondent did not project beyond the line of the street at the part thereof where they were situated, or beyond the houses or buildings adjoining them."

With reference to the second objection, the respondent admitted that the buildings he proposed to erect on the vacant ground were over 7 feet in height.

The respondent pleaded;—4. The complainers are not entitled to object to the respondent's operations under the said General Police Act of 1862, in respect that there is no regular line of street in Channel Street as a whole, and that the buildings formerly on the ground did not project, and the new buildings will not project beyond either (1) the actual line of the street at the part thereof where situated, or (2) the actual front of the houses or buildings thereto adjoining. 6. The provisions of the Act 1 and 2 William IV. cap. 43, founded on by the complainers, being inapplicable to the present case, and the operation thereof contended for by the complainers being inconsistent with the provisions of the said General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Galashiels Municipal Extension Police and Water Act, 1876, interdict should be refused.

No. 130.

Mar. 16, 1894.
Magistrates of Galashiels v.
Schulze.

The state of the street at the date of the proceedings is sufficiently described in the Lord Ordinary's note.

On 9th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) suspended the proceedings complained of, and granted interdict in terms of the prayer.*

* "OPINION.—I do not think that there is any substantial dispute between the parties as to the material facts of this case, and I am therefore in a position to dispose of it without further inquiry.

"Channel Street is one of the leading thoroughfares in Galashiels, and about 1878 the complainers approved of a scheme for widening the street to a breadth of 40 feet. The plan No. 10 of process shews in pink the buildings and front gardens as they existed in 1878, and the blue lines shew what the line of the street will be when the scheme is carried into effect.

"The complainers have by agreement with the proprietors been able to widen the greater part of the street, but three of the proprietors, viz., Messrs Gillies, Mr M'Queen, and the respondent Mr Schulze, have refused to transact thereanent with the complainers, and their buildings still project beyond the line of the street as widened.

"The plan No. 17 of process shews the present condition of the street.

"The respondent had two houses fronting Channel Street, and adjoining them a vacant stance at the corner of Channel Street and Park Street. He has taken down the two houses fronting Channel Street, and proposes to rebuild them. The front line of the houses projects into the street from 13 to 15 feet beyond the line of the street as widened. The complainers have required the respondent, in terms of the 162d section of the General Police Act of 1862, to set back the new houses to the line of the street as widened.

"The respondent also proposes to erect a building upon the vacant stance upon the same line of frontage as his old houses. The 162d section of the Police Act does not apply to a building erected for the first time, as it only deals with the case of existing houses being taken down to be altered or rebuilt. The complainers therefore appeal to the 91st section of the General Turnpike Act of 1831, which is incorporated with the Galashiels Municipal Extension Police and Water Act, 1876. That section provides that no houses or other buildings above 7 feet high shall be erected without the consent of the trustees (in this case the complainers) previously obtained in writing, within the distance of 25 feet from the centre of any turnpike road. By the Galashiels Act, and for the purposes of that Act, the expression 'turnpike roads,' when used in the incorporated section of the Turnpike Act, is defined as meaning 'roads and streets' within the burgh. The complainers accordingly contend that the respondent is not entitled, without their consent in writing, which they refuse to give, to erect a building upon the vacant stance above 7 feet high within 25 feet of the centre of Channel Street. If the complainers are right in their contention they can prevent the respondent erecting a building of a greater height than 7 feet upon the vacant stance beyond the line of the street as widened.

"I shall first consider the case in regard to the old houses under the 162d section of the General Police Act, and then the case of the new house under the 91st section of the Turnpike Act.

"The 162d section of the Police Act provides,—'When any house or building, any part of which projects beyond the regular line of the street, or beyond the front of the house or building on either side thereof, has been taken down in order to be altered, or is to be rebuilt, the commissioners may require the same to be set backwards to or towards the line of the street . . . for the improvement of such street.'

"It is admitted that the respondent's houses do not fall under the alternative case contemplated by the section, because they do not project beyond the front of the house immediately to the east,—that is, Mr M'Queen's house. The question, therefore, is whether they project beyond the regular line of the street within the meaning of the Act. The respondent contends that they do not do so, because there is no regular line of street, and he appeals to the plan No. 17

The respondent reclaimed.

The arguments of parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary, and of the Judges in the Inner-House.¹

of process as shewing that that is the case. That plan shews that the regular line of the street is, in the first place, interrupted by the projecting houses of the three proprietors to whom I have referred, who refused to sell to the complainers the ground necessary for widening the street opposite their houses. In the second place, the plan shews that eastward of the Douglas Hotel the houses upon the north side of the street stand behind and are not parallel with the line shewn upon the plan as the line of the street. The latter state of matters is, however, easily explained. The plan of 1878, No. 10 of process, shews that a number of the houses to the east of the Douglas Hotel had enclosed plots of ground in front of them. The proprietors were willing to sell or give to the complainers the ground necessary for widening the street, but they stipulated that the complainers should take over and pave the whole of the front plots, and not only the portions thereof which were included within the proposed line of street. It was also agreed that in the event of any of these proprietors rebuilding his house he should be entitled to bring the front forward to the new line of the street. The complainers accordingly, in paving the front plots, ran a line of coloured stones along the pavement upon the new line of the street. The result is that throughout the whole length of the street, except ex adverso of the three properties to which I have referred, the street has actually been widened to the proposed regular breadth of 40 feet, or the ground necessary for that purpose has been acquired, and the ultimate line of the street marked upon the pavement. In these circumstances, I think that the street has a regular line according to the fair and ordinary use of language, except in so far as that line is broken by the three projecting properties.

“The question therefore arises whether the fact that there are three properties which have not been brought into line prevents the application of the Act. Whether or not there is a regular line of street within the meaning of the Act must always, I think, be a question of circumstances. Here the fact is, as shewn by the plan, that out of a street of over 200 yards in length there are only buildings (including those of the respondent) having a frontage of from 40 to 50 yards which project beyond the regular line of the street. It seems to me that that is just the kind of case in which the Act gives the Commissioners power to take advantage of the rebuilding of a projecting house to compel the proprietor to set it back to the regular line of the street.

“I am therefore of opinion that the complainers are entitled to prevail as regards the old houses.

“In regard to the new building upon the vacant stance, the only question is whether the 91st section of the General Turnpike Act applies. If it does apply, the complainers can prevent the respondent building above a certain height, beyond the regular line of the street, and of course it is only to that extent and effect that they desire to exercise their statutory powers.

“By the Galashiels Municipal Extension and Police Act, a number of the clauses (including the 91st) of the General Turnpike Act are incorporated, ‘so far as the said clauses are applicable to the roads and streets within the extended burgh, and in so far as the same are not inconsistent with this Act and the Police Act.’

“Now, many of the incorporated sections are obviously not applicable to a street within burgh. Thus the 84th and the 85th sections, which empower the road trustees to make side drains and ditches along the side of a turnpike road; the 88th and 89th sections, which provide for the pruning of hedges and trees at the side of a road; the 103d section, which provides that no animal is to be

LORD KINNEAR.—This reclaiming note raises two separate questions. The claimer is proprietor of ground in Channel Street, Galashiels, formerly occupied by two houses fronting the street; and he is also proprietor of a vacant stance at the corner of Channel Street and Park Street. He has taken down the two houses and proposes to rebuild them. The first question is, whether he is entitled to erect the new buildings on the same site as the old, or whether he can be compelled to set them back from 13 to 15 feet, to a line which the compastured upon a public road, and several others, plainly refer to country roads, and would seldom, if ever, be applicable to a street within burgh. But I see no reason why the 91st section should not be applicable to a street within burgh. It cannot be disputed that it is applicable to a road (as distinguished from a street) within the burgh boundaries, and there does not seem to me to be any sufficient reason for drawing a sharp distinction between a road within burgh and a street within burgh. I have already pointed out that the Galashiels Act defines 'turnpike road' as 'road or street' within the extended boundaries of the burgh.

"The respondent's counsel suggested that the reason of giving the power in the case of a road was that the road might afterwards be more easily widened if that should be found necessary. But that would be a reason for giving the power in the case of a street, and it is for that very purpose that the complainers desire to exercise the power.

"The respondent further says that the section is inconsistent with the Galashiels Act. That Act authorises the Commissioners to widen existing streets, and for that purpose to acquire land by agreement. That, the respondent argues, is the limit of the complainers' right as regards 'existing streets.' When there is a road which is not an 'existing street,' they may use the power given in the 91st section of the Turnpike Act, in view of it being necessary subsequently to widen the road, but if there is an existing street they can only widen it by acquiring the requisite land by agreement. Further, to put in force the powers of the 91st section would not, the respondent argues, enable the complainers to widen the street. It would not give them any part of the respondent's land, but would only limit the respondent's use of his land by preventing him building upon a certain part of it to a greater height than seven feet.

"I am of opinion that the respondent's argument is not well founded. I do not think that it can be said that the power conferred by the 91st section of the Turnpike Act is inconsistent with the special power given by the Galashiels Act to acquire land for the purpose of widening a street, because road trustees under the Turnpike Act had, in addition to the general powers of the 91st section, special power by the 61st section of that Act to widen roads to twenty feet without paying for the ground, and to forty feet on making satisfaction.

"Then, although it is quite true that the complainers would not, by exercising the powers of the 91st section, acquire any additional land, or be entitled actually to widen the street, they have a substantial interest to enforce these powers. If they are to complete the widening of the street, they must ultimately acquire the necessary part of the respondent's land, either by agreement or by the exercise of the compulsory power which they now possess. If the complainers are entitled to call in aid the 91st section, then the respondent must either keep back his buildings to the new line of the street, or must restrict their height to seven feet. In either case, the subject which the complainers would be compelled to acquire in order to complete the widening of the street, would be less costly than it would be if the respondent is entitled to erect buildings several storeys in height, up to the verge of his property.

"I have therefore come to be of opinion that the 91st section of the Turnpike Act is applicable, and that the complainers are entitled to enforce it.

"I shall therefore grant interdict in terms of the prayer of the note."

plainers allege to be the regular line of the street. This depends on the terms of the 162d section of the General Police Act of 1862. That section contemplates two different conditions in which a street may be found when a house or building is taken down in order to be altered or rebuilt. In one case the Act supposes that there is a regular line of street, although the house that is to be altered projects beyond it. In the other, it is not assumed that any regular line exists, but that the front of the house which is to be altered projects beyond the front of the house on either side. In the first case the section provides that when any house or building, any part of which projects beyond the regular line of the street, has been taken down in order to be altered or to be rebuilt, the commissioners may require the same to be set backwards to, or toward, the line of the street. In the other case the commissioners may require the house to be set back to the line of the adjoining houses.

Magistrates of Galashiels v.
Schulze.

The first question is, whether the reclamer can be compelled to set back his house to what has been called the line of the street, and that depends upon whether or not there is a regular line. That is a question of fact which must be determined with reference to the actual condition of the street at the time when the alterations are being made, and not to any scheme for an improved street, which may have been framed or approved by the Corporation, but not yet carried into effect. Whether there is or is not such a line is a question on which opinions may differ, because a street may be called regular notwithstanding that there may be some occasional departure from absolute uniformity of line. It is a question of less or more. But I am not satisfied that the magistrates have shewn that there is a regular line of street in a reasonable sense of these words. Their averment is that the width of the street varies, and that the line of the building on each side of it is irregular, although the line of the street is regular and well defined. I do not appreciate the distinction between the line of the street and the line of the buildings on either side of it. If there is a regular line to which a new building is to be set back it must be the line of the existing buildings, and in the present case it appears to me that there is no such regular line. The plans produced, although they shew that the magistrates contemplate alterations which may result in the creation of a uniform line, shew at the same time that the existing line of buildings is still irregular, and if the complaint were sustained the result would be to increase the irregularity by compelling the reclamer not to make his house uniform with those of his neighbours, but to set it back several yards behind their houses. I think that an operation having that result is not within the enactment, and therefore in this branch of the case I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The second question depends upon the 91st section of the General Turnpike Act, which is incorporated with the Galashiels Municipal Extension and Police Act, and by which it is provided that "no houses, walls, or other buildings above 7 feet high shall be erected without the consent of the trustees, within the distance of 25 feet from the centre of any turnpike road." The question is, whether that section of the Turnpike Act is or is not applicable to a street within the burgh of Galashiels.

Clauses 88 to 92 and others of the General Turnpike Act are by section 40 of the local Act adopted "so far as said clauses are applicable to the roads and streets within the burgh, and in so far as the same are not inconsistent with" the local Act. Now, there are various provisions in the incorporated clauses,

No. 130. and in particular in clause 91, which would be quite inapplicable to a street within burgh. But I do not think a prohibition to erect new buildings above a certain height within a certain distance of the centre of the street is in that position. There is no difficulty in its practical application if it be applicable in law. Our attention was not called to any clauses in the local Act which would be inconsistent with this provision, except to those to which the Lord Ordinary has adverted, and as to these I agree with his Lordship. But the ground on which it was maintained that the clause in question is inapplicable was, that it would be inequitable to enforce it, inasmuch as it would deprive the respondent of a valuable right without adequate compensation. But that is not a consideration for this Court. It may be that powers which have been given to the Corporation for the benefit of the community may operate harshly in particular cases. But the only question we have to determine is, whether they have or have not been conferred. On this part of the case I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

Tramway—Sale to Local Authority—Undertaking—Price—Rental value—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 78), sec. 43.—Section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, provides, that where the promoters of a tramway in any district are not the local authority, the local authority may within six months after the expiration of a period of twenty-one years from the time when such promoters were empowered to construct such tramway, require the promoters to sell to them "their undertaking, or so much of the same as is within such district, upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district," such value to be determined by a referee appointed by the Board of Trade.

In an action for the reduction of an award by a referee under this provision, held (aff. judgment of Lord Low, diss. Lord President) that the "then value of the tramway" meant the then value of the tramway lines, and that in fixing the price the basis of the calculation should be the cost of construction of the lines regarded as plant in situ capable of earning profit, less a sum for depreciation, and that the referee ought not to include in the price any allowance for the rental value of the company's undertaking.

IN November 1893 the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company, incorporated by the Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, with which the Tramways Act, 1870, was incorporated, raised an action in the Court of Session against the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, and against Henry Tennant, Esquire, York, and W. S. Haldane, W.S., Edinburgh, respectively, referee nominated by the Board of Trade, and clerk to the referee, in a reference entered into between the pursuers and the Magistrates, concluding for reduction of an award, dated 13th November 1893, pronounced by Mr Tennant.

Lord Low

The purpose of the reference was to determine the value of so much of the pursuers' tramways works and undertaking as were within the royal burgh, city, and county of the city of Edinburgh, and were purchased by the Magistrates under the powers conferred by sec. 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870.*

It appeared from the record in the case that, during the proceedings before the referee, the tramways company claimed that their "rental interest in the tramway lines falling under the statutory sale was a distinct item or part of the subjects of sale which it was the duty of the referee to consider, take into account, and value. No allowance was asked for past or future profits of the undertaking, i.e., for loss of the business carried on by the company as occupiers, nor was any compensation asked for compulsory sale, nor any consideration whatever, beyond the then value of the lines to the owners. . . . The lines should be valued by capitalising the rent at which one year with another the lines might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let."

After evidence had been led and parties heard, the referee issued a revised draft of his proposed award on 27th September 1893, in which he found that "the sum of £212,979, 7s. 6d. is the value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any com-

And when any such sale has been made, all the rights, powers, and authorities of such promoters in respect to the undertaking sold, or where any order has been made by the Board of Trade under either of the next preceding sections, all the rights, powers, and authorities of such promoters previous to the making of such order in respect to the undertaking sold, shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by the authority to whom the same has been sold, in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such authority, under the powers conferred upon them by a provisional order under this Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters.”

The referee thus stated his opinion in law :—" Second, that in valuing the tramways I am not entitled to take into account the present profits or rental value of the undertaking, but that the proper value of said tramways to be determined by me, according to my construction of the statute, is such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the same, under deduction of a proper sum in respect of depreciation to their present condition ; and that, in estimating such cost, I am entitled to take into account the fact that said tramways are now successfully constructed and in complete working condition. Third, that I am entitled, in valuing said tramways according to the cost of construction and establishment, to make allowance both for the sums expended by said company in obtaining parliamentary authority in so far as I consider such expenditure necessary or proper, and also for the sum of £2500, which sum I consider was a necessary and proper expenditure by said company, to enable double lines of tramways to be laid over said North Bridge, and which double lines form part of the undertaking." *

On 18th November 1893 the referee issued his final award (dated 13th November) in terms of the revised draft.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The referee is not prevented by the Tramways Act, 1870, from considering, taking into account, and valuing the tramway lines of the pursuers falling under the statutory sale according to their rental valuation ; and in refusing such valuation as being excluded by the statute, he has acted in error and ultra vires, and has failed in his duty to proceed with and exhaust the reference, and to issue a complete and final award and determination.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The referee having valued the tramway lines in accordance with the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870, the defenders should be assolized. (4) On a true construction of the Tramways Act, 1870, and especially of section 43 thereof, the defenders are not liable to pay for the rental value of the lines, and decree of absolvitor should therefore be pronounced.

On 22d February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low), having considered the conjoined processes, assolized the defenders.†

* Immediately after this draft award was issued the tramways company raised an action against the corporation and the arbiter for declarator, inter alia, that the latter was bound to value the lines of tramways according to their rental value. This action was subsequently conjoined with the action for reduction, and need not be further alluded to.

† " OPINION.—The question to be determined in this case depends upon the construction to be put upon the 43d section of the Tramways Act, 1870.

" The leading provisions of that Act, which it is important to keep in view in construing the 43d section, are as follows :—

" It is in the first place provided that the local authority of any district in which it is proposed to construct a tramway, or any person, corporation, or company, with the consent of the local authority, may, subject to the conditions of the Act, obtain a provisional order and relative Act of Parliament, authorising the construction of the tramway.

" By section 19 it is provided that a local authority which has completed or purchased a tramway, may by lease ' demise to any person or persons, corporation, or company, the right of user of the tramway, and of taking in respect of the same the tolls and charges authorised,' but no local authority is entitled ' to place and run carriages on such tramway and take tolls and charges in respect of the use of such carriages.'

" By section 34 it is enacted that ' the promoters and their lessees shall have the exclusive use of their tramways for carriages for flange wheels or other wheels suitable only to run upon the prescribed line.'

"The 41st section provides that if at any time after the opening of the tramway the promoters discontinue working it, the Board of Trade may by order declare the powers of the promoters in respect of such tramways to be at an end, 'and thereupon the said powers of the promoters shall cease and determine unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided.' The manner in the Act provided here referred to is that set forth in the 43d section. The 42d section contains provisions similar to those of the 41st section in the case of the promoters becoming insolvent.

"By section 45 the promoters of a tramway are authorised to take in respect of such tramway certain tolls and charges.

"By the 57th section it is provided that, notwithstanding anything in the Act contained, the promoters of any tramway shall not acquire any right other than that of user of any road along or across which they lay any tramway.

"Turning now to the 43d section it is there provided :—[Quoted supra, p. 689].

"Twenty-one years from the time when the Edinburgh Street Tramway Company was empowered to construct their tramways having expired, the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, as the local authority, exercised the right given to them by the 43d section to purchase the undertaking, and Mr Henry Tennant was appointed by the Board of Trade as referee to determine the value.

"In his award Mr Tennant states the principle upon which he has proceeded in valuing the tramways, thus :—'I am of opinion that I must assume . . . that in valuing the tramways I am not entitled to take into account the present profits or rental value of the undertaking, but that the proper value of the said tramways to be determined by me, according to my construction of the statute, is such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the same, under deduction of a proper sum in respect of depreciation to their present condition, and that in estimating such cost, I am entitled to take into account the fact that said tramways are now successfully constructed and in complete working condition.'

"The tramways company contend that the principle of valuation thus adopted by the referee is unsound, and that, in terms of the 43d section of the statute, he was bound to value the tramway lines according to their rental value as in a voluntary sale.

"The company argued that the undertaking which the corporation was authorised to purchase, and had purchased, included not only the tramway lines, buildings, carriages, and so forth, but the exclusive right to use the lines, and to take tolls; that the local authority were bound to pay for the whole undertaking, and not only for part of it; that according to the usual and recognised method of valuing such an undertaking the arbiter was bound to ascertain the rent at which the tramways, with the exclusive right to use them, might have been let; and that the parenthetical enactment only provided that the company was not to have any allowance for past or future profits over and above the rental value, or any allowance in respect that the sale was compulsory.

"The word 'undertaking' is no doubt wide enough to include the exclusive right to use the tramway and the power to take tolls, but to say that the corporation is bound to pay for the whole of the undertaking, is really to beg the question, because the question, and the only question, is, whether the Legislature has not authorised the purchase upon payment of something less than the value of the whole undertaking.

"If it had been intended that the local authority was to pay for the whole undertaking, including the exclusive right to use the tramways, I think that the Act would simply have said that the promoters should sell to the local authority their undertaking at a price to be determined, in case of difference, by a referee; and it would have been very easy to add that the price was to be fixed upon the basis of a voluntary and not a compulsory sale. But that is not what the Act does. On the contrary, the terms of the 43d section seem to me to imply that the transaction is a purely statutory one, and that while on the one hand the whole undertaking is to be acquired by the local authority, on the other hand the value of certain specified things alone is to be paid.

"The words are,—'The promoters shall sell the undertaking . . . upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking . . .) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters.'

"The words 'upon terms of paying' appear to me to be important as shewing that the Act was fixing a statutory price for a statutory sale. The promoters were to sell the undertaking, but the terms of payment were to be those specified in the Act and nothing more.

"Then the purchasers are to pay the value of the 'tramway,' and it is important to see what is meant by that word. The company contended that it must be construed according to the interpretation clause of their special Act—the Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871. By the 3d section of that Act it is enacted that 'the expression "the tramways" or "the undertaking" shall mean "the tramways and works and undertaking by this Act authorised."' The company therefore argued that the word 'tramway,' in the 43d section of the Act of 1870, must be read as meaning the tramways and works and undertaking authorised by the special Act. Although the general Act is incorporated with the special Act, this case in my opinion depends upon the construction of the former Act alone. In it there is no definition of 'undertaking' or 'tramways,' and if the framers of the Act had regarded 'tramways' and 'undertaking' as synonymous terms, I cannot believe that they would have done anything so misleading as to use the word 'undertaking' when defining what was to be sold, and the word 'tramway,' along with a number of other words, when specifying what was to be paid for. Further, even if the 43d section fell in this case to be construed as part of the special Act, I should think that the connection in which the word 'tramway' is used renders it impossible to construe it as equivalent to 'the tramways and works and undertaking by this Act authorised,' because the word 'tramway' is followed by the words 'and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant,'—an enumeration which would have been altogether unnecessary and redundant, if the word 'tramway' was used in the extended sense for which the company contend. I therefore think that the word 'tramway' in the 43d section must be read in its ordinary sense, as meaning the tramway line.

"But then the company argued that assuming that the word 'tramway' is to be construed as meaning the tramway line and nothing more, it must be valued as a tramway line which the purchasers have acquired the exclusive power to use for the purpose of earning profit. That view I think may mean one of three things—either (1) that the company are entitled to be paid not only the cost of construction, but also the value of the exclusive right to use the tramway; or (2) that the value of the tramway is to be ascertained upon the basis of the rent for which it could be let; or (3) that the tramway is to be valued as a completed tramway, ready and fit for immediate use.

"I assent to the company's argument to the extent of the third of these alternatives, but it seems to me that the first two are inconsistent with the provision that the value to be paid for the tramway is to be 'exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking.'

"The first alternative is, I think, clearly inconsistent with that provision, because it is impossible to my mind to find any basis upon which the company could be paid the value of their right to use the tramway, except the profits which they had earned or might expect to earn.

"I come to the same conclusion in regard to the second alternative. If a valuator was set to fix the rental value of a subject which had been in posseswere bound to pay for that the "then value" of the tramway. The measure of the "then value" was the plant plus the right which the sion of, and successfully worked by, the proprietor, it seems to me that the only reliable method upon which he could proceed would be to ascertain what were the profits which had been earned, and from that to estimate what rent could have been obtained if the proprietors had let the subject. But I think that that would involve the making an allowance for profits, because as the profits were larger or smaller the rent would be greater or less.

Mar. 16, 1894.
Edinburgh
Street Tramways Co. v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

"The company argued, and I think rightly, that what is excluded from the value by the parenthetical clause would, but for that exclusion, have been included. I do not, however, see how that helps the company. Supposing that there had been no parenthesis, and that the referee had proceeded to ascertain the rental value (which the company say would have been the proper way), I do not know upon what principle he could have allowed any additional sum for profits.

"Suppose the company had let the tramway, the rent would have represented their whole profit, and in that case I think that a rental valuation would clearly have been one making an allowance for profits.

"I would also point out that two practical men of great eminence—Mr Tennant in this case, and Sir Frederick Bramwell in the London case (to which I shall afterwards refer) have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to value the tramway lines upon the basis of rental, without making allowance for profits.

"I therefore come to the conclusion that the provision that no allowance is to be made for profits means that in valuing the tramway the referee is not to take into consideration, either directly or indirectly, past or future profits.

"Something was also said as to the inequity of taking from the company the right to use the tramways, without paying them for that right. Such considerations do not go far in construing an Act of Parliament, but I confess that I do not appreciate the alleged inequity. For the convenience of the public a tramway company which has obtained a provisional order is allowed to take the use of the public streets without paying anything for that use. But the Act gave to the local authority in whom the streets were vested right to acquire the undertaking of the tramway company at the end of twenty-one years, and I do not see anything inequitable in the Legislature providing, that upon condition of the local authority paying the tramway company for everything which had cost them money, the right of use, for which the tramway company had paid nothing, should pass to the local authority without price.

"The company further called in aid of their argument the 41st and 42d sections, which provide that in the event of a tramway company discontinuing the working of the tramway, or becoming insolvent, 'the powers' of the tramway company shall, upon an order by the Board of Trade, 'cease and determine unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided.' What the local authority may purchase under these sections is 'the powers' of the tramway company, and the purchase is to be made in manner provided by the 43d section. The company therefore argued that the 43d section must include the purchase of the 'powers' of the tramway company. I assume that the purchase authorised by the 43d section does include the powers of the tramway company, because it is the purchase of the undertaking, but it does not necessarily follow (it depends upon the enactment) that compensation for the loss of the powers is to be included in the price. Further, although I do not think that the meaning of the 41st and 42d sections is doubtful, it seems to me that the phraseology is unfortunate. To purchase the powers would be of little benefit to the local authority unless they could also purchase the tramways. If, instead of 'powers,' the word 'undertaking' had been used in the 41st and 42d sections, it seems to me that the object in view would have been more clearly expressed.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to compensation for the loss of the exclusive right to use the tramway, nor to have the value of the tramway ascertained according to its rental value. In my opinion they are

No. 131. company had in the streets, viz., an exclusive right to use them for flange wheel traffic. That right was given to the company in permanence, not only for twenty-one years, subject only to the right of the corporation to only entitled to the value of the tramway as a completed tramway, ready and fit for immediate use; or (to adopt the language used in the case of Stockton and Middlesborough Water Board v. Kirkleatham Local Board, L. R., App. Ca. [1893], p. 444, to which I shall presently refer), the value of the tramway 'regarded as plant in situ capable of earning a profit.'

"The case of Stockton and Middlesborough Water Board, to which I have just referred, arose in the following circumstances:—

"Prior to 1876 the Stockton and Middlesborough Water-Works Company had the right to supply with water Stockton and Middlesborough, and also a number of other places, and among them Kirkleatham. In 1876 the Stockton and Middlesborough Corporations Water-Works Act was passed, which, upon the narrative that it was expedient that the undertaking of the Water-Works Company should be vested in the corporations of Stockton and Middlesborough, enacted that the company should 'sell to the corporations their undertaking, property, rights, powers, and privileges.' The consideration for the sale was to be perpetual annuities to the amount of the maximum statutory dividend of the company, or, in the option of the company, a sum representing twenty-five years' purchase of the dividend. The corporations were also to pay and take over the debts and liabilities of the company, and to pay the company a sum for compulsory sale, and for the prospective value of the company's undertaking.

"The Act also provided that the joint board, which in terms of the Act, was elected to represent the corporations, should, when so required by the sanitary authorities of certain districts, 'sell to such sanitary authority all mains, pipes, and fittings . . . belonging to the joint board within that district . . . at a price to be fixed, in default of agreement, by an arbitrator, and after such sale the joint board shall cease to supply water within such district.'

"Kirkleatham was one of the districts the sanitary authority of which was entitled to require a sale by the joint board in terms of the enactment which I have quoted. The sanitary authority of Kirkleatham was, prior to 1876, under the Public Health Act, 1875 (section 52), deprived of the power to construct water-works within the limits of supply of the Stockton and Middlesborough Company, if and so long as that company was willing to give a reasonable supply at the statutory rate.

"The Kirkleatham sanitary authority in 1891 required the joint board to sell to them the mains, pipes, and fittings within the district of Kirkleatham, and the question of price was referred to an arbitrator.

"Two views were submitted to the arbitrator as to the method of valuation, or rather the subject to be valued. The joint board maintained that the value of the mains, pipes, and fittings was to be ascertained not only by the cost of construction, but by the revenue which the joint board was enabled to earn by their means. The sanitary authority on the other hand contended that the board was only entitled to the value of the mains, pipes, and fittings regarded as plant in situ, capable of earning a profit.

"The arbitrator adopted the former of these views, but it was held by the House of Lords, affirming the judgment of the Appeal Court, that he was wrong in doing so, and that the basis of valuation proposed by the sanitary authority was the sound basis in terms of the Act.

"Of course the construction put upon one Act of Parliament is not an authority for the construction of another Act, unless the words used are practically identical, but the principles upon which the Kirkleatham case was decided appear to me to apply to that which I am now considering. Indeed it seems to me that in some respects the considerations in favour of including in the valuation an allowance for the revenue, which the joint board was enabled to earn by means of the pipes, were stronger than those urged by the company for a similar allowance being made in this case. Because (1) the joint board had actually paid, when they purchased from the water company, for the right to buy them out.¹ The right had been treated as a perpetuity in questions of assessment, tramways being regarded as lands and heritages in the supply water; and (2) the Act only said that the sanitary authority was to take over the pipes at 'a price' to be fixed by an arbitrator, without providing, as the Tramways Act does, that no allowance should be made for the profits or for compulsory sale.

Magistrates of Edinburgh.

"No doubt the Tramways Act provides that the 'undertaking' shall be sold to the local authority, whereas in the Kirkleatham case the Act only provided that the 'mains, pipes, and fittings' should be sold to the sanitary authority. But, as I have already said, it appears to me that the important part of the Tramways Act is that which deals with the price which the local authority shall pay, and if the two cases are regarded from that point of view they are almost identical. In the Kirkleatham case the joint board was to be deprived of its undertaking upon receiving the price of the mains, pipes, and fittings, while under the Tramways Act the promoters are to be deprived of their undertaking upon receiving payment of the then value (exclusive of any allowance for profits) of the tramway, buildings, &c.

"It was said, however, that there was this material difference between the Kirkleatham case and the present, namely, that the Kirkleatham sanitary authority had right to supply water to the district under the Public Health Act, and therefore only required to buy the pipes, whereas here the local authority had no right of user except under the purchase, and therefore required to buy both the tramways and the right to use them. Now assuming that the sanitary authority had power to bring in a water supply for the district, the joint board had also right to supply it with water. That right must have been worth something, especially as the joint board were in possession, had mains and pipes in situ, and were actually supplying water. Yet the statute, as construed by the House of Lords, took that right from them without any compensation whatever. Again, it is not the case that the local authority here only acquire the right to use the tramways by virtue of the purchase, because the 43d section, after providing what price is to be paid, enacts, 'and when any such sale has been made all the rights, powers, and authorities of such promoters in respect of the undertaking sold, . . . shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by the local authority.'

"I therefore regard the judgment of the House of Lords in the Kirkleatham case as having a very direct bearing upon the present case.

"The only remaining question is, whether the referee has adopted the principle of valuation of the tramway directed by the Act as I have interpreted it. I think that he has. He has allowed the cost of construction, less depreciation, he has taken into account that the tramways are successfully constructed and in complete working order, and he has further made allowance for the sums expended by the company in obtaining parliamentary authority, and in widening the North Bridge to enable a double line of rails to be laid across it. The company contended that the referee in making the latter allowances, while refusing to allow anything for the sale of the exclusive right to use the tramways, acted inconsistently. I do not think so. The referee has proceeded upon the footing of giving to the company the value of everything which has cost them money, in so far as the same is available to the corporation, and that, as I have said, appears to me to be what the statute directs.

"I was referred to a judgment given in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in England in a similar question between the London County Council and the London Street Tramways Company. In that case Matthew and Collins, J. J., set aside an award of Sir Frederick Bramwell, the referee appointed by the Board of Trade. Sir Frederick had only allowed to the tramway company the cost of construction of the tramway less depreciation. In so far as he did not take into consideration the fact that the tramways were completed and capable of being immediately worked, I agree that the award was wrong; but in so far as the learned Judges of the Divisional Court held that

No. 131. sense of the Poor Law Act.¹ The Toronto Street Railway Company's case² was distinguished from the present by the fact that there the right to use the tramway rails was vested in the corporation prior to the date of the sale. In the 43d section of the Act what was to be paid for, i.e., the tramway, was equivalent to the undertaking of the company which was to be sold compulsorily. The word "tramway" was broad enough to cover "undertaking," and was used in other parts of the statute in that sense. There was no interpretation clause in the Tramways Act of 1870, but in the interpretation clause of the company's special Act, "tramway" was interpreted (sec. 3) to mean "the tramways and works and undertaking by this Act authorised." That interpretation was imported into the general Act. Now, in valuing the "then value" of the "undertaking," the arbiter had only allowed the cost of the tramway, less depreciation, but "then value" must include more than that, otherwise the statute need not have excluded any allowance for "past and future profits." The obvious meaning was that the corporation were to pay the value of the tramways as lettable subjects. The arbiter was only to look at the lettable value at the date of the sale, and not to allow for loss of profit on the basis of profits earned in the past and estimated as to be earned in the future. Rent must be paid or allowed for upon any subject before profit could be ascertained, and the arbiter was bound to take the rent at which the subjects would let into consideration. This view had been given effect to in England.³ The Kirkleatham case⁴ was not in point, as what was bought in that case were the mains and pipes, but not the right to supply water which had been previously possessed by the local authority.

Argued for the defenders ;—What the pursuers had under their Acts was an exclusive right to lay tramway lines, and to use them for flange wheel traffic. The company had no doubt an absolute property in the stables, &c., used by them in their undertaking, but their right of exclusive use of the lines was limited to twenty-one years, or at least subject to defeasance at that time. That that was only a right for a term of years had been expressly settled in the Toronto Street Railway Company's case ([1893] App. Cas. 511). Craig's case (1 R. 947) turned solely on the meaning of the word "owner" in the Poor-Law Act, and did not touch the present question. As regarded the interpretation of section 43, it was to be noticed that the first part of the section stated upon what terms the actual plant and other heritable subjects were to be acquired, while the second dealt with the right of the corporation to use the subjects acquired. The question was, were the company entitled to compensation for the loss of their right to rent. That depended on the words of the Act. Now, "undertaking" in the section could only relate to physical subjects, because the corporation could only buy what was locally situated within the rental value was the basis upon which the tramways should have been valued, I must, for the reasons which I have given, respectfully dissent from the judgment.

"I shall therefore assoilzie the corporation in the actions of declarator and reduction, and refuse the note of suspension and interdict."

the city, &c. Again, "then value" might have various meanings, either break-up value or rental value, or (the meaning adopted by the arbiter) the value of the plant, it being in situ, and capable of being immediately worked for traffic. Then if "tramway" in the section was equivalent to "undertaking" the enumeration of lands, buildings, &c., which followed was needless, and the second part of the section would also be useless, because the first would then have included the right of user. But the word "tramway" did not mean "undertaking." The word as used in the general Act of 1870 could not be interpreted by means of the interpretation clause of a subsequent incorporating statute, and, besides, the word in one case was "tramway," and in the other "tramways." The enumeration of tramway, lands, buildings, &c., was necessary, because there were two classes of subjects sold,—one, subjects of which the company had actual possession, the other, subjects in which they only had a right of user. Any allowance for past or future profits was excluded, and that necessarily excluded an estimate of past or future profits, on which alone rental value could be computed. "Past and future profits" exhausted all possible profits, and therefore all reference to profits was illegal. The right to work the tramway after it had been acquired was not derived from the sellers, but directly from the Legislature, and was separately given by the latter part of the section. The decision in the London County Council case was wrong, and the present case fell within the rule of the Kirkleatham case ([1893] A. C. 444). The section there interpreted was practically identical with the present, but this case was even stronger, as in the Kirkleatham case there were no words such as there were here excluding any allowance for profits, and the seller there had paid for the right to supply water, which right was being taken from him, while here the company had paid nothing for the right of use of the streets.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question at issue in this case arises out of the purchase by the defenders of so much of the undertaking of the pursuers as lies within the district of which they are the local authority.

The undertaking embraced not only the tramway lines, lands, and other material subjects acquired by the pursuers for the purposes of the undertaking, but also the monopoly of using the tramway lines, and the right of exacting tolls, which had been conferred by Parliament. The purchase is a compulsory purchase by the defenders, under powers contained in the Tramways Act, 1870, under the terms and conditions set forth in the 43d section of the Act.

As I have said, the subject of the sale was so much of the undertaking of the pursuers as lay within the district of which the defenders are the local authority. The price which the defenders are to pay for it is defined by the Act as the value of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters (that is, the pursuers) suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district, exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever, such value in case of difference of opinion to be determined by a referee to be nominated by the Board of Trade. Now, it will be observed that it is not the undertaking that is to be valued, as one would perhaps naturally expect, but it is certain enumerated subjects which are to be valued for the purpose of ascertaining the price which is to be paid for the undertaking.

It was argued before us that the word "tramway" in this enumeration must be read as "the undertaking." But in this Act which we are construing there is nothing in the interpretation clause, as there is in the private Act, with which we are not at present concerned, which says that tramways may mean the tramways and works and undertaking authorised. But even if there were, I think it could not be so construed here, because in that case it would necessarily include lands, buildings, and others which are specifically enumerated, and render these words altogether superfluous and insensible, and I agree therefore with the Lord Ordinary that a construction of the Act which leads to that result cannot be accepted. I think that "tramway" here means tramway line, a sense in which it is certainly used in the two immediately preceding sections—the 41st and 42d. I think, therefore, that it was the duty of the referee to value the tramway line as a separate subject, just as he is directed to value the lands, buildings, and other specific articles enumerated in the clause. But it is said that if this be so, no value will be put on, and therefore no price paid for, the monopoly of the use of the tramway lines and the right to levy tolls, which are valuable parts of the undertaking, and that the Legislature could never have intended to deprive the promoters of a part of their property without being paid for it.

It is to be kept in view, however, that the Legislature was dealing with a very peculiar subject. The promoters never acquired any exclusive right to use the tramways in perpetuity. All that they acquired was an absolute right to the use of the tramways for a period of twenty-one years certain, modified, however, by the agreements set forth in the first schedule appended to the private Act. They knew when they entered on their undertaking that it was in the power of the defenders, the local authority, to terminate by notice their exclusive use at the end of that time, or at the end of any succeeding period of seven years. Moreover, it is to be remembered that the only possible purchasers were the local authority, who, as owners of the tramways, were in quite a different position from the promoters. The local authority were themselves the owners of the streets on which the tramway lines lay, and I can quite understand that the Legislature considered that when they became owners of the tramways they should not be called upon to pay for the right of using the streets, which were their own property, in this particular way, for the benefit of the inhabitants, and that it was sufficient that the pursuers should be paid for the material subjects which had cost them money, but that they should not be paid for these powers which had cost them nothing. But however that may be, the whole matter is statutory, and I think that the direction of the statute is clear as to the subjects which alone are to be valued in order to fix the price to be paid by the local authority.

It will be observed that the matters which the referee was directed to value were not certain selected articles, but everything that made the tramways a profit-earning subject, and I think that the referee, seeing that this was a compulsory and not a voluntary sale, would, in the absence of directions to the contrary, have been entitled in estimating the value of the subjects to add an allowance for loss of profits in respect of the pursuers being deprived of a profit-earning subject, just as he would have been entitled to add a percentage or allowance for compulsory sale. Therefore I think the clause introduced in the parenthesis, to the effect that the value put on the subjects should be exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever, was necessary, if it was, as I think it was, the intention of the Legislature that all question of profits should be excluded from the consideration of the referee. No. 131.

That this was the construction put upon the Act both by the pursuers and defenders appears from the 14th section of the agreement entered into between them when the undertaking was authorised by Parliament, and which is set forth in the first schedule appended to the Act, and which is made part of the Act. By that section the defenders are empowered to require the pursuers at the expiry of seven years to sell their undertaking to them, which they are bound to do, upon the terms of paying the then value of the tramway and all lands and others, just as in the 43d section of the statute; but in this case there is no exclusion of an allowance for compulsory sale or for past or future profits. The parties evidently assumed that the terms of this clause would not exclude an award for the loss of future profits, but that such an allowance would be made, because by the 17th section of the agreement they specify the limits within which such an award is to be confined. That section provides that the allowance for past and future profits, including compulsory sale, and every other consideration whatever, should not be less than 10 per cent nor more than 12½ per cent on the expended capital of the company for the period to elapse between the date of the purchase and the expiry of twenty-one years from the time the promoters were empowered to construct the tramway. It is significant that such allowances were to terminate at the end of twenty-one years, that being the period with which we are now dealing.

But it was further said that the ordinary and well-recognised mode of estimating the value of such an undertaking as this was by rental value, and no doubt that is so. The task, however, set to the referee in this case was not, as I have said, to value the undertaking as a whole, but certain material subjects which were part of it. But however that may be, it is clear that the rental value could not be arrived at in this case in the ordinary and recognised way. That is, as I understand, by taking into consideration, inter alia, the past, present, and probable future profits, with a view to ascertaining the true rental value; but if the referee is prohibited from making any allowance for past or future profits, he is prohibited, it appears to me, from taking these elements into consideration in fixing the value. But these are the main elements which determine the rental value, and how that value can possibly be arrived at without taking them into consideration I fail to see.

It was further maintained that the fact that the referee is prohibited from making any allowance for past and future profits shews that rental value or a consideration of profits was to be the rule of the valuation, as otherwise there would be no meaning in the exclusion of past and future profits. I think, however, that such an allowance is excluded only in the sense that it is not to be added to the amount of the valuation otherwise arrived at. That is certainly the meaning of the clause as regards the allowance for compulsory sale, which is equally excluded.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well founded, and I concur generally in the grounds of judgment as stated in his Lordship's opinion.

I understand the 43d section of the Tramways Act, 1870, as making a conditional contract of sale between the "promoters" of any tramway company which may come into existence, and the "local authority" of the district within which the "undertaking" is locally situated.

The subject of sale is to be the undertaking; the condition is that a notice and requisition to the promoters to sell shall be given by the local authority, and the price to be paid is defined as the "then value," or, we may now say, the present value "of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, material and plant of the promoters, suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district," exclusive of certain things which I shall presently consider.

The question relates to the ascertainment of the price—whether the price to be paid by the local authority is the value of the corporeal subjects described considered as plant in situ capable of earning a profit, or whether the price is to be ascertained on the principle that the tramway company is selling a revenue-earning right, and by fixing its value at so many years' purchase of a hypothetical rental.

1. It is worth noticing (though the use of the term may be accidental) that throughout this section the sellers are called the "promoters"; and this indicates to my mind that attention is called to the fact that the section is not imposing terms of compulsory sale upon existing companies, but is making a contract of sale which is to be a condition of the powers given to any new company that may be formed, and the terms of which must be accepted by its promoters as a part of the consideration for the powers which they propose to obtain from Parliament.

2. The statutory contract of sale is a sale of the company's undertaking, but the price to be paid by the local authority is not described as the value of the "undertaking," but as the value of "the tramway, and all lands," &c. It was argued to us that the expression "the tramway" means the undertaking; but even according to the definition clause of the local Act founded on, that meaning is only attributed to "tramways" (in the plural), and this is consistent with a known use of language in which the plural form of a word may have a generalised meaning if the context be consistent with such a meaning. If "tramway" in the singular means the undertaking, it is difficult to see what separable meaning can be attached to the enumeration of subjects which follow that word. But I think that "tramway" in the expression quoted means only the corporeal subject, or tramway line, consisting of rails, points, and their supports in situ. This tramway line I take to be one of the assemblage of things enumerated, the aggregate value of which, when ascertained by arbitration, is to constitute the price of the transfer of the undertaking to the local authority.

3. I next consider the words which in the printed Act of Parliament are put within brackets, and which I do not here repeat. Their purport is to exclude certain possible elements of value. It was argued that the words of exclusion applicable to past and future profits would not have the effect of preventing the referee from taking into account present profits at the time of the statutory sale. But as it seems to me there could be no reason for excluding inquiry as to profits realised in the past or expected in the future, except for the purpose of excluding profits as an element in the present value. Again, it was suggested that valuation on the basis of rental does not necessarily include the element of "allowance" for profits, because in the method of valuation proposed the gross revenue is to be first ascertained, and then a sum is to be subtracted under the name of profits in order to arrive at rental value. But then there are also the words exclusive of "any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever," and I cannot help thinking that revenue is one of the other "considerations" which are not to be taken into account for the purpose of determining the value. Of course, if I am right in construing the word "value," and the words which it governs, as being equivalent to a direction to value the assemblage of the corporeal subjects in situ, the exclusion of profits in the sense in which I read it would naturally follow, and the whole clause or description of the terms of sale would be consistent, because the valuation to be made is a valuation into which neither gross nor net profits would enter as an element. I have difficulty in seeing how, under the method of valuation based on rental, effect can be given to the statutory direction to exclude any allowance for past or future profits, because it seems to me that the hypothetical rental which the referee would have to determine is really a species of profit. It is the return which the company would get by letting the subject, and this would be greater or less according to the success of the undertaking, which seems to me to be the true criterion of profit as distinguished from interest of money or fixed return.

4. I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is supported by the decision of the House of Lords in the Kirkleatham case, L. R., 1893, App. Cases, 444, although the terms of the enactments in the two cases are not identical. The chief difference in the enactments is that in the Kirkleatham case the thing to be determined is the "price" of the corporeal subjects, while here the word used is "value," though there is also a difference as to the description of subjects enumerated. Now, I do not agree with the argument that the word "value" has a fixed meaning in an Act of Parliament, and is always identical with rating value. I do not doubt that for rating purposes the value of the undertaking of this tramway company would properly be estimated on the basis of rental; but then the value referred to in this statute is not expressed to be the value of the undertaking, but (as I think), of the corporeal subjects enumerated, and therefore, as I think, rental value is not applicable. I think that what is meant in this Act of Parliament is the exchangeable value of the subjects specified, or the value to the purchaser, as it is put in the Kirkleatham case.

5. I have carefully considered the opinions of the learned Judges who decided the case of The London Tramways v. The County Council. As I have formed a different opinion on the question, I should not think it proper to discuss their Lordships' judgments, or to enter upon the subject at all, except to say that I agree with Mr Justice Collins in thinking that we are not concerned to inquire whether either of the methods of valuation offers adequate compensation to the company. But I may point out that tramway companies are enabled to earn their profits by the use of the public streets in a way peculiar to their traffic, for which I understand no consideration is paid; and one effect of the statutory notice to purchase on the expiration of the term of twenty-one years is, that this qualified right of use of the public streets ceases, or reverts to the local authority. This may be one of the reasons why the Legislature made these special provisions for valuing the tramway property on a different principle from that which would be thought proper in case of a transference from one company or mercantile undertaking to another. But I do not consider at all whether the method of valuation preferred by the referee is equitable or adequate. It appears to me, on the best consideration I am able to give to the question, to be in accordance with the requirements of the Act of Parliament.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in the opinions delivered by your Lordships.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The leading proposition in the enactment which we have to construe is, that in a certain event the promoters shall sell their undertaking to the local authority.

Much has been said of the limited nature of the right of the tramway company under the statute. It is said that their right to the tramway being conferred by this statute and being terminable as under this section, they are not to be regarded, or rather it is not to be expected that the Legislature would regard them as ordinary owners. To that the plain answer is to be found in the words of section 43. Having to describe what I quite agree is the termination of the tramway's rights to the tramway, and the terms on which it is to be effected, Parliament states the transaction as being a sale. It might quite well have done otherwise—might have declared the right of the company to be terminated, and the compensation to be payable on a specified scale. To say that this is a mere question of language is precisely to point out the significance of the choice of language actually made.

This is then a sale, and a sale of what? Of the undertaking; the transaction contemplated is a sale of a living undertaking—the transfer by sale of a going concern. This is what, on the theory of the section, the corporation get and the company give.

Now, of course, the words upon which I have hitherto commented are not those which immediately and primarily are before us. The words immediately before us are those which state the terms upon which the transaction takes place. But I own to thinking it important, in construing the terms, to realise what is the transaction of which these are the terms; or rather, what is the mode in which the Legislature describes the transaction for the purpose of stating the terms. This being asserted by Parliament to be a sale of an undertaking, it seems to me most legitimate to adopt that construction of any ambiguous description of the terms which best accords with the nature of a sale of an undertaking.

It is of course true that (apart from the parenthesis) the section when it states the terms does not say that there shall be payment of the value of the undertaking, but proceeds by way of enumerating various assets of the company, the principal of which is the tramway. This method seems to have been adopted to cover the case dealt with by the section—of an undertaking overlapping the bounds of the purchasing local authority, in which event only part of the undertaking is bought; it clearly and distributively applies to the several parts of the undertaking the process of selection by which only such things, but all such things, are to be valued as are useful for a body whose operations are limited to its own district.

Well, then, among the things enumerated is the tramway. Now, of the word tramway (the singular) there is no definition either in the general or the local statute. Its meaning therefore must be its ordinary meaning in relation to the context. Now, the proper way to read the section is surely in the first instance to miss out the parenthesis (inasmuch as it purports to state an exclusion), so as to understand from what it is that the exclusion is made. If so, then we find that the consideration for the sale of this undertaking is to be the value of certain specified things, and, first of all, the tramway. What, then, is "the then value of the tramway"? No. 131.

I suppose if any man of business, not to say man of sense, were asked what was the value of any stated thing at any given time, he would rejoin by inquiring what was it then used for. To this inquiry, made regarding any tramway at the date of a notice under this section, the answer must be,—Carrying passengers over it for hire. The profit over the outlay on this operation was its value. Nobody can make any use of a tramway but this; and if you demur that I am assuming that I have a right to run over it, the reply must be that if I have none, the thing has no value at all, and the hypothesis of the inquiry, that it has a value, is upset. The only qualification to the statement that the thing would have no value is, that it would have the value of old metal; but then this theory is rejected by the Corporation of Edinburgh, who think it is to be valued as an established tramway, only one of which no use could be made at the moment in question. Now, I pause to say that (doing as I am going to do, full justice to the plausibility of their argument so far as it is founded upon the parenthesis) I consider their view, applied to the words without the parenthesis, to be an impossible view. In the Kirkleatham case that construction was manifestly right; in the present case, reading the whole section (parenthesis and all), even if I did not know that it has been adopted by the Lord Ordinary and the majority of this Court, I should consider it a tenable conclusion; but if section 43 be read (in the meantime and for the sake of argument) without the parenthesis, I do not think this construction tenable. The words are "the then value of the tramway." I say the then value is determined by the then use; and the then use was, in fact and in the contemplation of the section, that which I have stated.

And now I take the parenthesis into account. It is expressed as a qualification or explanation of the words in which it is interpolated. Neither party to the controversy is able to say that these words are specially well adapted to express the result which he maintains. The contention of the corporation seems to me exposed to the grave objection that it allows words having a subordinate and qualifying position to kill the plain import of the main proposition to which they relate, and does so by ascribing to those words more meaning than prima facie they bear. I cannot conceive why the Legislature should describe the transaction as a sale, and say the terms are to be the payment of the existing value of the tramway, &c., and then, incidentally and by way of exclusion, put in words which make the terms inconsistent with sale and purchase, and inconsistent also with payment of existing value. No such result is, in my opinion, necessary. The words "past or future" in the parenthesis are, I think, clearly suggested by the "then" which goes before; they emphasise present value by excluding allowance for past and future value. It is the existing state of things at the moment of the notice to sell that is to be the standard of valuation; neither the history of the past nor the anticipation of the future is to be made the ground of any separate "allowance." This leaves untouched the usual, and as far as I know, the only rational way of ascertaining value, which is the consideration of use and resulting profit. It seems to me that this construction satisfies the words on which the controversy turns, gives them their natural sense, and keeps them in their proper place. On the other hand, the defenders seem to me to commit a cardinal error of construction even

No. 131. within the parenthesis itself, for they give no effect whatever to the words "past or future." Indeed, their argument was that "past and future profits" is merely "profits" writ large—for this reason, that time is exhaustively divided into past and future, and the present is merely a dividing line between the two. This is, of course, a profound and impressive truth, but there are times and places for everything, and I should hardly have thought a Tramway Act exactly the occasion which Parliament would choose for teaching business men metaphysics unawares—more especially as this statute applies to England as well as to Scotland. If the Act had meant that profits were not to be looked at at all, it would have said so; and it would not have said so in a parenthesis to a plain direction that the present value of a tramway at present in use is to be paid for the purchase of the undertaking of which it is part.

Edinburgh.

The defenders have relied on the Kirkleatham case. It seems to me to form a complete contrast to the present case. In Kirkleatham there was no sale of the undertaking, for the best of reasons—the local authority did not require it. The only things directed to be sold were the mains, pipes, and fittings; and what had got to be paid was their own value. This being so, the structure of the section construed in the Kirkleatham case was as different from that now under consideration as were the things transferred and the theory of transference.

My opinion on the section before us is in accordance with the judgment of the Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice in England. As I differ from your Lordships, I have thought it proper to write this opinion. I should otherwise have been content to express my general concurrence in the views of Mr Justice Matthew and Mr Justice Henn Collins.

Succession—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.—The presumption is that a settlement which makes no provision for children nascituri is revoked on the birth of a child to the testator after the date of the settlement, although he had children at its date.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

THOMAS ELDER, wine and spirit merchant in Glasgow, died on 24th October 1891, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 26th March 1886. By this settlement he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, after making payment of certain small legacies, to hold the residue for behoof of his daughters, Elizabeth, Martha, and Margaret in liferent, and their issue in fee. The settlement contained no provision for children of the testator nascituri.

The testator had been twice married, and had had in all four children. Of the daughters mentioned in the settlement two, Elizabeth (Mrs Reid), and Martha (Mrs Lockhart), were born of the first marriage—Martha, the younger, having been born in 1860; Margaret, the remaining daughter mentioned in the settlement, was born of the second marriage (which took place in 1879) on 11th December 1885. After the date of the settlement a son, Thomas, was born to the testator on 18th December 1890, about ten months before his father's death. All the testator's children, and his second wife, survived him. She had entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage with her husband under which, in return for a provision, she discharged her legal rights. This marriage-contract made no provision for children. No. 132.

Elder's Trustees v. Elder.

On 19th April 1893 Mr Elder's trustees brought an action of multipointing in order, inter alia, to have the rights of the testator's son in the property left by his father determined.

Mrs Blair or Elder, the testator's widow, as tutor of her pupil son, claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole heritable property of the deceased, with the revenues that had accrued therefrom since his death. There followed certain alternative claims not necessary to be here specified. She averred (cond. 2) a variety of circumstances to shew that the testator intended his son to take the heritable property, and that he believed his settlement to have been revoked in consequence of the birth of his son; and she further averred that he had expressed his intention and belief to that effect to several persons named. She pleaded,—“(1) In respect of the birth of the said Thomas Elder, and in the circumstances stated, the trust-disposition and settlement mentioned in the condescendence must be held to have been and were revoked, and the said Thomas Elder, as his father's heir ab intestato, is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of the first alternative of the claim.”

The trustees claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, to be held and administered by them in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement.

Mrs Reid and Mrs Lockhart, the testator's daughters by his first marriage, claimed to be ranked and preferred to the liferent of one-third each of the fund in medio, after deducting the legitim due to their brother, and subject to the administration of the trustees.

It appeared that the testator left heritable estate to the value of over £10,000, and moveable estate to the value of over £14,000. The greater part of the moveable estate consisted of bonds and dispositions in security, so that the legitim fund did not amount to more than £2000, giving about £500 to each child who might claim legitim.

On 10th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Allows to the claimant, Mrs Margaret Blair or Elder, a proof of her averments in article 2d of her condescendence, and to the other claimants a conjunct probation.”*

* “OPINION.—The question of law which is raised in this case is, whether a general settlement made by a father in favour of children in existence at the date of the settlement nominatim can be revoked by the subsequent birth of a child, whose birth the father survived only for a short time.

“It was argued, on the one hand, that the principles embodied in the maxim si testator sine liberis decesserit, may apply to such a case just as strongly as to the case of a settlement made in favour of strangers before any children have come into existence. On the other hand, it was contended that implied revocation by the birth of children was confined, as the words of the maxim shewed, to the case of a will made by a person who had no children at the time when it was executed.

“So far as I know, all the cases in Scotland in which the application of the conditio has been in question have been cases where the settlement was made when there were no children in existence, and therefore it is necessary to consider whether the principle upon which these decisions proceeded is applicable to such a case as the present.

“The decisions appear to me to have proceeded upon presumed intention. Where the position of the testator has been entirely changed, and new moral

The trustees and the claimants Mrs Reid and Mrs Lockhart reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof ought to be recalled. If, as the Lord Ordinary had held, the presumption was in favour of the application of the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit, a proof was unnecessary. But the conditio applied only in cases where the testator had no children at the date of the settlement; it could not be pleaded by a post-natus against children provided for under the will. In the case of Oliphant,¹ the claim of a post-natus was sustained to a share of a bond of provision destined to two children nominatim; but obligations have come into existence by the birth of children, there is a strong presumption that a settlement which amounts to a disinheritance of the children no longer expresses the intention of the testator. I see no reason in principle why the presumption should not also apply (unless, of course, the circumstances of the case preclude it) in favour of a child or children born after the date of a settlement making provision for children in existence at its date. Indeed, the fact of such a settlement having been made seems to me to be rather in favour of the presumption, because it shews that the father was alive to and desirous of fulfilling the duty of providing for his children.

"In the civil law it appears that if a child was not expressly instituted or expressly disinherited the testament was held to be ineffectual—Inst. lib. 2, tit. 13.

"Again, in England, prior to the Wills Act of 1838 (which seems to have practically put an end to such questions by providing that every will shall be revoked by marriage, and that no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention, on the ground of an alteration in circumstances), it was more than once decided that the will of a married man having several children was revoked by the subsequent birth of other children unprovided for. I may specially refer to the case of Johnston v. Johnston, 1 Phil. 447, in which Sir John Nicholl, in a very elaborate judgment, deals with the law of implied revocation of a will by the subsequent birth of children.

"I am therefore of opinion that the presumption is applicable to such a case as the present, unless it is excluded by the special circumstances.

"Prima facie, the circumstances of the present case are favourable for the application of the presumption.

"The testator was twice married. By his first marriage he had two daughters, the youngest of whom was born in 1860. In 1879 the testator married a second time, and there was no issue of that marriage until 1885, when a daughter was born. It was not until the 18th December 1890 that a son, in whose favour the presumption is now pleaded, was born. The testator died on 24th October 1891.

"The settlement was made in March 1886, a few months after the birth of the first child of the second marriage. After bequeathing a few legacies of inconsiderable amount, the testator directed his trustees to hold the whole residue of his estate for his three daughters, equally among them in life, and for their children in fee.

"In such circumstances, it seems to me that the presumption is that the testator did not intend to leave his son wholly unprovided for, except to the extent of the few hundreds of pounds which represent his share of legitim, and I am inclined to think that the question might have been disposed of upon the admitted facts. The son's guardian, however, did not ask me to dispose finally of the question now, but to allow her a proof of her averments. The motion for proof was only opposed because it was argued that whatever were the facts the conditio did not apply to the case. As I am of opinion that that argument is not well founded, and as it is desirable that all the circumstances should be before the Court, I shall allow a proof of the averments in article 2 of the concordance for Mrs Elder as guardian of her pupil son."

Oliphant's case could not now be regarded as an authority,¹ and there was no instance of a settlement being held as revoked in consequence of the birth of a child when the testator had children in existence at the date of the settlement, while there were cases in which settlements might have been attacked on this ground but were not.² The law of England was not the same as the law of Scotland on this point, nor was it as the Lord Ordinary had stated it.³ Johnston's case, cited by the Lord Ordinary, was not mentioned by Jarman. If, therefore, the conditio in its nature could not include a case like the present, a proof was incompetent, for no matter what was proved the legal position of the reclaimers would remain unaffected. But (2) in any case, the averments of the respondent could not be admitted to probation, since they involved the proof of a will for the testator by parole in contradiction of his written will.

Elder's Trustees v. Elder.

Argued for the respondent ;—Even if the case of the son here was not within the literal terms of the conditio, in principle the conditio applied. It was not easy to give any intelligible ground for distinguishing between the case of a child born after the date of the will to a testator who had no children at its date and the case of a child born after the date of the will to a testator who at the date of the will had children. The principle upon which the conditio was held to be applicable in the former class of cases was that a testator was not to be presumed to have intended to disinherit his unborn children,⁴ and in reason the position of a post-natus was the same whether his father had children in existence at the date of the will or was then childless. The question whether the conditio applied in any particular case was one of circumstances.⁵ Hence parole evidence was competent. Such evidence was tendered, not to construe the will, but to determine whether the deed was the will of the deceased, or had been revoked.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The late Mr Elder was twice married. By his first marriage he had two daughters, Mrs Reid and Mrs Lockhart, who are claimants in this multipointing.

He married a second time in 1879, and by this marriage he had two children, a daughter Margaret, born on 11th December 1885, and a son Thomas, born on 18th December 1890. Mr Elder died on 24th October 1891, about ten months after the birth of his son Thomas.

On 26th March 1886, a few months after the birth of his daughter Margaret, he executed a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of trustees, who are the present pursuers and claimants, by which he conveyed to them his whole estate, heritable and moveable.

By this settlement, after providing for the payment of some small legacies and annuities, he directed the residue of his estate to be equally divided among his three daughters. He made no provision for children nascituri.

The first question raised by this reclaiming note is whether this settlement was revoked by the subsequent birth of his son Thomas.

Mar. 16, 1894.
Elder's Trustees v. Elder.

It cannot be disputed that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit has been adopted in the law of Scotland, but it was argued that that was only in a question with strangers, and did not apply to a case like the present, where the testator had children in existence at the date of the will, and had provided for them therein.

We were not referred to any case in which the matter had been the subject of discussion in the law of Scotland.

It is clear, however, that in the civil law, from which the condition was derived, it applies whether previously born children were in existence or not at the time when the will was made, and that the subsequent birth of a child revoked the will. It also appears, as has been pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, that in the law of England, which also adopted the conditio si sine liberis, it was applied equally whether there were other children in existence or not.

I see no reason to doubt that that is also the law of Scotland. It is the duty of a father to provide for his children, and the law presumes that he must intend to do so, and therefore if there be a will in existence which has the effect of disinheriting subsequently born children, the presumption is that it was not his intention that the will should continue valid. But it appears to me that the presumption applies equally in the case of all children, and if the effect of a will is to leave any subsequently born child unprovided for, the presumption is that the father did not intend that the will should continue in force. I therefore concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there is no reason why the conditio should not apply in a question with other children, as in a question with strangers.

The next question raised by the interlocutor is whether a proof should be allowed to Mrs Elder of her averments in article 2 of her condescendence. She desires to have this proof in order to shew that the testator understood that the will had been revoked and acted on that footing.

It appears to me that while we have adopted the principle of the conditio from the law of Rome, we have not adopted it to the same extent and effect. By that law it was regarded as an implied condition of the will, and therefore the birth of a child eo ipso revoked the settlement. But that does not appear to be the law of Scotland. In the recent case of Millar's Trustees v. Millar, 20 R. 1040, the Court held that whether revocation of a will by the subsequent birth of a child was to be implied or not was entirely a question of circumstances. That being so, it appears to me that the birth of a child affords only a presumptio juris that the testator does not thereafter intend the will to remain valid.

That presumption will be of varying force according to the circumstances of the case, and may, like any other presumption of law, be rebutted by evidence of contrary intention. But if there be no evidence of any contrary intention, it appears to me that the presumption must prevail.

Now, I can find no averments made by any of the claimants in this record of any facts or circumstances implying that the testator did not intend to revoke the will. The only fact stated is, that ten months elapsed between the date of the birth of the child and the death of the father, during which time he had an opportunity of revoking the will had he so desired, but did not do so. But it appears to me that that is not sufficient to overcome the presumption—and there is nothing else.

I think, therefore, that the proof allowed to Mrs Elder is unnecessary, and that we should sustain the first alternative of her claim as guardian or tutor of her pupil son. No. 132.

Mar. 16, 1894.
Elder's Trustees v. Elder.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think there can be no question that our law recognises a presumption arising from the birth of a child after the execution of the will. It is a presumption which may be rebutted by evidence of contrary intention; and therefore in agreeing with Lord Adam that the presumption is recognised in our law, I do not think that we are saying anything at all contrary to the dictum ascribed to Lord Watson in the case of Hughes v. Edwardes, 19 R. (H. L.) 33, that whether a revocation of a will is to be presumed from the subsequent birth of a child is, according to the law of Scotland, a question of circumstances, because I apprehend his Lordship did not thereby mean to say that in the absence of special circumstances there was no presumption in law to support revocation, but only that the force of the presumption may depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. I therefore agree with Lord Adam that the true principle is this, that the subsequent birth of the child raises a presumption of revocation,—that the inference which the law requires us to draw from that single fact may be rebutted by the inference of a contrary intention, which may be deduced, if so be, from other facts and circumstances; but that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the presumption must hold.

Now, the only facts that are stated in this case do not appear to me to suggest any different inference from that which should in general be drawn from the subsequent birth of a child. The material facts are that a considerable part of the testator's property consisted of heritage; that the child born after the execution of the will was a son, and that all the children alive at the date of the will were daughters. If these facts affect the presumption at all they would tend to support and not to displace it. The only other fact that we are required to consider is, that the testator lived for ten months after the birth of his son without actually revoking the will, and therefore the question seems to me to be whether the mere fact of the testator's survivance for such a period as that is of itself sufficient to rebut the presumption, and I do not think it is. If that be so, I think it is needless as well as incompetent to allow a proof of the testator's declarations of intention. The principle upon which evidence may be admitted in such cases is elaborately discussed by Lord St Leonards in the case of Hall v. Hall, Dec. 14, 1841, 1 Dr. and War. 94. The decisions which that great Judge considers in his opinion are all of them English, but the principles which he deduces from those decisions are common to the law of both England and Scotland, and are indeed necessary consequences of the legal conception of a presumption of law by which the apparent intention of a will which the law requires to be expressed in writing may be defeated or modified. The principle which Lord St Leonards lays down, as I understand it, is that when the law creates a presumption which is contrary to the apparent intention of a will, evidence may be given to shew that it was in truth executed or left unaltered with the intention which its words express. But if evidence is admitted to rebut the presumption of law, evidence of the same kind must be admitted on the other side to set it up; and therefore if we were asked to allow a proof of facts tending to shew that the testator did not intend to revoke the will,—tending to set aside the presumption of law,—then it would be quite right and necessary that all relevant facts on the other side should be admitted to probation also. But in a case like the

No. 132. present, where no such proof is asked, it appears to me that it would be contrary to settled rules of law to admit evidence of such facts as are alleged in the claim that we are sustaining for the purpose of fortifying the presumption. If the presumption of law is not sufficient of itself, it cannot in my opinion be set up by parole evidence of expressions of intention by the testator or of his opinion as to the legal effect of his son's birth. I therefore agree with Lord Adam that the claim should be sustained as it stands.

Lease—Reparation—Claim by tenant for damages for breach of conditions of lease—Personal objection—Mora.—The tenant of a farm, three years after the farm had been sold, brought an action against his former landlord, averring that on each occasion during a period of seven years on which he had paid his rent, and at various other times, orally and in writing, he had protested against and complained of the landlord's failure to implement conditions of the lease under which the landlord was bound to burn a certain proportion of the heather annually, and to keep the fences of the farm in repair, and concluding for damages for the alleged breach of these conditions.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, as they shewed that he had paid his rent during the seven years without reservation of a specific claim for damages.

Broadwood v. Hunter, Feb. 2, 1855, 17 D. 340, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
LdStormonth-Darling.

AT Martinmas 1883, Robert Emslie entered into possession of the farm of Wester Durris Hills, Kincardineshire, in virtue of a minute of agreement for a lease between him and the proprietors, the trustees of the late Dr James Young, of Durris.

The minute of agreement contained, inter alia, the following clause:—"The trustees are bound to burn the heather, weather permitting, in regular strips as near as possible to the tenth shift rotation." And also the following,—"The trustees to put the fence into repair, and supply larch posts during the lease for repairing same; also to overhaul the fencing in the spring of each year." No. 133.

At Martinmas 1890 Young's trustees sold the estate of Durris, including the farm of Wester Durris Hills, to Henry Robert Baird, Emslie being continued in possession of that farm under the foregoing minute of agreement. Mar. 16, 1894.
Emslie v.
Young's
Trustees.

On 29th May 1893 Emslie raised an action concluding for decree for £250 against Young's trustees, and for decree for the same amount against Baird.

The pursuer averred in his record as amended,—(Cond. 2.)—(After setting forth the clauses of the minute of agreement above quoted);—"Neither of these obligations has been fulfilled, either by the said trustees . . . or by the said Henry Robert Baird since he became proprietor of the said estate. On every occasion on which pursuer paid his rent, and at various other times, orally and in writing, he protested against and complained of the manner in which he was being treated in this matter, until at last the pursuer refused to pay his rent altogether, and the defender, the said Henry Robert Baird, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, at Stonehaven, against pursuer to recover said rent. In that action pursuer ultimately paid the rents due, under the express reservation of all claims against the present defenders for the loss, injury, and damage he had sustained through their continued and systematic neglect to fulfil the obligations entered into between them and the pursuer." The pursuer then set forth items of damage, accruing each year from 1883-84 down to 1892-93, and amounting in all to the sums concluded for.

In defence Young's trustees pleaded, inter alia,—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and separatim, are not sufficiently specific to be admitted to probation. (3) The pursuer having paid his rent without protest or reservation, is barred from maintaining the claim which he now puts forward.

On 14th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced an interlocutor, which, inter alia, repelled the second plea in law for Young's trustees, and allowed a proof.

Young's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The case was ruled by Broadwood v. Hunter,¹ which settled that a tenant intending to claim damages on grounds like the present must make a specific claim and reservation on each occasion of paying his rent; otherwise he would not be entitled to go back and claim in respect of losses which he alleged he had suffered in bygone years. General protests were not sufficient to preserve his claim, the presumption being that a general protest not followed up had been abandoned, and the landlord in consequence might reasonably omit to preserve evidence to meet the claim. Here there was nothing averred beyond general complaints. The action, therefore, in so far as directed against the present defenders, was irrelevant. There was no distinction between game damage and damage such as was here averred.²

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary's judgment was well founded. What Broadwood v. Hunter settled was that mere grumbling on the part of the tenant was not sufficient to preserve his claim to damages. Nothing more than a mere grumble was there averred. Here there was an averment of distinct protests by the pursuer. It might be that the protests in fact made were not sufficient to preserve the pur-

The principle, therefore, upon which Broadwood v. Hunter proceeded did not apply here.

Mar. 16, 1894.
Emslie v.
Young's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders, Dr James Young's trustees, have put forward the plea that "The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and separatim, are not sufficiently specific to be admitted to probation."

When the case was before the Lord Ordinary, an amendment of the record was proposed by the pursuer, and allowed by his Lordship. It is not, therefore, a case in which any defects in the averments may be ascribed to a failure on the part of the pursuer to observe the points which he may be called upon to meet.

Cond. 2 sets forth a clause in the lease by which the trustees bind themselves "to burn the heather, weather permitting, in regular strips as near as possible to the tenth shift rotation," and "to put the fences into repair, and supply larch posts for repairing the same; also to overhaul the fencing in the spring of each year." The case averred on record is, that for a long course of years there was each year an actionable failure on the part of the landlord to implement these obligations of his lease; and yet it is admitted that the rent was paid every year by the tenant without any reservation. The pursuer's case, therefore, is brought at once into direct collision with that of Broadwood v. Hunter, 17 D. 340. In order to explain his position he states on record that "on every occasion on which the pursuer paid his rent, and at various other times, orally and in writing, he protested against and complained of the manner in which he was being treated in this matter, until at last the pursuer refused to pay his rent altogether."

It is plain on the authority of Broadwood v. Hunter, that a tenant in such circumstances has a natural and appropriate remedy against his landlord on the occasion of his rent day. On that occasion it is his duty either to tell his landlord that he will not pay his rent till his claim for damages is satisfied, or to state a specific claim, and reserve it in a definite way. Now, there is no averment on record of this having been done, but merely one of a protest by the tenant. The words are very vague, and as I have already indicated we are bound to criticise very closely the averments on this record, which has been already amended by the pursuer before the Lord Ordinary, in view of the very plea which we have now to consider.

In my opinion the arguments which have been advanced against the relevancy of the pursuer's case, are sufficient, and I am therefore for assoilzieing the defenders, Dr Young's trustees.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer in this action was the tenant of a farm which was formerly the property of the defenders, Dr Young's trustees, and Thomas Graham Young. He entered in 1883, and continued in possession till 1893; and the claim now made is for damages from the commencement to the termination of his occupancy. Three years ago the property was sold to Mr Baird, and accordingly it is for the first seven years of the period in question that liability is ascribed by the pursuer to these defenders, a liability which they deny. The pursuer's claim is founded on a clause in his lease. [His Lordship quoted the clause.] That is to say, the high heather was to be burned in strips every year, so that at the end of ten years the whole extent of it should be burnt. It is said that the landlord did not fulfil his obligation, and accordingly damages are asked for.

I agree that this claim is barred by mora. The plea of mora is not enough by itself unless it amounts to prescription, but where as the result of the mora the defender is unable to state his defence, then I think the plea does come in. The claim made is for damages extending over ten years, and the allegation of the pursuer is that during the whole of that time there was a failure of duty on the part of the landlord. But how could the landlord, without having received some notice of claim during that period, state an adequate defence at the end of it? For example, it is stipulated that he should carry out the obligation "weather permitting." But who could now give evidence as to the weather ten years ago? The case, I hold, must fall under the principles laid down in Broadwood v. Hunter, 17 D. 340, where the answer made to the claim for damages was,—“It is too late to claim now, you should have given me warning at the time when the alleged damages were being inflicted upon you.” There is no allegation here of the pursuer having intimated his claim in a specific manner, or having insisted upon it in such a way as to keep it alive. All that is said is that he protested. Accordingly he left the landlord in the belief that he was not making any such claim, or at anyrate that he was not persisting in it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be reversed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case is ruled by Broadwood v. Hunter, 17 D. 340. To exclude the rule, the tenant must shew that he gave notice of his claim in so specific a form as to exclude the inference that when he paid his rent he had no claim for compensation to set off against his landlord's demand. I cannot construe the averment on record as indicating any such intimation. The pursuer brings this action against the trustees three years after they have sold the estate, and complains of damage which he has sustained ten years ago, and yearly since that date. I agree that it would be a hardship upon the landlord if at this distance of time he were called upon to make a defence against such a claim. The pursuer says that, owing to the landlord's breach of contract, he could not pasture so many sheep upon the land as he would otherwise have done, and that there was not sufficient food for those he had. But the landlord has no possibility of refuting this statement or meeting the claim, because no due notice of it was given to him during the lease. Apart, however, from this consideration I think the rule is fixed that when a tenant has paid his rent regularly year by year, without reservation, he cannot afterwards set up a claim for abatement in the form of damages for byepast injury; such a claim must be restricted to the year preceding the demand.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, so far as it deals with these defenders, should be reversed.

Marriage-contract—Construction—Jus relictæ—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), secs. 6 and 8.—By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1874, the wife conveyed her whole estates acquisita et acquirenda to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, that in the event of the dissolution of the marriage by her death, without issue, her husband should enjoy the liferent of her whole estates, the trustees being, in that event, directed to hold the fee for behoof and at the absolute disposal of the wife or her heirs or assignees. The husband, inter alia, renounced his "jus mariti and rights of courtesy and of administration in, of, and in relation to the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, now owing and belonging, or which may hereafter be owing and belonging to" the wife.

The marriage was dissolved in 1883 by the death of the wife, intestate, and without issue.

The husband thereafter for several years enjoyed the liferent of his wife's estate, and then brought an action against his marriage-contract trustees and his wife's next of kin, in which he concluded for declarator that he was entitled to one-half of the moveable estate, in virtue of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Low) assoilzied the defenders, holding that the husband's claim to one-half of his wife's moveable estate was inconsistent with the provisions of the marriage-contract.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

MR JAMES ROBERTSON BUNTINE, advocate, was married to Miss Jane Sandeman in 1874. By antenuptial contract Mr Buntine, after making certain provisions for his intended wife and the children of the marriage, renounced "his jus mariti and rights of courtesy and of administration in, of, and in relation to, the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, now owing or belonging to or which may hereafter be owing or belonging to his intended wife." She then, on her part, conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, belonging, or which should belong, to her during the subsistence of the marriage, except legacies of £500 or under, revenue falling to her from estate separately settled on her, and revenue due to her from the trust-estate prior to the last date of the contract, and that in trust for the following purposes:—(1) To pay the expenses of the trust; (2) for behoof of Mrs Buntine in liferent; (3) in the event of the pursuer surviving her, for his behoof in liferent for his liferent alimentary use alienably; (4) to hold the fee of the trust-estate for behoof of the children of the marriage; and in the last place, failing children of the marriage, the trustees were directed to "hold the said estate for behoof and at the absolute disposal of the second party [Miss Sandeman] or her heirs or assignees." The deed contained further a declaration "that the provisions hereinbefore conceived in favour of the said Jane Sandeman shall not be taken as in lieu or in full satisfaction to her of her rights of terce or jus relictæ," which rights were specially reserved.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mrs Buntine in 1883. No. 134.
She died intestate, and without issue.

Thereafter Mr Buntine enjoyed the liferent of his wife's estate.

Buntine v.
Buntine's
Trustees.

On 8th June 1893 Mr Buntine, founding on section 6 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881,* raised an action against his marriage-contract trustees, and also against his wife's next of kin, in which he concluded for declarator that he was entitled, as his own absolute property, to one-half of the whole free moveable estate belonging to his wife, or to which she had right at the time of her death, and for payment of £15,000, or such other sum as should amount to the said one-half.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) In respect of the provisions of the statute quoted, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) On a sound construction of the said marriage-contract and Act of Parliament, and in the circumstances which have arisen, the pursuer is not barred from insisting in his present claim. (3) The defences stated are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The pursuer, having by antenuptial marriage-contract renounced his whole legal rights in his wife's estate, is barred from insisting in his present claim. (3) The pursuer, having by antenuptial contract accepted, and farther, and separatim, having enjoyed for ten years the liferent of the whole of his wife's estate, is barred from insisting in his present claim. (5) Farther, if he has not already elected, the pursuer is now bound to elect between his conventional provisions under the marriage-contract, and his rights at common law.

On 9th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the first, second, third, and fifth pleas in law for the defenders, granting decree of declarator, appointing the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, and granting leave to reclaim.†

* The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 6, enacts,—“After the passing of this Act the husband of any woman who may die domiciled in Scotland shall take by operation of law the same share and interest in her moveable estate which is taken by a widow in her deceased husband's moveable estate according to the law and practice of Scotland, and subject always to the same rules of law in relation to the nature and amount of such share and interest, and the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction thereof, as the case may be.”

Sec. 8 enacts,—“This Act shall not affect any contracts made or to be made between married persons before or during marriage, or the law relating to such contracts. . . .”

† “OPINION.—There are two questions in this case,—First, whether the pursuer is barred from claiming one-half of his wife's estate under the 6th section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1881, by reason of the renunciation of his legal rights contained in his antenuptial contract of marriage ; and second, whether, assuming the first question to be answered in the negative, the pursuer's claim is barred by the provision to him in the marriage-contract of a liferent of his wife's whole means and estate.

“I have no difficulty in answering the first of these questions in the negative. The renunciation by the pursuer in the marriage-contract applied only to his legal rights as they then existed, and cannot, in my opinion, be extended so as to include a legal right which was brought into existence for the first time by subsequent legislation. Further, the point seems to me to be settled by the case of Simons' Trustees, 18 R. p. 135.

“The second question is attended with more difficulty. It seems to have been raised in argument in the case of Simons' Trustees, but I think that the opinions delivered shew that the learned Judges did not consider the determination of the question necessary for the decision of the case. The late Lord

Mrs Buntine's next of kin reclaimed, and argued ;—The pursuer's contention was that he was entitled to the jus relictæ created by the Married

President, however, expressed a very clear opinion that the husband would have been entitled to enjoy the liferent, and also to claim jus relictæ, while Lord M'Laren took the view that it would not be consistent with our practice to allow legal and conventional provisions to be claimed concurrently.

"The 6th section of the Married Women's Property Act provides that the husband shall take by operation of law the same share and interest in his wife's moveable estate which is taken by a widow in her deceased husband's moveable estate, 'subject always to the same rules of law in relation to . . . the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction thereof, as the case may be.'

"The question is, whether applying the rules applicable to jus relictæ, the pursuer's claim must be held to be excluded or satisfied by the provision of a liferent of his wife's whole estate?

"The case put by the defenders as being analogous to, and ruling, the present case, was that of a husband by antenuptial marriage-contract giving to his wife a liferent of his whole estate. In such a case, the defenders argued that although the wife did not renounce her legal rights, she would be barred from claiming both jus relictæ and a liferent of the remainder of the estate.

"There is a good deal of authority for that proposition, and I shall assume it to be sound. I do not, however, think that the principles upon which it rests are applicable to the present case.

"In entering into a contract such as that supposed, both husband and wife know that the wife will, in the event of the husband's death, be entitled to one-third or one-half of his moveable estate, as the case may be. When, therefore, the husband offers, and the wife accepts, a liferent of the whole estate, the natural implication is that the intention and agreement of the parties is that the fee of the whole estate should be at the husband's disposal. In such circumstances, for the wife to claim jus relictæ in addition to a liferent, would be to make a claim inconsistent with the contract—that contract not only being one to which she was herself a party, but also her only title to the liferent.

"The wife's claim to both provisions in the case supposed would be rejected (1) on account of the implied intention of the parties arising out of the inconsistency between the provision made for the wife in the contract, and her legal rights, which the parties are assumed to have known and had in view ; and (2) because the implied intention being read into the contract, the wife cannot claim both the liferent and jus relictæ without approbating and reprobating the same deed.

"In the present case there is no room for implied intention in regard to the right which the pursuer now claims, because as it did not exist at the date of the contract, it is certain that the parties had no intention in regard to it, the one way or the other.

"The question then is, whether the pursuer's claim is inconsistent with the contract, so that he cannot make it without reprobating the contract which he has already approbated?

"The answer to that question seems to me to depend upon whether the wife, or anyone else, is deprived by the pursuer's claim of anything which was stipulated for in the contract, because if not, I do not see how the pursuer can be regarded as reprobating the contract. In the supposed case which I have been considering, the husband would, in the event of the wife getting both provisions, be deprived of the power, which by implication he had stipulated for, of disposing of the jus relictæ. I do not think that there is anything analogous to that in this case. The wife as the counterpart of the liferent which she gave to her husband made two stipulations in regard to her estate. In the first place, she stipulated that the pursuer should renounce his jus mariti and right of administration ; and in the second place, that failing children, the trustees should hold the estate for behoof, and at the absolute disposal, of her and her heirs and assignees. The pursuer is asking nothing contrary to these stipulations ; indeed, they are the foundation of his claim. It is because his jus mariti

Women's Property Act, 1881, as well as to the liferent of the whole of his wife's property which he took under his marriage-contract, on the ground that the statutory right had not been discharged or renounced by him. But (1) section 8 of the Act provided that the Act should not affect marriage-contracts nor the law relating to such contracts. If, therefore, the pursuer's claim to jus relictæ was inconsistent with the provisions of his marriage-contract, no jus relictæ enured to him in virtue of the passing of the Act. On a sound construction of the marriage-contract, the pursuer's claim was inconsistent with its provisions. By the marriage-contract the wife bargained that the fee of her whole estate should be at her own absolute disposal or at the disposal of her heirs or assignees; what the pursuer now proposed to do was to appropriate one-half of that estate, retaining at the same time his own liferent under the contract, and without giving any consideration. To sustain such a contention would be to upset the provisions of the marriage-contract. The pursuer's contention, therefore, ought to be rejected, both because a marriage-contract was one of the most solemn and binding contracts known to the law, and because of the express saving clause in section 8 of the Act. (2) If the pursuer's claim was not to be rejected on the ground just stated, it was struck at by the concluding words of section 6 of the Act, which provided that the new statutory right should be subject to the same rules in relation to its exclusion, discharge, and satisfaction as regulated the widow's jus relictæ. That implied that the widower was not to be in a better position than the widow would have been, and also that the jus relictæ was to be regulated by the same rules whether the marriage had taken place before the Act or after it. In other words, the pursuer's claim was to be determined in the same way as if his marriage had taken place after the passing of the Act, and as if it had been a claim by his widow to jus relictæ. Now, with respect to jus relictæ, it was a settled rule that a widow who had accepted the liferent of her husband's whole estate was not entitled to her jus relictæ.¹ The same rule must consequently was excluded, and because the trustees held the estate for his wife's absolute behoof, that the pursuer is in a position to make the present claim.

"It seems to me that the only ground upon which it could be held that the pursuer's claim is contrary to the marriage-contract is that the succession of the wife's heirs is protected. The defenders did not argue that that was the case, and I think that any such argument would be untenable. I think that the mention of heirs and assignees does not add anything to the declaration that the estate is to be held for the wife's behoof; at all events, it does not give the heirs and assignees any jus crediti under the contract.

"All that the marriage-contract does in regard to the fee of the estate (in the event which has happened, of there being no children of the marriage) is to ensure that it shall belong to the wife. If there had been children, the question might have been materially different, but there being no children, the result of the contract was that the fee of the estate remained the absolute property of the wife. A subsequent statute has enacted that in such a case the husband is to be entitled to a certain share of the wife's estate. I am unable to see anything to prevent the husband taking advantage of that enactment. He cannot be prevented from doing so on the ground of the intention of the parties, because there is no expressed intention, and there is no room for implied intention. And he cannot be prevented from doing so on the ground that the claim involves a reprobation of the contract, because the contract has been implemented in every term, and the pursuer, so far from claiming against the contract, rests his claim upon its provisions.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to one-half of the free moveable estate belonging to his late wife."

apply to jus relictæ, and the pursuer therefore was not entitled both to his legal and to his conventional provision. The utmost that the argument for him came to was this, that he had the right of election between the two provisions, seeing that at the date of the marriage he had no knowledge of the legal provision, which then was nonexistent. That view of the pursuer's position imposed on him the duty of electing at the dissolution of the marriage, or at least of electing now, and if he chose his legal provision, of imputing to that provision what he had hitherto received in name of liferent. The pursuer's claim, however, was not that he had the right to elect between his legal and his conventional provisions, but that he was entitled to the benefit of both provisions. In *Fotheringham's*¹ case, the circumstances did not admit of this question being decided, and in *Simons'*² case the present point was not taken. (3) The fee of Mrs Buntine's property therefore fell, in terms of the marriage-contract, to her heirs ab intestato, she having left no will. The pursuer, claiming jus relictæ, was not one of his wife's heirs ab intestato; for a widow, claiming jus relictæ, was a creditor, not an heir, of her husband,³ and a widower claiming jus relictæ must under the Act be in the same position. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought therefore to be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was settled that section 6 of the Act was not confined to marriages entered into after the passing of the Act, but included also marriages contracted before its date.⁴ The only question, therefore, was, had the right created by that section been excluded in the present instance by the provisions of this marriage-contract? There was no question of election, for the matter arose upon an antenuptial marriage-contract, and a spouse, by entering into such a contract, must be held to have accepted the provisions in his or her favour therein contained without the right of thereafter electing the legal provision in lieu of the conventional provisions. Nor was there any room for the rule, to which the defenders appealed, that a wife who under her marriage-contract took on her husband's predecease the liferent of his whole estates was not entitled to jus relictæ. That rule, assuming it to be sound law, proceeded on the ground of implied discharge. The parties in entering into the marriage-contract were understood to have had in view, and to have intended to adjust, their whole mutual legal rights and obligations existing at the time, and known to each party. Therefore there could be no implied discharge of a legal right, such as that now in question, which was created by a statute passed after the date of the marriage-contract, and of which, of course, the parties could have no knowledge at that date. The question was thus narrowed down to the construction of the marriage-contract. Now, the marriage-contract contained no express discharge or renunciation by the husband of possible legal rights which the Legislature might create in the future; and the clause by which he renounced his jus mariti, &c., could not be construed to include such possible future rights. Such a clause included only rights existing at its date.¹ Any objection, therefore, to the pursuer's claim, on the ground that he had renounced or discharged his right, was out of the case. From which it followed that he was entitled to one-half of the moveable property which might belong to his wife absolutely at the time of her death. The fee of her whole moveable property was in that position. It was said that the clause which provided that in the event (which had happened) of the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the wife without issue, the fee of her property should be at her absolute disposal and that of her heirs and assignees, imported a contractual obligation by the husband inconsistent with his present claim. That argument was ill-founded. Property belonging to a wife and at her absolute disposal, the jus mariti being as here excluded, was simply her property, to be disposed of as she might direct, subject to her obligations, legal and conventional, and failing direction by her then as the law might direct. The fact that the property was vested in the marriage-contract trustees was of no moment, for they held it quoad the fee, not for any matrimonial purpose, but for behoof of the wife as an individual, just as they would have held it for her behoof in virtue of her radical right had there been no clause regarding the disposal of the fee. Nor was the destination to her heirs and assignees of any materiality. A destination in a marriage-contract of property belonging to one of the spouses to the heirs or assignees of that spouse was simply a destination to the spouse himself or herself, and gave the heirs or assignees no jus quæsitum.² The fee of Mrs Buntine's estates being thus her absolute property, and the statutory right not having been renounced or discharged by the pursuer, his claim to one-half of that estate fell to be sustained.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The present question depends primarily upon the provisions of the pursuer's antenuptial marriage-contract, and these, so far as relevant, may be stated in two sentences. The property of the wife was placed in the hands of trustees; the husband renounced his jus mariti, and (regarding the event which has happened of the wife's predecease without issue) agreed that the estate should be held for behoof of and at the absolute disposal of the wife and her heirs and assignees. On the other hand the husband was to get, in the event which I have stated, the income of the estate paid over to him by the trustees during his life.

These stipulations are clearly and directly reciprocal. In return for the husband giving up his jus mariti, and engaging that the capital of the wife's estate shall be hers and her heirs', he gets a liferent of the whole.

What then is the pursuer's present demand? He proposes to carry off from the hands of the trustees, and from the disposal of his wife's heirs, one-half of the capital of his wife's estate. This claim is rested on the 6th section of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, which gives what for shortness may be called a jus relictæ to the husbands of women who have died domiciled in Scotland. Now, while this section is applicable to persons married

 Buntine v.
 Trustees.

If we give effect to the pursuer's claim, shall we be allowing the Act to affect Mrs Buntine's marriage-contract? It seems to me that only one answer can be given. If to upset a contract be to affect it, then this contract is affected. The result of holding the Act to apply would be that whereas under the contract before the Act the pursuer had the liferent and none of the capital, under the contract after the Act he has the whole liferent and half of the capital besides. To put it in another way (although rather to understate it) on the pursuer's contention the Act would operate so as to let him retain all that he stipulated for and also carry off one-half of the consideration of that stipulation.

The only answer to this view of the case which is suggested is, that the husband is really claiming as in right of his wife. But this answer seems to me to rest on an omission to remember the nature of jus relictæ, and therefore of jus relictî. When a widow claims her jus relictæ she claims not in right of her husband but against her husband, and as his creditor. This is very clearly stated by the Lord President in Inglis, Jan. 28, 1869, 7 Macph. 435. The pursuer is in no sense of the term a representative of his wife. If he has a claim, he is claiming because he is by statute a creditor of her estate. Now, I hold that when he executed this marriage-contract he guaranteed to his wife that, so far as he was concerned, her estate should be dealt with according to the contract. I take the first case suggested by the words of the marriage-contract. The pursuer agreed that his wife should have the right of absolute disposal of the capital of her estate after they were both dead. If Mrs Buntine had left a will giving the estate to some of her own relations, the pursuer would, according to his contention, have had right to defeat that will by carrying off one-half of what it purported to bequeath. As it happens Mrs Buntine has died without leaving a will. In my opinion she was entitled to rely, so far as the other party to the contract was concerned, on her succession being determined by the clause in her marriage-contract, which in express terms gave it to her heirs. It is, as I think, contrary to the contract for the pursuer to plead any right not derived from Mrs Buntine against the execution of the contract, and this jus relictî is not a right derived from Mrs Buntine.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzieing the defenders.

LORD ADAM.—Mr and Mrs Buntine were married in 1874. They executed an antenuptial marriage-contract dated 12th October, and recorded 22d December 1874. By this marriage-contract Mrs Buntine conveyed her whole estate, both acquisita and acquirenda, with some exceptions, to certain trustees, who were directed, in the event of Mrs Buntine predeceasing her husband, to pay the income of the trust-estate to her husband for his liferent alimentary use alienarly, and to hold the fee for behoof of the children of the marriage, and failing children for behoof and at the absolute disposal of Mrs Buntine, or her heirs and assignees. The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mrs Buntine, without issue, in 1883. Since that date Mr Buntine has enjoyed the income of the trust-estate. In 1881 the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, was passed, and by section 6 of this Act it was declared [quotes section]—that is, the husband was to have a jus relictî just as the wife had a jus relictæ, "subject always to the same rules of law in relation to . . . the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction thereof as the case may be." No. 134.

In this case, there being no children of the marriage, Mr Buntine claims one-half of the fee. In my opinion that claim is excluded by the terms of the marriage-contract. In that deed Mr Buntine renounced his "jus mariti and rights of courtesy, and of administration in, of, and in relation to the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, now owing and belonging, or which may hereafter be owing and belonging" to his wife. Now, the right with which we are dealing in this case is neither a right of courtesy nor does it depend on the jus mariti, and the cases of Fotheringham and Simons are authorities to the effect that such a clause of renunciation as the one I have quoted would not discharge a legal right not existing at the date of the contract. In such circumstances, the estate vests subject to all legal claims that may subsequently be created, and therefore to the claim of jus relictæ, if these be not excluded by the terms of the marriage-contract. In this case, as I have said, the husband bound himself, so far as he was concerned, that her estate should be at the absolute disposal of his wife, or her heirs and assignees. Now, I do not see how his claim to one-half of the fee of that estate is consistent with that obligation. I think the two things are totally irreconcilable. For the heirs of Mrs Buntine do not take ab intestato her estate, but under the provisions of the marriage-contract, and under the same contract Mr Buntine has bound himself that his wife's estate should be at the absolute disposal of his wife, or her heirs and assignees. Accordingly, in my opinion, it is quite impossible to sustain the claim made by him in this action.

Buntine v.
Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN.—The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, while taking from the husband rights which were usually excluded by contract where the wife had property, has given to the husband an interest in the wife's succession, which is equivalent to the jus relictæ of the common law, and has subjected this new right to the conditions and incidents which belong to jus relictæ. One of the incidents of jus relictæ was that the claim might be excluded by antenuptial contract, and that this exclusion might be either express or by implication. If the husband in the antenuptial contract completely disposed of his whole estate in contemplation of death, say by giving his wife a liferent or an annuity, and directing the division of what remained of his estate amongst the children of the marriage, the wife could not successfully claim jus relictæ, because by becoming a party to the contract she had assented to a disposal of the husband's estate which made it impossible to satisfy such a claim. This principle is very well illustrated by the case of Edward v. Cheyne, 15 R. (H. L.) 33; for, while the deed there in question was not a contract, but a mutual will, the principle of the decision is not the less applicable to the case where the promised spouse, being free to contract, agrees before marriage to a particular disposition of the property of the other spouse. But again, if any part of the husband's estate, great or small, be undisposed of, and whether this be the result of the failure of objects or of failure to dispose of the particular subject, the wife, if she has not expressly renounced her jus relictæ, will be entitled, in addition to her liferent provision under the contract, to claim her half or third, as the case may be, of the undisposed-of succession. The reason of this distinction is, that an implied extinction of the jus relictæ can only be where there is an inconsistency between the claim which the lady is preferring against her husband's estate and the disposition of that estate to which she has assented. But, plainly, there is no inconsistency in claiming or taking a conventional provision out of property which is disposed of and a legal provision out of that which is undisposed of.

Applying these principles (as we are required to do by the statute), mutatis mutandis, to the case of the husband's claims against his wife's estate, I find that Mr Buntine has assented by antenuptial contract to a scheme of disposition of his wife's estate under which he receives a life interest through trustees, while the fee is destined in the first place to the lady's children by that or any subsequent marriage, and failing issue it is to be at the "absolute disposal" of Mrs Buntine or "her heirs and assignees." Observing that the lady's property is by the contract vested in trustees, I consider that this declaration is equivalent to a direction to the trustees to hold the capital for the benefit of Mrs Buntine's testamentary heirs, if any, or failing these, for her heirs in mobilibus. I think it is perfectly fixed in the law of Scotland that a gift to the heirs of A takes effect in favour of the heirs in mobilibus on the failure of the preceding branches of the destination, also that the rights of a wife or husband are not covered by such a destination. On this subject I shall only refer to the case of Gregory in the House of Lords (16 R. (H. L.) p. 10), where it is laid down that destinations to "heirs" and destinations to "next of kin" are to be interpreted on common principles.

It appears to me that in the event which has happened Mrs Buntine's moveable estate is destined to her heirs in mobilibus, and as this destination is contained in an antenuptial contract to which the husband is a consenting party, Mr Buntine cannot claim his jus relictii consistently with his antenuptial obligation. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, reserves entire the effect of marriage-contracts, and independently of that provision I should have assumed that marriage-contract obligations were not intended to be rescinded by the Act of Parliament.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the validity of a claim of this kind depends on the construction of the marriage-contract whether the parties have entered into the contract before or after the passing of the Act. If the claim is inconsistent with the provisions of the marriage-contract, then it is excluded by the Act; if it is not inconsistent, then there is nothing in the Act to prevent it receiving effect.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained the claim made in this action, because, in his opinion, it is a claim not against but in accordance with the terms of the marriage-contract. The Lord Ordinary considers that the direction to the trustees to hold the wife's estate for behoof of and at the absolute disposal of the wife or her heirs and assignees is equivalent to a stipulation that upon the wife's death without issue her estate should go to the persons entitled thereto by the law in force at the time of her death; and accordingly his Lordship holds that Mr Buntine, as her husband, has a right to one-half of her moveable estate. His Lordship's view, therefore, is, that Mr Buntine is claiming not against but in accordance with the terms of the marriage-contract.

Now, when the antenuptial contract of marriage between the parties has been conceived in terms which will bear the construction put upon them by the Lord Ordinary, I agree with his Lordship in his opinion as to the husband's right. But I agree with your Lordship that that is not the true construction of the marriage-contract in question. The wife has stipulated that—[His Lordship quotes clause].

Now, if the estate was at her absolute disposal she could have disposed of it by testament, and that is, I think, the obvious and irresistible meaning and effect of the clause; and if she did not so dispose of it then it was to be at the absolute disposal of her heirs in mobilibus. Her husband, however, says that by a supervening law he has acquired a right to defeat her testament if she had made one, because the right given to the husband in his wife's moveable estate is the same and subject to the same rule of law as the widow's right in the moveable estate of her husband, and therefore it is a right which, like legitim, cannot be prejudiced or affected by will. It is true that Mrs Buntine left no will. But the husband's right to exclude the heirs in mobilibus must rest, as the Solicitor-General contended, upon precisely the same conditions as his right to defeat the wife's will. In either case he would carry off one-half of the moveable estate, contrary to the provisions of the marriage-contract.

Buntine v.
Trustees.

Now, the Act of Parliament says that the right which it gives "shall not affect any contracts made or to be made between married persons before or during marriage." And the only question is whether the husband here is not claiming in terms to affect the contract between him and Mrs Buntine. Under that contract the wife and her heirs have an absolute right to the whole of her estate. But founding on the Act her husband says he is entitled to the half. Is that or is that not a claim to affect the contract? It is quite impossible, in my opinion, to answer that question otherwise than as your Lordships propose.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion.—In an action for divorce on the ground of desertion by a wife against her husband, evidence upon which it was held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling), distinguishing from the case of Gibson v. Gibson, Feb. 1, 1894, supra, p. 470, that the husband, who had expelled his wife from the house, and had acted with great cruelty towards her, had so acted with the view of putting an end to conjugal cohabitation, and, consequently, that she was entitled to decree of divorce.

On 3d March 1893 Mrs Elizabeth Adamson or Murray brought an action for divorce on the ground of desertion against her husband William Murray, sometime grocer in Haddington, then clerk, residing at 90 Blenheim Street, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

The action was undefended.

A proof disclosed the following facts: The spouses were married in 1861. From an early period the marriage was an unhappy one, owing, so far as it appeared, to the drunken habits of the defender. The pursuer deposed that on several occasions prior to 1875 she had been obliged by his violent conduct to leave him and go to reside with her own relatives, but that she had always returned to him. In July 1875 he assaulted her, and was convicted and fined for this assault. In the same month he allowed the furniture in the house in Clerk Street, Edinburgh, where they were then living, to be sold off. The pursuer deposed that she did

No. 135. not know beforehand that the sale was to take place. "The sale took place, and I was turned out of the house with my children entirely destitute, and all my effects were sold off. A neighbour . . . asked me to stay with her for a few days, until I had made other arrangements. I stayed with her . . . I had not a farthing in my pocket at that time, and I did not know where my husband was." The neighbour, "is now in Australia. . . . I had afterwards to apply for out-door relief from the parochial authorities at North Leith, and I got support for some weeks from the parochial authorities. I ultimately took a house of one room and kitchen in George Street, Newhaven. I took that house in my own name, and I tried to support myself by keeping lodgers." After the pursuer had received parochial relief the parochial authorities proceeded against the husband for desertion, and these proceedings were stopped only by a relative of his coming forward and paying the amount of the relief.

Murray.

The pursuer gave this further evidence,—“On the 1st February 1876 my husband came to the house [in Newhaven], without warning, at nine o'clock at night. When he came in that night there was a young lad, a clerk, there, and my husband said that he had come to take the children and the house. . . . When he did take them he took me by the back of the neck, and put me to the door without a bonnet or anything. He swore when he turned me out. I went to” a friend's house “for the night, and next morning at eight o'clock I went to my sister's house in Broughton Place. At that time all my children were quite young. (Q.) Did any of them happen to see his conduct towards you that night? (A.) They did not see him put me out, because he shut the door and came out to the little lobby, and opened the door to throw me out. He shut the door so that the whole building shook. . . . I did not leave of my own accord on that occasion; I was put out, and I was asked neither one thing nor another. My sister, Mrs Gordon, to whose house I went at that time, is now dead. My husband was quite well aware of where Mrs Gordon lived, and he knew that I was going there. I remained for two years with my sister, helping her as nurse to her children. She had a large young family. Her husband is dead now also, but some of the children are still living. During these two years, while I was in Edinburgh, my husband never made any offer to take me back or to make any provision for my support. I afterwards went to Elgin, and was in service there for a year. I was then, for several years, travelling companion to an old lady, and I was abroad with her a good deal. During the last six years I have been in Edinburgh, maintaining myself by nursing. I have had a good deal of employment in that way. I have never seen my husband since February 1876, and he has never communicated with me. I never knew where he was during that time. About the time I raised this action I ascertained that for the past ten or twelve years he has been in Newcastle-on-Tyne. During the time I was in service the family were with my husband. . . . The family were all just children when I left them, and I have never seen any of them since, with the exception of my son James, who is in Edinburgh. I have no information about the others except what I have derived from him. . . .” By the Court.— . . . “There was no one present except him and me at the time he turned me out. There was no quarrel, and I have just told what happened after he received the house and the children. I had taken the house myself, but I gave my home for my family, as they were young; and giving the home, my husband took charge of the children in the home. . . . After my husband and I parted in the way that I have just described, I was willing to have gone back to him if he had invited me. I expected him to renew communications with me. The reason I did not communicate with him myself was that I did not know whether I would be knocked down, or what would be done with me; and I thought that if my husband wanted me to come as his wife, he would have come for me. I say that if he had come I was willing to go.”

No. 135.

Murray v. Murray.

The pursuer further deponed—being recalled,—“When I was turned out of the house there were only two of my children at home, a third being in the hospital, and a fourth with his grandfather in the country. The two children who were at home came to see me in Mrs Gordon’s at least three times . . . my children stopped coming to see me, and I believe they were prevented by their father. I don’t know how long the children remained with my husband, but when I went down to the house in George Street, Newhaven, within six weeks after I was turned out, I found that there was nobody in the house, and that the house was closed up. . . . My reason for going down to the house . . . was that I heard that one of the children was ill. I went down to make inquiries, expecting to find them there, and I found the house shut up. After that I went repeatedly to the school to see the children, but they were not allowed to speak to me. . . .” By the Court.—“I lost all trace of the children about a year after February 1876.”

There was no direct evidence corroborative of the pursuer’s account of what took place on 1st February 1876.*

On 18th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary . . . finds that it has not been proved to his satisfaction that there has been wilful and malicious desertion on the part of the defender; therefore dismisses the action,” &c.†

* Mrs Murray, a sister of the pursuer’s, deponed in answer to the Lord Ordinary,—“When I saw the pursuer in Mrs Gordon’s she spoke to me about her husband’s cruelty and desertion, and not providing for her. (Q.) Did she speak as if she had left her husband voluntarily, or as if she had been put away? (A.) He did turn her out; he sold everything she had in the house, and she had nowhere to stay, and my sister was obliged to take her in. The defender did not remain in the house. (Q.) I am referring to the time when she went to your sister as nurse; how did she speak of that? (A.) Still in the same strain as I have just described; she had to leave him for his bad behaviour, and also because he sold the things in the house, and turned her completely out. (Q.) As I understand, the defender did not sell the things in the house, because he remained there with the children? (A.) She had to leave him for his cruelty. (Q.) Did she speak as if she had left voluntarily, or as if she had been put away against her will? (A.) She was put away decidedly against her will, as she would not leave the children; it was the children that kept her so long with him. (Q.) Did she speak as if she would be willing to go back if he invited her? (A.) Well, she was afraid to go back, he was so cruel and so wicked to her. She had gone back several times at my father and mother’s request. . . . (Q.) Attached as she was to her children, was she willing and anxious to go back to her husband, or was her fear of him so great that she would not have gone back in any case? (A.) I could hardly tell you; he was so wicked and so cruel to her that it would have been almost murder if she had gone back; and he was not providing for her.”

† “OPINION.— . . . Prima facie, these facts do not disclose a case of desertion by the husband, but rather a case of the wife forsaking the conjugal residence, and it would require clear and satisfactory evidence to convert that into desertion by the husband. I am of opinion that the evidence here is not sufficient for that purpose, because there is really nothing except the testimony of the wife herself to shew that her departure from her husband’s house was other than voluntary. If it was voluntary it may have been justified by the Murray v.

Murray.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case was heard some time ago, and delayed until the result of another case raising a cognate question,² which had been sent for hearing before seven Judges, was known.

This case is a peculiar one in several respects, and there is one peculiarity which renders the decision of it more difficult than it might have been in other circumstances, because the spouses who are the parties to the case have not cohabited since 1876, and as the action was brought only in March 1893, much evidence has, as was almost inevitable, been lost, which would have been available had the action been brought immediately on the termination of four years from the date of the alleged desertion. The pursuer thus comes to the Court in some respects at a disadvantage.

I have considered the case carefully, and after giving full effect to the case of Watson, 20th March 1890, 17 R. 736,—in which a majority of the whole Court were of opinion that it was not an essential prerequisite to obtaining divorce for desertion that the spouse who alleges desertion should have used efforts to resume cohabitation, but that it was a question of circumstances depending upon husband's long-continued cruelty ; but such a state of facts could never, in my opinion, found an action for divorce at the wife's instance on the ground of desertion.

"On the other hand, it may be the pursuer's misfortune, and not her fault, that she is unable to bring any corroboration of her own testimony ; but the fact remains that neither the children, who were in the house at the time, and who are still alive, nor any neighbour, nor anybody at all, is adduced to corroborate this material part of her story.

"That, I think, is sufficient for the decision of the case. But I must observe that, in my view, the case also fails because of the entire want of any evidence to shew that the pursuer really desired to renew cohabitation.

"When I say that there is an entire want of such evidence, I do not lay out of view that she herself said, in answer to a question of mine, that she would have been willing to go back to her husband if he had asked her. But I must test that answer by her conduct, and where a woman leaves her husband's house, for whatever cause, and remains away for a number of years, without making any inquiries for either her husband or her young children, I cannot accept her own unsupported statement that she was willing and anxious to go back. On this matter I think the opinions of the majority of the Judges in the whole Court case of Watson v. Watson (17 R. 736) are conclusive. They are probably most compendiously stated in the opinion of Lord Shand (page 743), where his Lordship says that 'desertion must be wilful ; it must be obstinately persisted in ; it must be without lawful excuse ; and it must clearly appear that the pursuer of the action throughout the period of four years of alleged desertion was desirous of cohabitation, and ready to renew it.' Now, if that be the law, as I think it is (and as I must take it to be, whether I agreed with it or not), I cannot say that it 'clearly appears,' in the present case, that this pursuer, throughout the period of four years, was 'desirous of cohabitation, and ready to renew it.' She may have had very good reason for not being ready to renew it ; it may even be that her husband had treated her so badly as to make her afraid to renew it. But the remedy for such a state of matters is not divorce for desertion, but judicial separation on the ground of cruelty ; and therefore, upon that ground, as well as upon the ground that desertion itself is not to my mind conclusively or satisfactorily proved, I must refuse the remedy which the pursuer here asks."

the merits of the particular case, and that no general rule could be laid down,— No. 135.
I have come to the conclusion that, although no doubt the case is a narrow one, Mar. 17, 1894.
the pursuer has established her right to obtain divorce. Murray v. Murray.

It is quite true that the defender treated his wife with great cruelty, and that that had some effect upon the pursuer's mind in regard to her desire to resume cohabitation. But, at the same time, I do not find in the evidence any distinct indication that she was not ready to resume cohabitation with the husband, if he was willing to take her back after he had turned her out of doors. On the other hand, it is plain, from the evidence, that he treated her with great violence and drove her from her home; that he took away the children from her, refused to let them speak to her, and that he made no effort to communicate with her himself. In short, his whole conduct was, in my opinion, that of a man who was desirous not to resume cohabitation with his wife. It is entirely a matter of circumstances, and in this case I think the pursuer is entitled to the remedy which she seeks.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree of divorce. The evidence is slender, but I think that we may hold it to be sufficient. It shews that the husband was cruel to his wife in order to produce and maintain a separation; that he withdrew himself and his children from her society, and concealed from her his place of residence. The case differs in very material respects from that of Gibson.

LORD TRAYNER.—The Lord Ordinary thinks that this is a case of a wife leaving or forsaking the conjugal residence on account of her husband's cruelty. If I thought that that was the proper or necessary view of the facts proved I should agree with the Lord Ordinary in refusing a decree of divorce. But I think the fact is quite otherwise. The pursuer did not leave the conjugal residence. She was extruded from it. The defender put his wife out of the house, sold off the furniture, and took away the children, having previously forbidden them to speak to their mother, the pursuer. The defender's conduct leaves no doubt on my mind that what he so did was done with the intention and purpose of putting an end to conjugal cohabitation with the pursuer. He has since lived away from the pursuer for about eighteen years, has never communicated with her, and has done nothing towards her support. That, I think, is desertion, and entitles the pursuer to the decree concluded for. This case is distinguished from the recent case of Gibson, in respect that there the facts were regarded by the majority of the Court as warranting the conclusion that the wife acquiesced in the husband's conduct, which (however cruel and unjustifiable in itself) did not necessarily lead to the view that he desired or intended to put an end to conjugal cohabitation. The Court thought that the parties living separate was a matter as to which both spouses were agreed. Such a view is, I think, excluded by the evidence in this case. I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and giving decree. I differ from the Lord Ordinary's opinion that a deserted wife, before being entitled to decree of divorce, must satisfy the Court that during the whole or any part of the statutory period of desertion she was desirous of returning to conjugal cohabitation.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted decree of divorce.

First Parties.—Sym.

Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop.

MRS ISABELLA BISHOP, Second Party.—Rankine—Crabb Watt.

Succession—Legitim—Amount of legitim fund—Father twice married—Whether legitim of children of first marriage diminished by provisions to children under antenuptial contract of second marriage.—A testator, who had been twice married, was survived by seven children, five of the first marriage and two of the second, and was predeceased by his second wife. The children of the first marriage had not discharged their legitim, but with respect to those of the second, the testator, by antenuptial contract with his second wife, in order to make a provision for the children of that marriage, bound himself to pay to them, at the first term after his death, “a just proportion and share of the means and estate that may happen to belong to him at his decease, along with the children of his former marriage, and along with the children of any future marriage,” and that equally or in such proportions as he might appoint, which provision was declared to be in full of legitim. By his settlement the testator directed his whole estate to be divided among all his children equally, but in terms which postponed vesting until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring a year after his death. One of the children of the first marriage, who had survived the testator, died before the period of vesting under the settlement, and his representative in consequence claimed the share of legitim which had vested in him at his father's death. The father's testamentary trustees maintained that two-sevenths were to be deducted from the executry before computing the amount of the legitim fund, on the ground that under the marriage-contract the two children of the second marriage were each creditors for one-seventh of the executry. These children made no claim under the marriage-contract.

Held that, whether the children of the second marriage were creditors under the marriage-contract or not, as they made no claim under that contract, it could not be put forward as a ground for diminishing the amount of the legitim fund.

Succession—Legitim—Interest.—Held that interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum was due upon a child's legitim from the date of the father's death, although the funds in the hands of the father's testamentary trustees had been earning only about 2 per cent.

2D DIVISION.

MR JOHN BAILLIE BISHOP, sometime secretary of the Royal Bank of Scotland, died on 17th March 1892. He was twice married. By his first wife he left five children, and by his second wife, who predeceased him, he left two.

There was no contract of marriage between Mr Bishop and his first wife, and none of their children discharged or transacted their claims for legitim.

By antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr Bishop and Miss Shaw, his second wife, dated 8th September 1855, Mr Bishop, for a provision to his then intended wife, conveyed to trustees for behoof of her in liferent allanarly, and the issue of the marriage in fee, a policy of insurance upon his life amounting to £499, 19s., and his household furniture, which provisions were accepted by Miss Shaw as in full of her legal claims. The contract then proceeded,—“And for a provision to the child or children who may be procreated of the said intended marriage, the said John Baillie Bishop hereby binds and obliges himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors, to content and pay to the issue of the said marriage, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after his death, a just proportion and share of the means and estate that may happen to belong to him at his decease, and exclusive of the sum that may be received under the said policy of insurance, along with the children of his former marriage, . . . and along with the children of any future marriage he may contract, and that either among them equally or in any other proportion, and either per capita or per stirpes, No. 136. in such manner and under such conditions and restrictions, including a power to restrict the interest of all or any of the said children to a life-rent provision, as he may appoint by a writing under his hand, which failing, among the said children equally per capita, which provisions shall be in full satisfaction to said children respectively of all bairn's part of gear, legitim, executry, and all other claim whatever which they, or any of them, can ask or demand out of the subjects and estate of their father in and through his decease, or out of the goods in communion between their parents respectively, excepting what further provisions the said John Baillie Bishop may hereafter think fit to bestow on them of his own goodwill and accord"; for which causes and of the other part Miss Shaw conveyed her whole estate to the marriage-contract trustees for behoof of herself, and of her said husband, in liferent, and of the issue of the marriage, whom failing, her own heirs, in fee.

Mar. 17, 1894.
Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop.

Mr Bishop left a holograph trust-disposition and settlement, dated 23d November 1888. By this deed, which contained no reference to the foregoing marriage-contract, he conveyed to trustees his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of every kind and description, and wheresoever situate, then owing and belonging, or which should be owing and belonging to him at the time of his death; and, after directing payment of his debts and sickbed and funeral expenses, and of a small legacy to his only daughter for mournings for herself and servants, he, in the third place, directed that his trustees should, "at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring one year after my death, divide the residue of my means and estate by equal shares between" his seven children, nominatim, "declaring that in the event of the death of any of them, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed to their parent's share, equally among them, and in the event of any of them dying without leaving lawful issue, the share that would have fallen to them shall be divided equally among the survivors and the lawful issue of such as shall have died leaving such issue."

Thomas Bishop, a son of the testator by his first marriage, died without leaving issue on 7th July 1892, and having thus died before the period appointed for the division of the residue of the testator's estate, he (as was admitted by the parties to the special case after mentioned) took no vested right under his father's settlement. The widow of Thomas Bishop, as his sole executrix and universal legatory, then claimed the share of legitim which had vested in her husband at his father's death, and questions having arisen with respect to the amount to which she was thus entitled a special case was presented, the trustees of Mr Bishop senior being the first parties and Mrs Thomas Bishop being the second party.

The questions in law were:—“(1) Whether or not two-sevenths of the free personal estate of the truster falls to be deducted before striking the amount of legitim due to the late Thomas Bishop? (2) Ought the rate of interest payable by the trustees in respect of legitim to be restricted to the rate actually earned, and if not, what is the rate payable?”

With respect to the first question, the first parties maintained that in computing the legitim fund two-sevenths of the executry was to be deducted on the ground that the testator's two children by his second marriage were, under their parents' marriage-contract, creditors for one-seventh each of the executry. In this view, the second party was entitled to one-fifth of one-half of the executry after it had suffered diminution to the extent of two-sevenths, and the entire remainder of the testator's property not otherwise disposed of and including the said two-sevenths fell to be divided among the testator's six surviving chil-

No. 136. Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop. Mar. 17, 1894. dren in equal shares. On the other hand the second party, while not disputing that the division should take place according to the proportions just mentioned, maintained that the legitim fund ought to be calculated on the basis of taking the whole free executry without deducting two-sevenths in respect of the provision to the children of the second marriage under the marriage-contract, on the ground that these children were not thereby constituted creditors whose debts were to be deducted before striking the legitim fund.¹

With respect to the second question, the first parties maintained that the second party was entitled to interest only at the average rate actually earned—about 2 per cent. The second party claimed interest at the rate of 5 per cent.²

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Mr Bishop was twice married. He was survived by seven children, of whom five were by the first marriage and two by the second. His wife predeceased him.

There was no marriage-contract on his first marriage. But when he married his second wife he entered into an antenuptial contract. By that deed, in order to make a provision for the children of the marriage, he bound himself to pay to them on his death “a just proportion and share of the means and estate that may happen to belong to him at his death, along with the children of his former marriage,” and any children that might be born of any future marriage, “and that either among them equally or in any other proportion as he may appoint.” These provisions were made in full of legitim.

Mr Bishop left a settlement under which he directed his trustees at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring one year after his death to divide his whole estate equally among his children, declaring that the issue of deceaseds should take the parents' share, and “in the event of any of them dying without leaving lawful issue, the share that would have fallen to them shall be divided equally among the survivors.”

One son survived Mr Bishop, but died before the period of distribution without leaving issue. Consequently no right vested in him, and under the will the estate is divisible in equal shares among the six survivors. The son left a widow, whom he made his universal legatee. She claims his legitim, to which she is no doubt entitled. But she further maintains that the legitim fund is one-half of the entire estate, and is not to be diminished by the amount payable under the contract to the children of the second marriage.

On the other hand, the trustees maintain that two-sevenths of the executry estate is to be deducted before the legitim fund is struck. They do so on the ground that the children of the second marriage are under the marriage-contract creditors for that amount. The remainder of the estate would then be divisible

Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop.

I have grave doubts whether the children of the second marriage are under the antenuptial contract creditors for two-sevenths of the executry. It may well be that they have no higher right than to receive as much as the others. But whatever view is taken of that question it is plain that the will of Mr Bishop satisfied all the obligations which he undertook. For the children will receive more under the will than under the contract. I assume, therefore, that they do not repudiate the will. It is their interest to accept it, and I take it for granted that they do so. But in that case they have no other claim than that the estate shall be distributed according to the will. They cannot claim two-sevenths of the executry under the marriage-contract and two-sixths of the remainder under the will. It follows that in claiming under the will they surrender the less valuable marriage-contract provisions, and these provisions being surrendered cannot form a charge against the executry estate.

Of course if the children were creditors for a debt of which they could exact payment, and at the same time claim their rights under the will, the debt must be deducted before the legitim fund is struck. But a debt which is surrendered can have no effect. It is in the same position as if it had never been due.

It is not proposed to exact payment of the two-sevenths of the executry. The marriage-contract is put forward only as a means of diminishing the amount payable as legitim, but without diminishing the amount of the dead's part. When the legitim at its reduced amount is paid, the residue will be divided in equal sixths amongst all the children. So that the shares of the legatees are increased. In my opinion this is wholly illegitimate. If there be a debt, it diminishes dead's part as well as legitim, and if it does not diminish both it diminishes neither. The children of the second marriage cannot plead the marriage-contract against the other children, because they are claiming as equal legatees, and the latter cannot found on it in order to enlarge their legacies.

It seems to me that the case of the trustees would have been more plausible if they had maintained that the children of the second marriage were creditors for as much as might be given to the other children, and that they were entitled to exact their share as a debt. But even on this view they would not in my opinion be entitled to prevail. For the debt due under the marriage-contract is not defined by that deed. It is the amount due under a will. Consequently it cannot be ascertained without deducting legitim; for nothing can be due under a will until that deduction be made.

Again the claim under the marriage-contract is for a just proportion and share with the other children. It follows, I think, that both sets of children are to have equal shares in the same fund.

The marriage-contract which gives a claim for equality cannot be used to produce inequality. In the view which I am now considering inequality would be the necessary result, because each of the children of the second marriage would take one-sixth of the entire executry, while each of the other children would take a fourth of the remainder after deducting from that remainder the legitim due to the second party. It might be said that this is not a just inference inasmuch as all the children would take an equal share of the remainder after the payment of legitim. But this equality is only attained by a surrender of the claims under the marriage-contract, after they are used to diminish the

No. 136. legitim, and with the result of giving to the children more than they can claim as legatees.

Mar. 17, 1894.
Bishop's Trustees v. Bishop.

In this case the testator has disposed of his whole estate by a universal settlement, which embraces the legitim fund as well as the dead's part. It is, as I have said, the interest of the children of the second marriage to surrender their marriage-contract provisions in order to obtain the greater benefit which they take under the will. The share of each child under the will is a sixth of the estate after deduction of the legitim due to the second party, and in my opinion the marriage-contract cannot be used to obtain more either for the children of the second marriage or for the children of the first.

Legitim is a debt due at the date of the father's decease, and it bears interest at five per cent from that date till payment. I need not enter on this question. It is sufficient to refer to the case of M'Murray, 14 D. 1048, and especially to the interlocutor of the Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is the opinion of the Court.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT found that two-sevenths of the free personal estate of the truster did not fall to be deducted before striking the amount of the legitim fund, and that the rate of interest payable by the trustees in respect of the legitim found due to the second party was five per cent per annum.

Sale—Disconformity to contract—Timeous inspection by buyer—Loss of profit—Consequential damages.—In June 1891, W, a market gardener, ordered from a firm of seed-merchants 30 lbs of "Enfield market cabbage" seed, an early variety of cabbage. The invoice and the packet in which the seed was sent bore that the seed was of the variety ordered. W sowed the seed in his own garden, and retailed the plants to customers who ordered early cabbage plants, some in September 1891, but the bulk in March, April, and May 1892. In May 1892, when most of the plants were sold, W discovered that the crop was of a late variety, and ploughed down the remaining plants. In an action for damages against the seed-merchants it was proved that a skilled gardener could have discovered in September 1891 that the plants were disconform to contract. Held (1) that W was entitled to damages in respect that, owing to the defenders' breach of contract, his ground had been for a considerable time occupied with an unremunerative crop; but (2) that inasmuch as he had failed to discover, as he would have done had he made an inspection, the mistake in the variety of plant in September 1891, he was not entitled to damages on the grounds that claims of damages had been made against him by the buyers of the plants, and that he had lost business owing to the disappointment of his customers.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Berwickshire.

In December 1892, John Wilson, gardener, Crailing Orchard, near Jedburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Duns, against R. Carmichael & Sons, agricultural seedsmen, Coldstream, concluding for £200 damages for breach of contract.

The pursuer averred that in May 1891 he met one of the partners of the defenders' firm at Kelso, and ordered from him 30 lbs of "Enfield market cabbage seed," an early kind of cabbage. The seeds were sent on 4th June, in a parcel marked "Enfield market cabbage." They had been procured by the defenders from well-known seed-merchants in No. 137. Edinburgh.

The seed was sown in the pursuer's own garden in July 1891, and a good crop having come up the pursuer retailed them to his customers as early cabbages in September 1891, and in March, April, and May 1892. (Cond. 6) "After he had disposed of the greater portion of the plants, the pursuer discovered that the seed which he had received from the defenders had not been Enfield market cabbage," but that of a common or late cabbage. (Cond. 7) "In consequence of the pursuer having sold the plants grown from the seed supplied by the defenders, marked 'Enfield market' to his customers as early cabbage, he has since been threatened by claims of damages by several of the persons who received the plants. Explained that about 200,000 plants were sold to the pursuer's customers, and that said customers numbered about one hundred." (Cond. 8) "The pursuer has suffered, and will suffer, much loss to his business in consequence of his having (through the fault of the defenders) sold late cabbage in place of early ones."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having failed to deliver Enfield cabbage seed as contracted for, they are liable in damages. (2) The defenders having delivered a late variety of cabbage seed in place of the variety contracted for, they have caused loss and damage to the pursuer as condescended on, and he is entitled to the amount of damages sued for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having known that the plants sold by him were of a late variety of cabbage, is barred from claiming damages.

Proof was led, from which it appeared that it was impossible to tell early from late cabbages in the seed, but that by September a skilled person could have told whether they were of an early variety. This was admitted by the pursuer, but he explained that in that and the succeeding autumn months he did not go near the field in which they were growing, being unable to do so from illness, and that the crop was superintended by his son, who had not the same knowledge of gardening as he had. Up to the end of May about 200,000 plants were retailed to customers, all as early cabbages. About the middle of May the pursuer transplanted a number of the plants to another part of his garden with the view of selling them as grown cabbages. He then discovered that they were of a late variety, ceased to sell them and ploughed down the remaining plants—about 70,000 to 100,000 in number. Many customers complained to the pursuer of the plants supplied to them, and several of them made claims for damages.

On 31st March 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Dundas) assolizied the defenders. On appeal the Sheriff (Hope) found that the defenders had committed a breach of contract, and allowed additional proof of the amount of damage. After additional proof on 27th October the Sheriff assessed the damages at £80.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The pursuer should have discovered the fact that the cabbages were late cabbages in September at latest, and should have sold them as such, and called on the defenders to supply early plants. He had neglected his duty of inspection, and was not entitled to damages consequent on his neglect. The duty of the pursuer was to discover the disconformity to contract, and then to minimise the damage by selling the plants as late plants, and to claim from the defenders the difference in price, or to ask them to give him early plants to satisfy his customers. He should have taken this course even after finding out that they were late plants in May, and certainly had no right to plough down the remainder of the crop. In estimating damages in such cases as this where an innocent mistake had been made, the lowest possible scale of damage should be adopted; and further, the defenders were not liable in damages incurred by subvendees.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—When he bought the seed it was impossible to know early from late seeds. The defenders did not attempt to prove that he could have known. That being so, it was not his duty to make any minute examination of the plants in September. The question was whether he had taken reasonable means to mitigate the damage. The onus of shewing how he could have done more in that direction was on the defenders, and they had not pointed at anything which he could have done. The ploughed-down plants were unsaleable, and the defenders had not even averred that they were saleable.² The damages were not in the circumstances excessive. The defenders were liable for damages incurred by the subvendees.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The argument in this appeal proceeded upon the footing that the seed supplied was disconform to contract, the difference being that it was seed of late cabbages, whereas the contract was for the seed of early cabbages. The difficulty in the way of the pursuer's case arises from the facts relating to a later stage of events. The defence that the goods were not timeously rejected is plainly inappropriate. The question is therefore really as to the amount of damage; but although the tendency of the Court is to support a Sheriff's award of damages we cannot evade the decision of such definite questions as the defender has raised under this appeal, although the amount involved is not large.

The seed was sown in July 1891 in the pursuer's own market garden, and the plants came up. The evidence of the pursuer himself seems to shew quite clearly (indeed he says so in so many words) that by the month of September any skilled gardener can tell the difference between early and late cabbage plants. Unfortunately the difference was not noticed, the reason apparently being that the pursuer's son had not had much experience at that time, and the pursuer personally was not about. But not the less is it the case that, in the ordinary course of events, the difference would have been noticed. Well, then, from September onwards, sales were made of the plants as early cabbage plants, and the two first heads of damage arise (1) from claims of damages by the purchasers of those plants; and (2) loss of business arising from the disappointment of customers, leading them to give up dealing with the pursuer. I have come to the opinion that the pursuer cannot recover on those grounds. The proximate cause of the mistake of the customer's getting late instead of early plants was the omission of the pursuer or his son to notice that the plants which he sold to his customers were late cabbages, and this was not a natural consequence of the defenders' breach of contract.

The next head of damage relates to certain of the plants which were transplanted about the middle of May and dealt with by the pursuer as early cabbages for retail sale. But unfortunately here the same answer applies. It was only after the transplanting that the discovery was made, which, in ordinary course, should have been made the September before, and if the discovery had been made, the transplanting would never have taken place. Wilson v.

Carmichael & Sons.

The disallowance of the three heads of damage which I have now gone over would strike £60 off the sum which the Sheriff has awarded. The remaining £20 was mainly supported in argument by a theory about "ploughing down" in May, which comes perilously near the objection which wrecks the other claims. I think, however, that an award of damages to the amount of £20 may be justified upon somewhat broader grounds. It was directly due to the breach of contract that the pursuer's nursery ground was to a considerable extent, and for a considerable time, occupied with seed which, on the evidence, was not remunerative. Even if the pursuer had made the discovery in September, the general facts of the case warrant the inference that he had already to a certain extent irretrievably lost the profitable occupation of his ground, and a certain amount of labour. It is to be regretted that the pursuer has not, in evidence, made this aspect of his case clearer, his attention having been too much given to claims which are unsound in law. But the evidence seems to me adequately to support an award of £20.

I am for recalling the last interlocutor of the Sheriff, finding in fact that the seeds supplied were disconform to contract, and that the pursuer has suffered damage to the amount of £20. On these two findings in fact, and the appropriate and obvious finding in law, I would give the pursuer decree for £20.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 27th October 1893: Find in fact that the seeds supplied by the appellants (defenders) were disconform to contract: Find in law that the defenders are liable in damages: Find in fact that the pursuer has suffered damage to the amount of £20: Decern for payment by the defenders to the pursuer of £20: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court, and to half the expenses in this Court, and remit," &c.

Magistrates of Partick.
1st Division.
LdStormonth-Darling.

ON 6th November 1893 Hugh Tennent junior, wine and spirit-merchant, 191 Byres Road, Partick, in the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, who held a public-house certificate for these premises, granted by the Justices of the Peace of the Lower Ward, brought an action against the Magistrates and Police Commissioners of Partick, and also against George Gray, clerk of the peace for the Lower Ward, as representing the Justices, for any interest competent to them, in which he concluded for declarator that the defenders the Magistrates of Partick had no right or title to act as the licensing authority for the said burgh in so far as regarded the granting or refusing of certificates or the renewal or transfer of certificates for licensed premises under the Public-Houses Acts, and in particular, or otherwise, that the said defenders had no right or title to assert or exercise jurisdiction as regarded the granting, refusing, renewing, or transferring of a certificate for the pursuer's said premises, and for interdict against the said defenders acting as such licensing authority.

The Magistrates and Police Commissioners of Partick alone lodged defences.

The circumstances out of which the action arose were as follow :—

Previous to the passing of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, the right of granting and renewing licences for the sale of exciseable liquors in Scotland was vested in two sets of authorities, viz., the Justices of the Peace for counties and districts, and the magistrates of royal burghs for such burghs. By the Act of 1862 the magistrates of parliamentary burghs were invested with the licensing authority for these burghs.

The question raised in the present action was whether the magistrates of police burghs—of which Partick was one—had been constituted the licensing authority for such burghs, by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55).

This question depended primarily on section 38 of that Act, which was in these terms :—"The magistrates and commissioners elected in virtue of this Act shall, within the limits of the burgh, for the purposes of this Act, possess such and the like rights, powers, authorities and jurisdiction, as are possessed by the magistrates and council of royal and parliamentary burghs in Scotland." The other clauses of the Act founded on by the parties in argument are sufficiently set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.

On 9th June 1893 the Justices of the Peace of the Lower Ward, at a general meeting of Quarter Sessions, passed a resolution to the effect that their jurisdiction with respect to the granting, &c. of public-house certificates had not been taken away nor in any way interfered with by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. This resolution was, on 14th June, intimated to the pursuer.

On 17th June the Magistrates of Partick issued a circular, of which the pursuer received a copy, notifying that they claimed under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to be the licensing authority within the burgh of Partick, and that as such they would from that date proceed to deal with the granting, &c. of licences within the burgh. Further, at a meeting held on 22d August, they proceeded to grant transfers for the current year of certain certificates which had been granted by the Justices of the Lower Ward, and on 17th October the magistrates held a meeting, which had previously been intimated to the pursuer and the other licence holders in Partick, as being the half-yearly statutory Licensing Court.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator No. 138. and interdict, with expenses, as concluded for, in respect that the defenders, the Magistrates of the said burgh of Partick, have unwarrantably asserted and exercised jurisdiction as regards the granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring of certificates under the Public-Houses Acts for premises situated in the burgh of Partick, and, in particular, for the licensed premises in the said burgh occupied by the pursuer.

Mar. 20, 1894.
Tennent v.
Magistrates of
Partick.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) On a just and sound construction of the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the right of granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring certificates under the Public-Houses Acts for premises within the burgh of Partick at meetings of the licensing authority held subsequent to 15th May 1893, and the right of imposing punishment for the breach of said or existing certificates, or for other contraventions of said Acts, have been conferred on these defenders.

On 13th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) granted decree of declarator and interdict as craved.*

* "OPINION.— . . . Admittedly, in all the 518 clauses of which the Act consists, there is no mention of the Public-Houses Acts except in sections 501 and 515, which relate to offences against these Acts. But it cannot be said that the right to try offences against these Acts implies the right to grant certificates under them, because during the thirty years from 1862 to 1892 the magistrates of police burghs possessed the first of these rights and not the second. If, therefore, the right of licensing in burghs which are neither royal nor parliamentary has been taken away from the justices and conferred on the magistrates, it must be by implication from some general clause. I state the question as one of transfer from the one body to the other, because the notion of a concurrent jurisdiction is quite inadmissible. No such thing has ever existed in licensing law, and the objections to it are too obvious to require argument.— (See Booth v. Lang, 5 Irv. 371.)

"The first observation which occurs to one is that an existing jurisdiction is not usually taken away except by clear and precise words. The defenders endeavour to meet that difficulty by pointing to the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862, in which the divestiture of the justices and the investiture of the magistrates in parliamentary burghs with the power of licensing is accomplished mainly by the interpretation clause, which defines 'burgh' as including any royal or parliamentary burgh. But the whole tenor of the Act makes it plain that in the limited class of parliamentary burghs the justices are no longer to exercise their former jurisdiction. The provisions as to meetings and procedure, the forms of applications and certificates, the reference in sections 6 and 10 to the 'respective jurisdictions' of the justices and magistrates, all shew conclusively that the Legislature intended to substitute the one authority for the other. Above all, there is, in section 32, a careful provision for protecting the vested interests which would be damaged by the transference. I refer to the provision that the town-clerks of parliamentary burghs should pay to existing clerks of the peace, during their tenure of office, one-half of the fees received by them in connection with licensing business. The Act of 1862, therefore, affords no aid to the argument that a transfer of jurisdiction may be accomplished by mere implication.

"Now, what are the words by which the transfer is said to be effected— [His Lordship quoted sec. 38]. The defenders' argument is, that as licensing is one of the rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdictions possessed by the magistrates of royal and parliamentary burghs, it is conferred on the magistrates of police burghs by this clause.

"The first answer made by the pursuer to this argument, and I confess I think it a formidable one, is that the clause professes to deal with the rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdictions, not of the magistrates, but of the magistrates and council, of royal and parliamentary burghs, and similarly that

Tennent v.
Magistrates of
Partick.

At the hearing, doubts having been expressed from the bench as to the

it confers these, not on the magistrates, but on the magistrates and commissioners of police burghs. If this be sound, it is conclusive of the question, because the right of licensing was never vested in the magistrates and council of any burgh. Licensing is a discretionary power, to be exercised judicially—(Sharp v. Wakefield, 1891, App. Ca., per Lord Chancellor, at p. 179), and it belongs to the magisterial office, as distinguished from the deliberative functions of the council. The defenders say that the clause ought to be read distributively. I do not know what warrant there is for this, in the absence of any distributive phrase like 'or either of them,' or 'respectively.' Without such words, I think it would be a very loose reading of the clause to apply to it powers which the magistrates possess apart from the council. And I am confirmed in this view by finding in the Act another section (the 454th) by which it is declared, inter alia, that the magistrates of a police burgh 'shall have the like jurisdiction within the burgh, as any magistrate of a royal burgh, or any dean of guild of a royal burgh, has by the law of Scotland.' It is conceded by the defenders that this clause truly refers to police offences, and does not help their case in the question of licensing. But if section 38 had been intended to have the wide effect for which they contend, there was no need for any other words assimilating the jurisdiction of the magistrates of police burghs to that of the magistrates of royal burghs. If they are right, the thing has been done already.

"The second answer made by the pursuer to the defenders' argument on section 38 is that the assimilation of powers thereby enacted is controlled by the words 'for the purposes of this Act.' The commas inserted by the Queen's printer rather look as if these words referred merely to the limits of the burgh, and that is what the defenders say they do refer to. But there is no punctuation in the rolls of Parliament, and therefore Courts of law are not bound by the punctuation in the printed copies—(see C. J. Cockburn's opinion in Stephenson, 1 Best and Smith, at p. 106, and Lord Romilly's in Barrow, 24 Beav. at p. 327). I am disposed to regard the words in question as governing the whole clause. The Dean of Faculty referred to some other sections, particularly sections 8, 11, and 13, in which the words clearly refer to the boundaries of the burgh. But these are sections dealing exclusively with boundaries, and therefore the words could not refer to anything else. Here, on the other hand, the subject-matter of the clause is the powers of the magistrates and commissioners, and it seems natural to refer the restrictive words to the matter in hand. In the other clause relating to jurisdiction (the 454th) the words 'within the burgh' are not followed by the words 'for the purposes of this Act,' shewing that the words 'within the burgh' were thought sufficient to describe the area within which jurisdiction was to be exercised, and therefore that the words 'for the purposes of this Act' where they do occur ought to receive a wider application. Admittedly the assimilation of powers in the 38th section is not a complete or universal assimilation, for one of the rights of the magistrates and council of a royal burgh is to return a representative to the Convention, and it cannot be pretended that the right is conferred on police burghs. If the rights and powers (whatever they may be) are conferred only for the purposes of this Act, the clause is perfectly intelligible, and (as I shall presently shew) harmonious with the rest of the Act, and with the previous Acts on the same subject. So read, its effect is simply to invest the municipal authority of police burghs with such rights and powers, not otherwise conferred, as had been found useful in the older class of burghs in enabling the corresponding authorities to perform their functions. That, I think, is the true meaning of the clause; but it is a meaning entirely inconsistent with the notion that the clause has the effect of sweeping in a kind of jurisdiction which is not to be found among the declared purposes of the Act.

"There is yet a third answer made by the pursuer to the defenders' construction of the clause, which is to my mind conclusive in itself. It is this, that competency of the action, the pursuer was called upon to submit argument on that point, and argued accordingly;—The action was competent. No. 138.

Mar. 20, 1894.
Tennent v.
Magistrates of Partick.

the defenders' construction is inconsistent both with the other parts of the statute and with prior statutes on the same subject.

"Taking first the statute itself, we find in section 431 an express provision that the magistrates shall be the local authority for the purposes of the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889, and that the word 'burgh' in these Acts 'shall include any burgh under this Act.' Now, if the defenders' argument be sound, that provision was entirely unnecessary, for the Weights and Measures Act of 1878 (by section 50 and schedule IV.) provided that the local authority should be the magistrates of a burgh, and burgh was defined (by section 74) as including royal and parliamentary burghs. According to the defenders, then, the framers of the Act ought to have been content with the sweeping effect of section 38, which had already conferred on the magistrates of police burghs all the rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdiction of the magistrates of royal and parliamentary burghs. Again, by section 432 it is enacted that the commissioners of any burgh under this Act shall be the local authority under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Why take the trouble to say that if by section 38 (reading it distributively as the defenders say it ought to be read) all the rights and powers of the councils of royal and parliamentary burghs had already been conferred on the commissioners of police burghs, seeing that among these rights and powers the power of acting as local authority under the Food and Drugs Act had been included by sections 10 and 33 of the Act itself? I mention these as instances which have resulted from my own examination of this voluminous statute, but I daresay there are others.

"It is, however, when we come to consider the effect of clauses almost identical that we realise the full difficulty of attributing to it the meaning for which the defenders contend. [His Lordship then referred to the Act 3 and 4 William IV. cap. 77, section 30.] The two clauses are in substance identical, and the clause in the Act of 1833 would have been just as good for conferring jurisdiction in licensing matters on the magistrates of parliamentary burghs as the clause in the Act of 1892 can possibly be for conferring it on the magistrates of police burghs. Yet we know that the magistrates of parliamentary burghs had no such jurisdiction until it was conferred upon them by the Public-House Act of 1862.

"Again, in the Police and Improvement Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 33) there was a clause (section 345), not indeed identical with section 38, but I cannot see why, if the defenders' argument be sound, it should not have been read as conferring licensing jurisdiction on the magistrates of police burghs. For it provided that the magistrates should have 'all such and the like jurisdiction' within such burgh as any magistrate of a royal burgh. Yet not even the defenders allege that the magistrates of police burghs had licensing jurisdiction until the Act of 1892 came into operation. I say the same of section 408 of the Police and Improvement Act, 1862.

"Both parties appealed to the general scope and tenor of the Act of 1892. The pursuer maintained that the terms of the preamble excluded the notion that it was intended to deal with licensing. I do not assent to that, for I think that the preamble is wide enough to cover it. But neither can I adopt the defenders' view that the leading purpose of the Act was to gather into one administrative body all the functions of local government within police burghs. In many police burghs, county councils and district committees still exercise important powers of administration and assessment as regards roads, the police force, and other matters. There may be many reasons why licensing jurisdiction should have been conferred on police burghs so populous and important as that which the defenders represent, but there may also be some reasons why it should not have been conferred on the newer and smaller burghs. Possibly a solution might have been found in drawing a line in respect of population. But these are matters of policy with which I have nothing to do. The only question which I have to decide is whether the effect of the Act is to transfer

No. 138. It was well settled that the Court had jurisdiction both to compel inferior judicatories to exercise their powers and to restrain them from exceeding their powers. This jurisdiction had been recognised in regard to presbyteries,¹ magistrates,² inspectors of poor,³ commissioners of supply,⁴ and arbiters.⁵ [LORD KINNEAR.—It is hardly doubtful that the Court has jurisdiction. The question is,—Have you, an individual, a title to sue a general declarator against a body of magistrates?] It was not a general declarator merely, for there were particular operative conclusions directed with reference to the pursuer's individual position and rights; and the pursuer, who was a licence-holder and not merely one who desired to obtain a licence, and who was threatened with the interference of a body which, he believed, had no right to interfere, had a sufficient patrimonial interest entitling him to sue the action.⁶

The defenders, who did not maintain that the action was incompetent, were not called upon to argue the question of competency.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are satisfied that the pursuer has a sufficient title to sue.

The arguments on the merits sufficiently appear from the opinions.⁷
At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Magistrates of Partick maintain that, by section 38 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the Justices of the Peace for the licensing jurisdiction from the justices to the magistrates. My opinion is that, if such had been the intention, there ought to have been, and there would have been, a careful enactment making the provisions of the Licensing Acts of 1828 to 1887 (which were fully in view of the framers of the Act, for they are mentioned in section 501) applicable to the new régime. I take the words of Lord Halsbury in Sharp v. Wakefield, at p. 182 of App. Ca. 1891, and I say, —‘In a matter so constantly before the Legislature as the licensing laws, I cannot but think that if it was intended to alter the law in this respect it would have been done in plain and unambiguous language.’

“For these reasons I have come to the conclusion (I confess without any hesitation) that the right of granting and renewing certificates remains unaffected by the Act, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for.”

Lower Ward of Lanarkshire have been divested of the power and duty of granting certificates for licences to sell excisable liquors within the police burgh of Partick, and that that power and duty is now vested in themselves. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the idea of a concurrent jurisdiction in granting licences is impossible; and the defenders' argument necessarily involves the idea of transfer from the county magistrates.

No. 138.
Mar. 20, 1894.
Tennent v.
Magistrates of
Partick.

Now, I shall assume, throughout this opinion, that the effect of the section is, for the purposes of the Act, to give to the magistrates of police burghs such powers as the magistrates of royal and parliamentary burghs possess. The grant of powers, however, is qualified by these words "for the purposes of this Act," for it is impossible to hold them confined to the words "limits of the burgh." Now, the proper and professed function of a clause like section 38 is to effectuate the other provisions of the Act; it is executive of the purposes of the Act; for those purposes it gives the magistrates the powers which certain other magistrates possess. Accordingly, section 38 is not a self-contained section, it bids us look outside its own terms for its scope, and points to the other sections of the Act for information as to what its purposes are. I shall briefly state the result of my examination of the statute.

First of all, the preamble of the Act is legitimately referred to for ascertaining the purposes of the Act. The laws which are to be amended are the laws relating to the police and sanitary administration of towns and populous places. Now, I do not think that, even if the word "police" receive a very wide construction, it would necessarily or probably be expected to include the licensing of public-houses, especially when we find historically that changes in the licensing bodies have been effected, not in Police Acts, but in Acts relating directly to the liquor laws.

Another part of the Act which bears on this general question of its purposes is the 5th section. There the Act is said to supersede and come in place of local Police Acts,—treating therefore presumably of the same or similar matters.

When we go on to examine the very numerous specific enactments contained in this statute, the antecedent impression which one derives from those initial passages to which I have referred is entirely confirmed. The Act is very busy with a vast number of things, and has plenty to say about the minutiae of all that it interests itself in. If so distinct a branch of magisterial duty as the licensing of public-houses were in its view, it would certainly have said something about it, more especially as there was an existing licensing body to oust. And yet the subject of granting licences is never so much as named. This is the more striking that the liquor laws are mentioned in sections 501 and 515, for the purpose of seeing that the magistrates deal with prosecutions for offences against them. Again, the string of sections about licensing theatres is in marked contrast to the blank about licensing public-houses, although the omitted subject is of at least equal importance. Those sections, in explicit terms, authorise magistrates to grant licences to theatres.

On a review of the whole statute I can find no indication that the amendment of the law relating to the licensing of public-houses is one of the purposes of the Act. There are in the Act no specific provisions on this particular subject; it is not necessarily or naturally within the general terms employed as descriptive of the purposes of the Act, and the scheme of the Act makes the conclusion to my thinking irresistible that the reason why it is not specifically provided for is that it was not in contemplation.

Tennent v.
Magistrates of
Partick.

I may add that it cannot be said that, if we hold the granting of licences to be within the Act, it has rendered the police burghs entirely autonomous; the smaller burghs are not allowed to establish police forces,—that is done by the county,—and in one or two other matters the county authorities still regulate.

I have said that I assume that the 38th section deals with the magistrates and the commissioners distributively. I say so for this reason that, looking to the interpretation clause, voce “commissioners”; to section 55; to the immense series of sections in which the expression “the commissioners” is used, and to the absence of any (other than that in dispute) in which the phrase the magistrates and commissioners occurs as equivalent to the commissioners, I am not convinced of the soundness of the argument that section 38 gives no separate power to the Magistrates as distinguished from the Commissioners. With that reservation, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I am for adhering to his Lordship’s interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—It appears to me that the decision of this case is primarily—almost altogether—dependent on the proper construction of section 38 of the Act. It was said to us that the effect of that clause was to confer on the magistrates and commissioners elected by virtue of the new Act all the powers, authorities, and jurisdictions of whatever kind conferred upon the Magistrates and Council of royal burghs. If that had been the proper construction of the Act it would have conferred upon the Magistrates and Commissioners of Partick, as the licensing authority, the right of issuing licences and so on. The other view which was presented to us was that that was not the true construction of the clause, but that it was limited by the words “for the purposes of this Act.” In the latter view we require to go to the other clauses of the Act to see what the purposes of the Act are. If we do not find within the Act words authorising and empowering the magistrates of new burghs to issue licences, then such a power is not within this 38th section.

I concur with your Lordship on the construction of this clause. I think that the intention of the clause is to confer on magistrates and commissioners elected in virtue of the new Act the like rights which were possessed by the magistrates of royal and parliamentary burghs “for the purposes of this Act,” and not otherwise. I think that is the only possible construction.

That being so, I have gone to the Act to find what the purposes of the Act are, and I agree with your Lordship that when we look to the 500 or 600 sections of this Act we do not find that there is any provision dealing with the granting, refusing, renewing, and transferring of certificates under the Public-Houses Acts. I do not think therefore that the Act confers upon the magistrates of police burghs the powers, in respect to these matters, which the magistrates of royal and parliamentary burghs had.

Therefore, I agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

DAVID MURRAY (Mr and Mrs Freckleton's Judicial Factor), Claimant (Respondent).—D. Dundas—M'Nair.

STATE SCHOOL COMMISSIONER FOR THE STATE OF GEORGIA, U.S.A., Claimant.

JOHN KINLOCH AND OTHERS, Claimants.

Revenue—Legacy-duty—Legacy compounded for less than the amount thereof—Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, secs. 23 and 37.—The Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, sec. 23, enacts that where a legacy shall be released for a consideration or compounded for less than the value thereof, legacy-duty shall be paid in respect of such legacy according to the amount taken in satisfaction thereof.

A competition between a person claiming a bequest on behalf of a class of beneficiaries under a will and the next of kin (a niece) of the testator, who maintained that the bequest was void from uncertainty, was terminated by joint minute under which each party received one-half of the subject of the bequest. The Court interposed authority to the minute, and in terms thereof ranked and preferred each claimant to one-half of the fund.

The Crown then claimed legacy-duty at the rate of 10 per cent on the whole fund, on the ground that as the bequest had not been set aside the rate of duty for the whole was that payable by strangers in blood to the testator. The testator's next of kin maintained that the rate of duty on the half payable to her under the arrangement ought to be 3 per cent only.

Held that, under section 23 of the Act, the bequest having been released for payment of one-half of its amount, duty at the rate of 10 per cent was payable on that half only, and that the half payable to the next of kin was liable to 3 per cent duty.

JOHN MACLEARN, residing in Renfrew Street, Glasgow, died on 9th^{1st DIVISION.} July 1836, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th August 1834, by which he conveyed his whole estates to trustees for the purposes therein specified, and, inter alia, directed his trustees to convey to certain persons named, who were resident in Savannah, State of Georgia, United States of America, one-half of whatever sum he might be found entitled to receive out of the estates of a deceased brother and nephew, the said sum to be applied by these persons in the education of the negro or slave population upon the plantation of Gourie on the Savannah River, so soon as the laws of the State of Georgia should permit the education of the negro or slave population.

The persons named declined to accept this trust on the ground that, by an Act of the Legislature of Georgia passed in 1829 it was a punishable offence to teach a slave or a free person of colour to read or write. The testator's general trustees then brought an action of multiplepinding and exoneration, which resulted in the sum of £262, 3s. 2d. (being one-half of the estates above mentioned after deduction of expenses) being consigned to await the contingency contemplated by the testator, and the general trustees were exonerated and discharged.

Nothing was done with regard to the consigned money until September 1890, when Archibald Macrae, accountant, Glasgow, was appointed judicial factor on the fund, in a petition at the instance of certain of the residuary legatees and next of kin of the testator.

The factor having uplifted the consigned money, which with interest amounted to £734, 18s. 11d., then brought the present action of multiplepinding for its distribution.

Claims were lodged for David Murray, judicial factor on the marriage-contract trust of Mr and Mrs Freckleton, Mrs Freckleton having been a niece of the testator and his next of kin; and for John Kinloch and

No. 139. Mar. 20, 1894. Lord Advocate v. Freckleton's Judicial Factor. others, the representatives of certain of the testator's residuary legatees. Both these claims proceeded on the footing that the bequest to the negroes was void from uncertainty, Freckleton's factor primo loco claiming the whole fund in medio as having fallen into intestacy, and the other claimants claiming to share in it as having fallen into residue. Freckleton's factor also claimed alternatively to be ranked and preferred as representing one of the testator's residuary legatees.

A claim was also lodged for D. S. Bradwell, State School Commissioner for the State of Georgia, who maintained that the bequest was effectual. He stated,—(2) “The State Board of Education, of which the claimant, the State School Commissioner, is the executive officer, is by law authorised to receive donations and bequests for educational purposes, and to expend the same in accordance with the terms on which they may be granted. There is now nothing in the laws of Georgia to prevent the bequest from being applied to the purposes intended. The descendants of the negroes who were on the Gourie plantation in 1821 can still be traced. There has been little or no emigration among the negroes on the Georgia coast. . . . Further, there are still negroes who labour on the Gourie plantation. Education is now free in the State of Georgia to both races, but the amount of the legacy could be expended by the claimant in enabling the negroes intended to be benefited to attend the Coloured University, near Savannah, which is in the vicinity of the Gourie plantation.”

On 20th October 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) allowed the claimant Bradwell a proof of his averments, and to the other claimants a conjunct probation; but the litigation between these claimants was terminated by a joint minute, to which the Lord Ordinary, on 18th October 1893, interposed authority, and in terms thereof ranked and preferred Bradwell to one-half of the fund in medio, and Freckleton's factor to the other half, repelled the claim for Kinloch and others, the representatives of the residuary legatees, and ordained the pursuer and real raiser to make payment to Bradwell and Freckleton's factor accordingly, “but under deduction always of the expenses necessarily incurred by the pursuer and real raiser, including the whole Government duties payable in respect of the succession of the respective claimants to the fund in medio.”

The Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Board of Inland Revenue, then lodged a claim for legacy-duty at the rate of 10 per cent on the whole fund in medio, maintaining that as the parties had not submitted their claims to the decision of the Court, but had entered into a compromise, the bequest to the negroes remained operative and unrevoked, and that consequently, being a bequest to strangers in blood of the testator, it was liable to legacy-duty at the rate of 10 per cent.

Freckleton's judicial factor, founding on section 23, or alternatively on section 37 of the Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52,* maintained that the half of

* The Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, section 23, enacts,—“That where any legacy or part of any legacy, or residue or part of residue, wherewith any duty shall be chargeable by this Act shall be satisfied otherwise than by payment of money or application of specific effects for that purpose, or shall be released for consideration, or compounded for less than the amount or value thereof, then and in such case the duty shall be charged and paid in respect of such legacy or part of legacy, or residue or part of residue, according to the amount or value of the property taken in satisfaction thereof, or as the consideration for release thereof, or composition for the same.”

Section 37 enacts,—“That if the authority under or by colour of which any person shall have administered the estate or effects of any person deceased, or the fund in medio payable to him as representing the next of kin of the testator, was liable to duty only at the rate of 3 per cent. No. 139.

On 31st January 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the Lord Advocate's claim to duty at 10 per cent only to the extent of the half of the fund in medio payable to Bradwell, and as regarded the other half payable to Freckleton's judicial factor to the extent of 3 per cent.*

any part thereof, shall be void, or be repealed, or declared void, and such person shall before the avoidance, repeal, or declaration of avoidance, have paid any duty hereby imposed, or any duty imposed by any of the said former Acts, which shall not be allowed to such person out of the estate or effects of such deceased person, by reason that the same duty was not really due or payable, the money paid for such duty shall, on proof thereof to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners of Stamp Duties, be repaid to the person or persons who shall have paid the same, or his, her, or their representatives, by the said commissioners out of any moneys in their hands arising from the duties imposed by this Act or the said former Acts; but in case such duty ought to have been paid by the rightful executor or executors, administrator or administrators, of such deceased person, then and in such case the payment of such duty shall be valid and effectual notwithstanding such avoidance, repeal, or declaration of avoidance as aforesaid."

* "OPINION.—The Crown claims duty at the rate of 10 per cent on the whole fund in medio, on the ground that the bequest is in terms a bequest to strangers in blood; that it has never been set aside or declared inoperative; and that it is immaterial that one-half of it only has been paid to the strangers in blood. The Crown founds on the decision in Stracey's case—The Queen v. Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, 1844, 6 A. and E. (Q. B.) p. 657. In that case, after probate had been obtained by the executors named in the will, who were strangers in blood to the testator, and duty paid at the rate of 10 per cent, the will was of consent declared to be null, it being arranged that the executors named should retain about one-half of the personal estate. The Commissioners of Taxes, having been asked for a return of duty on the footing that, in respect of the will being annulled, only 3 per cent was due on the whole of the personalty, proposed only to return so much as represented 10 per cent on the money paid by the original executors to the next of kin. But it was held that the case fell under the 37th section of 36 George III. c. 52, and that the will having been avoided, only 3 per cent was due upon the whole sum, and that it was immaterial that the will was avoided by consent, and that the strangers in blood had retained one-half. That judgment told against the Crown's claim. It is now appealed to by the Crown as an authority that, if a will is not set aside, the duty chargeable must be regulated according to its terms, whatever arrangement may be privately made as to the disposal of the estate. Assuming that case to be well decided, it is not against the argument for the residuary legatee. Not only in point of fact, but as a matter of form, and by decree of the Court, the bequest has been refused effect to the extent of one-half. No doubt, this was done by arrangement, and not causa cognita; but according to Stracey's case you cannot inquire into the grounds on which the Court proceeds; the result alone is regarded. Here no reduction was required. If the case had been fought out, and I had decided in favour of the residuary legatee and next of kin, I should have ranked and preferred him to the whole of the legacy, without necessarily stating the grounds on which I proceeded. It would not have been necessary to expressly declare that the legacy had lapsed or become inoperative, although that would really have been the ground of judgment. As matters stand, I have ranked and preferred him to one-half; and that decree constitutes his right to so much of the legacy.

"The Crown assumes that here the strangers in blood have given up half of their legacy to the representatives of the residuary legatee and next of kin for the sake of compromise. It may as well be said that the latter has given up half of the legacy falling to the residuary legatee and next of kin, to the

 v. Freckle-ton's Judicial
 Factor.

The Lord Advocate reclaimed, and argued;—The 37th section of the Act did not apply here. *Stracey's*¹ case decided that where a will was set aside the estate was liable to the duty payable by the next of kin of the deceased although the will was set aside of consent, and although de facto part of the estate was made over to strangers in blood of the deceased. Conversely where the will was not set aside it must regulate the rate of duty. Here the bequest had not been set aside, either of consent or causa cognita. Consequently it must be held to be still operative notwithstanding any arrangement which the parties might have made inter se; a bequest must either be valid to its full extent or not valid at all—it could not be valid to the extent of a half. As the bequest was thus valid to its full extent, and as the beneficiaries under it were strangers in blood to the testator, the rate of duty was 10 per cent. The next of kin took the one half of the estate neither directly under the will nor ab intestato, but as assignee of the legatees mentioned in the will;² consequently the next of kin took subject to all the incidents affecting the bequest, including the rate of legacy-duty. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 18th October 1893 ranked and preferred the claimant, Freckleton's factor, to one-half of the fund in medio; but his claim was alternative, either on the footing of intestacy or as representing one of the residuary legatees, and there was nothing to shew upon which alternative he took. If it was on the latter alternative, then he was under obligation to share with the other next of kin, some of whom, at all events, would not have been entitled to payment in their own name on a 3 per cent duty. Nor did section 23 of the Act apply. That section referred solely to transactions between beneficiaries, and those in the administration of the estate; it did not cover the case of transactions between competing claimants.

Argued for Freckleton's judicial factor;—This was not a bequest to negroes in general, but a particular bequest to the negroes on a particular estate. The State Commissioner was allowed a proof of his averments as to the existence of such negroes, and of his title to represent them; but to avoid the expense of that inquiry, the parties came to an arrangement to which the Lord Ordinary interposed his authority; and the interlocutor ordering payment of one-half of the fund to the present claimant was the pursuer's warrant for payment. The Crown was not entitled to inquire into the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; to that extent at least Stracey's case was in point. The fallacy of the argument for the Inland Revenue lay in this, that it assumed that if the original competition had been litigated to the end the State Commissioner would have strangers in blood. According to the formal decree, the Court has given each of the parties one-half.

"Apart from this, I think that the 23d section of 36 Geo. III. c. 52, applies. The 23d section provides, inter alia, that where a legacy is released for a consideration, or compounded for less than the amount or value thereof, the duty shall be charged and paid in respect of such legacy, according to the consideration for release thereof, or composition for the same. Here it may be said that the strangers in blood have compounded for half of the legacy left to them in favour of the next of kin and residuary legatee; and therefore, while admittedly 10 per cent must be paid on what the strangers in blood receive, only 3 per cent will be charged on the remainder, a result in accordance with equity, and not, I think, against the law.

"I need scarcely add that in the present case there is no suggestion that the arrangement was fraudulent or collusive."

carried off the entire fund ; whereas the present claimant might have been found entirely successful. If the case did not fall under section 37 at least it fell under section 23. The State Commissioner had compounded for payment of less than the full amount of the bequest, and under the latter section he was liable to duty only on the amount actually received by him. There were no words of limitation in section 23, and being thus capable of a construction which would include the present case, it ought to receive that construction.

Lord Advocate
v. Freckle-
ton's Judicial
Factor.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—In my opinion the Lord Ordinary is right. I think this case falls within the 23d section of 36 George III. c. 52. That section enacts that where any legacy whereon any duty shall be chargeable shall be released for consideration, or compounded for less than the amount or value thereof, then and in such case the duty shall be charged and paid in respect of such legacy, according to the amount taken in satisfaction thereof, or as the consideration for release thereof, or composition for the same.

It appears to me that Mr Bradwell has released this legacy and compounded for less than the amount thereof, and that therefore the duty to be charged and paid thereon must be according to the amount taken as the consideration for the release, or composition for the same—which in this case is one-half of the amount.

I think this ground of judgment is sufficient for the decision of the case, and that it is unnecessary to consider the first ground on which the Lord Ordinary has rested his judgment, but I must not be held as at all dissenting from his Lordship's opinion in that respect.

Had there been any reason to suppose that the agreement between the parties was not a bona fide agreement, but was entered into merely for the purpose of evading the duties payable to the Crown, the result might be different, but no such suggestion was made, or apparently could be made in this case.

I am therefore of opinion that the Crown is not entitled to 10 per cent on the whole amount of the legacy in question. That was the only question argued to us, and I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—The statutes which impose duties on legacies and successions are, I think, in every case statutes applicable to the whole United Kingdom, and although the laws both of intestate succession and of the transmission of rights of succession by deed necessarily vary in different parts of the kingdom yet the statutes imposing the duties are expressed in such terms as to be applicable to those various legal systems, and that is because in the imposition of a tax—at all events of a tax relating to succession—it is understood that the substance of the right is what is dealt with, and that the duty cannot be evaded by merely altering the form of the deed whereby the succession is created, or by going through any form after that succession has accrued. It is plain enough, for example, that where duty at the higher rate has accrued in respect of the succession given to a distant relative he cannot evade the duty by putting forward a nearer heir who shall make a claim and pay the duty, and then reconvey to the one who is really entitled. If this were competent the Crown would never obtain duty at any rate higher than the minimum. But on the other hand where, in consequence either of intrinsic defects applicable to a will as a whole, or objections to a particular clause in the will in respect of

No. 139. the uncertainty or failure of objects, the rights of the next of kin are let in—
 Mar. 20, 1894. Lord Advocate v. Freckleton's Judicial Factor. the persons truly entitled are only to pay the duty at the rate which is properly applicable to such rights. Now, the rights of next of kin, I think, are safeguarded by the 23d and the 37th clauses. The 37th clause deals with the case of a will being set aside as a whole, the 23d deals with objections to legacies which have led to transaction or compromise of the claim, and in each case duty is to be paid at the rate which is applicable to the person in whose favour the compromise has been made, and only upon the benefit which he has received. It is noticeable that, while under the 37th section the statute only treats of the case of a will being set aside by a Court of law, it was held in the case quoted by the Lord Ordinary that it is immaterial whether the decree setting aside the will has been obtained by consent in respect that the will could not be defended or after a contested litigation, and that principle will evidently support us in the conclusion which your Lordships have reached—that in the construction of the 23d section, although what the Legislature immediately contemplates is an extrajudicial compromise of the legacy, yet the statute is equally applicable where the compromise has taken place with reference to a succession that has been the subject of a multipointing or distribution decree, and where it takes the shape of a decree giving only partial effect to the claim of the legatee. In order that duty may be payable either at a lower rate or upon a lesser sum than appears from the face of the will the case must be brought within one of these sections, but I agree with Lord Adam that this is a case falling in substance and effect under the 23d section, that it is truly a release of the legacy for a sum which in the present case is one-half of the claim, and that the duty should accordingly be paid only upon the sum actually received. It follows, of course, that, as regards the benefit which has resulted to the next of kin from this arrangement they shall only pay duty upon the other half of the provision at the rate properly applicable to their relationship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot say that I think Stracey's case, which was founded upon by the respondent, is directly in point. There is no judgment for or against the validity of this legacy. All that we know is that the party claiming to represent the legatee has claimed payment of the legacy in full, and has been content to accept half of the amount of the legacy in satisfaction of his demand. I agree with your Lordships that that is a case which falls directly under the provisions of the 23d section of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, because the legatee has compounded his legacy for less than the amount or value thereof. The duty therefore must be paid upon the consideration for composition. The practical result is, as the Lord Ordinary has found, that the legatee must pay 10 per cent, and that the representative of the next of kin is liable to pay a duty of 3 per cent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

Process—Record—Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—An action concluded for declarator that the pursuer had a right of common property along with the defender in a loch and in the solum thereof and minerals thereunder. The pursuer moved for leave to amend the summons by substituting a conclusion for declarator that he had a right of common property along with the defender in the loch and the waters thereof, and an exclusive right of property in a specified portion of the solum of the loch and the minerals thereunder.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that under section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the amendment was incompetent.

ON 23d May 1893 William Macalpine Leny, of Dalswinton, Dumfriesshire, proprietor of the lands of Bellyeoman and others in Fifeshire, and Robert William Will, S.S.C., in whom the lands of Bellyeoman and others were then vested, brought an action against the Magistrates and Town-council of Dunfermline, and after the record had been closed moved for leave to amend the conclusions of their summons and the condescendence and pleas in law.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

The defenders opposed the motion on the ground that the proposed amendments were not within the 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868.*

The paragraphs immediately following in the text shew the nature of the original summons, &c., the passages printed in italics being those which the pursuers desired to delete, and in the footnotes are printed the amendments which they desired to insert.

The summons concluded for declarator “that the pursuers and their authors acquired from the defenders, their authors and predecessors, and have, along with the other proprietors, or some of them whose lands lie around and border on the loch called Moncur or Town’s Loch, lying in the county of Fife, a joint right or common property in said loch, and in the solum thereof, and minerals therein or thereunder,”† and for declarator

* The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29, enacts, —“The Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session, upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made: Provided always, that it shall not be competent, by amendment of the record or issues under this Act, to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading, unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment.”

† For the passage in italics the following was proposed in substitution:—“A good and undoubted joint right or right of common property in the said loch and the waters thereof, and that, subject to said joint right or right of common property and the incidents thereof, the pursuers and their authors acquired from the defenders, their authors and predecessors, and have a good and undoubted right of property, in the solum of said loch, extending to the medium filum of said loch ex adverso of the lands of All and Whole these three parks of land on the north of Kingseathill, lying south of the said loch . . . bounded . . . by the said loch on the north parts, conform to disposition by the Magistrates and Town-council of Dunfermline, dated 30th May and 1st June 1829, and a good and undoubted right of property in the minerals therein or thereunder.”

No. 140. that the defenders "have no exclusive right either of property or of use in or over the said loch or the solum thereof,"* and for decree ordaining the defenders "to desist and cease from molesting and interrupting the pursuers in the exercise of any of their rights in the said loch and solum thereof." †

Mar. 20, 1894.
Lenny v. Magistrates of Dunfermline.

The pursuers averred that in 1829 the Magistrates and Town-council of Dunfermline sold to the pursuers' author, Mr Downie, the three parks of land on the north of Kingseathill, bounded, inter alia, by the Town's Loch on the north, with the whole parts, pertinents, pendicles, and privileges of the said lands; that the pursuers and their predecessors had from time immemorial, and at least for upwards of forty years, possessed the said loch as part and pertinent of the said lands, and "have exercised all the rights of riparian proprietors in the said loch, without interruption or hindrance during the said period. The loch is girt by the lands, not only of the pursuers and the town of Dunfermline, but by the lands of other contiguous proprietors; and there underlies the loch a very valuable mineral field." (Cond. 6) "The defenders and their predecessors, in breach of the warrandice contained in their disposition in favour of Mr Downie . . . have in violation of the pursuers' rights and title, wrought from the side of the loch ex adverso of the pursuers' boundary a very large portion of the said mineral field." ‡

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The pursuers' title condescended on confers upon them a right of common property in the said loch and a joint right to use the same, along with the other proprietors whose lands lie along the shore or margin of the said loch, § and they are therefore entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses. 2. By virtue of their title and their possession thereon the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as craved.

The defenders denied the pursuers' averments of possession, and pleaded;—1. The action is irrelevant. 3. The pursuers' title to the parks south of the loch being a bounding charter, excluding the loch, they have (1) no interest to raise any question as to the ownership of the solum or of the water, and (2) no right of property therein.

On 16th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed the proposed amendment, and granted leave to reclaim.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The amendment which the pursuers proposed was in substance to convert an action for declarator of a right of common property in the solum of the loch and the minerals therein, into an action for declarator of a right of exclusive property in a part of the solum and minerals. Such an amendment was struck at by the proviso at the end of section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, since the effect of allowing the amendment would be to subject to the adjudication of the Court another "property" than that specified in the

* For the words in italics the pursuer proposed to substitute the following:—"And have no right in or over the solum thereof so far as ex adverso of the pursuers' said lands or in the minerals therein or thereunder."

† It was then proposed to add this:—"And minerals therein or thereunder."

‡ For the portion in italics the following was the proposed amendment:—"In course of working the minerals under that portion of the solum of the loch ex adverso of the lands mentioned in condescendence 2 retained by them, encroached upon the minerals under that portion of the solum of the loch which belongs to the pursuers, and is ex adverso of the pursuers' lands described in the summons, and have wrought out a very large portion thereof."

§ The following words were proposed to be inserted at this point:—"And also a right of property in the solum and the minerals therein and thereunder ex adverso of their lands described in the summons."

original summons. It was not enough to preserve identity of the "property" that the physical subject of the dispute was unchanged, if the right which it was proposed to vindicate with respect to that subject was different.¹ Such a construction would justify the conversion of a declarator of right of way over a subject into a declarator of a right of property in the subject. It could not be said that "the real question of controversy between the parties" was the same.

Argued for the pursuers;—The enacting portion of section 29 was imperative; the Court had, subject to the proviso, no option but to allow the amendment if it was necessary to determine in the existing action "the real question in controversy between the parties."² Here the real question in controversy was as to the right to the minerals. That was clear from the condescendence, which it was not proposed to change in any material particular. In order to determine the right to the minerals, it was necessary to determine the right to the loch and to the solum. All three subjects were certainly within the original summons, but the terminology used was erroneous, in respect that declarator of a joint right in each of the three was sought. It was now proposed to conclude for declarator of a joint right in the loch and its water only, and of a several right in a particular portion of the solum and the minerals therein. But the real question in controversy was, as before, the pursuers' right to the minerals ex adverso of their property. It was not proposed to subject to the adjudication of the Court a different property from that specified in the original summons. The subject was the same—the minerals; and the right to be vindicated was the same—a right of property. Whereas to convert a declarator of a right of way into a declarator of property, was to convert an action relating to a right of user into one relating to a right of property.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the question raised by this reclaiming note is a somewhat narrow one, but it appears to me that the change which the pursuers propose to make in the summons will have the effect of substituting for a claim to have a declarator of a common right of property in the solum of the loch a claim to have an exclusive and separate right of property in a particular part of that solum, and will substitute for a conclusion that the Magistrates have no exclusive right of property in the solum of the loch a conclusion that they have no right whatever in a particular part of the solum.

But it is not possible to convert a declarator of a common right of property into a declarator of separate and exclusive right without subjecting to the adjudication of the Court an entirely new and different right.

It appears to me, therefore, that the amendment proposed goes beyond the purposes of the clause in question, and ought not to be allowed.

LORD ADAM.—I have come to be of the same opinion, though with some regret, for no very definite statement has been made to us of any prejudice which the defenders would suffer if the proposed amendment were allowed. It is quite true, as Mr Johnston said, that the Court has no alternative but to give effect to all such amendments "as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in contro-

It will not do to say that the real question is, after all, what is my right in the lands in question, whatever may have been the claim at first put forward, and that because the question raised by the amendment is connected with the same property that is sufficient to justify the amendment. If that were so it would be possible to substitute for what was originally a claim to a right of way over lands a claim to the lands themselves. I think that we must look to the conclusions of the action and see whether the proposed amendments do enlarge and make so essentially different the original conclusions as to subject to the adjudication of the Court a different right to that which was originally specified in the summons. I agree with Lord Kinnear that the proposed amendments would have that effect.

 Leny v. Magistrates of Dunfermline.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the conclusion your Lordships have come to is sound. I do not think the proposed amendment can be justified unless we hold that so long as the lands are identical it is competent to substitute one dispute about the lands for another.

Company—Reduction of capital—Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131), secs. 9 and 15.—A limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1867, passed a special resolution, under sections 9 and 15 of the Companies Act, 1867, by which 10 per cent of its capital was to be returned to its shareholders "upon the footing that the amounts returned, or any part thereof, may be called up again." The Court held that the resolution was competent and fell to be confirmed.

2D DIVISION. ON 28th November 1894 the Scottish Vulcanite Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1867, presented a petition praying the Court to make an order confirming a proposed reduction of capital, and to approve of a minute to be registered in terms of the Companies Act, 1867, sec. 15.*

The petition set forth that the original capital of the company was £60,000, divided into 500 A shares of £100 each, and 500 B shares of £20 each, all fully paid up; that in 1884 the capital was increased to £70,800, by the addition of 540 fully paid up B shares of £20 each; that a considerable portion of the additional capital could now be dispensed with; and that in consequence the company had, on 24th January and 12th February 1894, passed and confirmed the following special resolution (being the resolution of which confirmation was prayed for);—"That in respect of each share of £100 in the company's capital upon which the sum of £100 has been fully paid up, and in respect of each share of £20 in the company's capital upon which the sum of £20 has been paid up,

* The memorandum of association authorised the company "to increase or reduce the capital of the company, to provide sinking or reserve funds, to issue debenture or other bonds, to borrow and accept money on mortgage or otherwise, and to undertake and carry out such financial operations as may be incidental or useful to the general business of the company."

capital be paid off to the extent of £10 on each of the £100 shares, and No. 141.
£2 on each of the £20 shares, upon the footing that the amounts returned, or any part thereof, may be called up again.”

After intimation and advertisement the Court remitted to Mr Edward Young, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings and the reasons for the proposed reduction. Mar. 20, 1894.
Scottish

Mr Young reported generally in favour of the petition, but drew the attention of the Court to the qualification of the proposed reduction and return of capital, which made the capital returned liable to be called up again.¹ Mr Young also pointed out certain errors in the procedure, and suggested the propriety of making intimation and advertisement of new in consequence of these errors.

THE COURT (the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD KYLLACHY) ordered intimation and advertisement to be made of new, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to grant the prayer of the petition after such intimation and advertisement had been made.

less than £400. Held that the annual value of a manse occupied rent free by

Inland
Revenue v.
Sutherland.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal, and allowed the abatement of £120.

The Surveyor obtained a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer. The Lord Ordinary in Exchequer (Wellwood), on the motion of the parties, appointed the case to be heard by the First Division.

The question of law was whether the annual value of the manse was to be reckoned as part of Mr Sutherland's income for the purposes of a claim of abatement under Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8.

The facts stated in the case were:—"1. Mr Sutherland is minister of the Free Church at Rothsay, and his whole income is derived from that office, and, exclusive of the annual value of the manse, amounts to £374, 10s., or after deducting £10 allowed for expenses, £364, 10s.

"2. He is entered in the Valuation-roll for the burgh of Rothsay as owner and occupier of the Free Church manse of Rothsay, the annual value of which is £50, and is assessed under schedule A of the Income-Tax Acts for the said manse" as under.* [At the hearing before the Court, the Assessor did not dispute that this assessment was always repaid to Mr Sutherland by the Deacons' Court.]

The employments of profit mentioned in schedule E include "any office or employment of profit held under any ecclesiastical body."

Section 167 enacts,—“That the annual value of lands, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to or in the occupation of any person claiming the said exemption, shall be estimated for the purpose of ascertaining his title to such exemption according to the rules and directions contained in the said several schedules (A) and (B) respectively. . . .”

The same Act, section 63, under the head “No. IX., Rules for charging the said duties under schedules (A) and (B),” contains, inter alia, the following,—“Second, every person having the use of any lands or tenements shall be taken and considered for the purposes of this Act as the occupier of such lands and tenements.”

The other terms of the disposition and the model trust-deed are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of Lord Adam.

"5. The whole manse is in the possession of the appellant, and is used by him as his residence as minister of the congregation.

"6. The appellant stated that no use is made by him of the house except in direct connection with the duties of his office, and that he is bound to remove from the said manse in the following circumstances:— (1) If he were transferred by the Church Courts from the ministry of the said congregation to the ministry of another congregation of the Free Church, and (2) if, on the appointment of a colleague minister in the said congregation, the manse were made a residence for the colleague minister."

Argued for the Surveyor;—Under section 167 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842—which applied to cases of abatement as well as to cases of exemption¹—a person assessed to income-tax under schedule E, who claimed abatement, in order to make good his claim, must shew that he was not the proprietor or the occupier of subjects in respect of which income-tax was due under schedule A or schedule B, and of which the annual value, added to his income assessable under schedule E, made £400 or upwards.² Tried by this test, the respondent's claim to abatement failed. He referred to Tennant's case,³ but all that Tennant's case decided was that the bank-house in question there was not part of profits of the bank-agent's employment so as to subject him to income-tax in respect thereof under schedule E, and that he was neither the proprietor nor the occupier of the house in the sense of the Act. In Tennant's case the bank was assessed as the occupier, the house forming part of the business premises of the bank, the agent was removable at the will and pleasure of the directors, and was required to occupy the house for the protection of the bank, just as any caretaker would have been obliged to do. He was, in short, the servant of the bank,⁴ and section 167 had no application to his case. Here, on the other hand, the respondent was entered in the Valuation-roll as the proprietor and occupier of the manse, which belonged to him as an official liferenter,⁵ and which he used solely as a place of residence, and it had no connection with other property belonging to the church. He might let the manse, and ministers in his position were entitled to vote for a member of Parliament as being the owners or occupiers in liferent of their manse.⁶ The determination of the Commissioners ought therefore to be reversed.

The argument for the respondent sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

Mar. 20, 1894.
Inland
Revenue v.
Sutherland.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether the respondent, who is the Free Church minister at Rothesay, is entitled to an abatement of income-tax under the 8th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, in respect that his total income from all sources is under £400 per annum.

It is stated in the case that his whole income is derived from his office of minister of the Free Church, and amounts, after deducting £10 allowed for expenses, to £364, 10s.

The appellant, however, proposes to add to that sum the value of the manse, which the respondent occupies, which he estimates at £46, 10s., thus making the total income amount to £411.

The question, therefore, is whether the value of the manse ought to be added to the respondent's income from other sources, in considering whether he is entitled to the abatement claimed or not.

In this case the respondent is assessed under schedule E of the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), as holding an office or employment of profit under an ecclesiastical body, viz., the Free Church of Scotland.

It was held in the case of Tennant v. Smith, in the House of Lords, 19 R. (H. L.) 1, that the duties chargeable under schedule E on persons holding such offices or employments, for "all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever accruing by reason of such offices and employments," did not include the annual value of a house occupied rent free by the agent of a bank, and forming part of the bank premises, and that such value ought not to be taken into consideration in estimating the amount of his income. In that case the bank-agent was bound to occupy the house personally and could not let it, so that he could not convert his right to occupy it into money, and it was said by Lord Hannen that different considerations would apply to the case of an agent who as part of his remuneration has a house provided for him which he might let. That, he says, which could be converted into money might reasonably be regarded as money.

That leads to the consideration of the terms on which the respondent occupies his manse.

It is stated in the case that the manse is vested in trustees for behoof of the Free Church congregation, in terms of a disposition dated 17th June 1859, and the model trust-deed therein referred to, which are held to be parts of the case. I do not find any statement of the terms on which the respondent holds the manse under them, but I presume the terms are the same as those under which the trustees are vested in the building.

Now, I find that there is appended to the model deed the form of a simple disposition for a manse which seems to be appropriate to this case. From this form it appears that the subjects conveyed to the trustees are held by them in trust, that the manse shall in all time coming be used, occupied, and enjoyed as and for a manse in connection with the Free Church of Scotland, and that by and for the use of the minister of the congregation during his life, and so long, but so long only, as he shall remain minister thereof, but always under the conditions, provisions, and declarations contained from tertio to duodecimo, both inclusive, in the model trust-deed there referred to.

That model trust-deed is very lengthy, and seems adapted to the case of a church rather than to that of a manse. The only provision I can find in it which seems to have a bearing on the present question is contained in article 3, which declares that the building shall be under the immediate charge and management of the elders and deacons, or elders acting as deacons for the time being of the congregation, in the use, occupation, and enjoyment at the time of such building.

No. 142.
Mar. 20, 1894.
Inland
Revenue v.
Sutherland.

It appears, accordingly, that this dwelling-house is provided to the respondent as the minister of the congregation, and is in all time coming to be used, occupied, and enjoyed by him as and for a manse in connection with the Free Church. It does not appear to me that the right to occupy a dwelling-house on these terms is one which was intended to be convertible into money. I think, therefore, that the principle of the case of Tennant v. Smith applies to this case, and that the value of the manse ought not to be added to the respondent's income. It may possibly be that such manses are occasionally let without objection by the trustees, and if so the income so obtained will be assessable. But that cannot affect the present question.

But the appellant farther maintained, as I understood his argument, that in estimating a person's "total income from all sources" there fell to be included the annual value of all property for which he was chargeable under schedule A, and the annual value of the occupation for which he was chargeable under schedule B, and that the 167th section of the Act of 1842 contained directions for estimating these values for the purpose of ascertaining the title to abatement when abatement was claimed. That would appear to be so, but the question remains whether the respondent is chargeable either under schedule A or schedule B.

Section 167 provides that the annual value of lands, tenements, &c., belonging to or in the occupation of any person claiming exemption, shall be estimated for the purpose of ascertaining his title to such exemption, according to the rules and directions contained in the said several schedules A and B respectively. It was not said that the respondent was chargeable as occupier of the manse, but it was said that he was proprietor of the manse in the sense of the Act, that he was chargeable as such proprietor, and had in fact been assessed as proprietor, and had paid such assessment.

It appears to me that the respondent is in no sense proprietor of the manse. The trustees are proprietors, and are the persons who are chargeable as owners in respect of it.

It is true that the respondent is entered in the Valuation-roll as proprietor, but that will not make him proprietor, or liable as proprietor. It is also true that he has been in use to pay the property-tax assessment, but he was bound to do so as occupier of the manse, and it was stated, and not disputed, that it has always been repaid to him by the Deacons' Court of the church.

The decisions which were quoted to us to the effect that ministers in the position of the respondent had been found entitled to vote as owners or otherwise of their manses have no bearing on the present question.

I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners was right, and that the appeal should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—The case is so far different from that of the bank-agent, Tenant v. Smith, 19 R. (H. L.) 1, that, in the case cited, the Bank of Scotland was undoubtedly the proprietor of the bank office at Montrose, including the agent's residence, and was liable to assessment under schedule A, unless it could be shewn that the bank had given its agent a right which might be treated for the purposes of revenue legislation as a qualified ownership. Now, in the present case, the feudal owners of the subject are a body of trustees, who hold the manse in trust for the benefit of the minister of the congregation for the time being, and no one but the minister derives any benefit from the manse, directly or indirectly. If I were approaching the consideration of this case without the aid of previous decisions, I should be disposed to hold that the primary question was, whether the minister was liable (without relief) for property-tax under schedule A. If he is so liable, then the occupation of this house is part of his income, and he is not entitled to the abatement claimed. This way of looking at the case seems to be consistent with the opening sentences of the opinions of Lords Watson and Macnaghten in the case referred to.

But then another criterion applicable to claims of this description is proposed in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and, I think, assented to by all their Lordships, viz., that in construing the statutory provision as to abatement, and in particular the expression "total income from all sources," nothing is to be treated as income unless it is capable of being turned into money. I think the circumstance that the bank-agent was not entitled to let his residence, but was under obligation to live in it, was the decisive element in that case, although other elements were referred to; for example, that the occupation of the bank-agent was that of a servant or manager under a contract of service, as distinguished from that of a tenant.

In the present case the manse is vested in trustees, and it is not said that the minister is a tenant. He is a beneficiary under the trust, and it is to my mind perfectly clear that, under the conditions of the trust, the minister has a residence provided for him to enable him to discharge the duties of his office, and that he would not be able to let this residence to a yearly tenant without committing a breach of contract. His equitable estate is therefore not a right capable of being turned into money, and I attach no importance to the consideration that, with the consent of the trustees, the minister might let the manse furnished for a few weeks in summer, when absent from his charge, or when his duties did not require that he should personally occupy the manse. It is no doubt true that the use of the manse is part of the consideration which the minister receives under his contract with the congregation or their ecclesiastical superiors, but if I rightly follow the decision in Tennant's case, it is not "income," and is not to be taken into account in estimating his right to an abatement of tax on the ground that his total income from all sources is under £400. I do not of course mean to imply that the manse is to escape taxation under schedule A. How it is to be assessed is a question not before us. In the present case we are only concerned with the question whether a value is to be put on the occupation for the purposes of the claim of exemption.

No. 143.

Martin v.
Lindsay.

Process—Concurring pursuer—Title to reclaim.—Held that a person who is a party to a cause only to the extent of giving his consent and concurrence thereto has no title to present a reclaiming note against an interlocutor pronounced in the cause.

In July 1892 James Martin, C.A., Edinburgh, judicial factor on the 1ST DIVISION. estates of the dissolved firm of Rhind, Lindsay, & Wallace, W.S., Edinburgh, with consent and concurrence of John Rhind, S.S.C., for his interest, raised an action against R. J. Lindsay, W.S., and Thomas Watt Wallace, W.S., for implement of an alleged agreement, by which the defenders undertook to perform certain acts, on payment by Mr Rhind of £500 to Mr Martin. Lord Low.

On various occasions while the cause was in the Outer-House Mr Rhind appeared by counsel and, on the ground that he was not a party to the action, objected to any interlocutor directed against him being pronounced. On 19th December 1893 in particular he opposed a motion at the instance of the defenders to have him ordained forthwith to consign the £500 above mentioned in the hands of the Clerk of Court. The Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor in which he found that, by the agreement above referred to, the defenders had agreed, upon payment of £500 by the concurring pursuer to the pursuer, to discharge the concurring pursuer of all claims they or the dissolved firm might have against him, and that the said sum fell to be paid by the concurring pursuer to the pursuer, but refused, as incompetent, the motion by the defenders that the pursuer should be ordained to consign said sum.

On 8th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“In respect that the concurring pursuer, John Rhind, has failed to pay to the pursuer, the judicial factor upon the estate of the dissolved firm of Rhind, Lindsay, & Wallace, the sum of £500 and interest thereon in terms of the interlocutor of 19th December 1893, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns.”

Mr Rhind reclaimed.

The defenders objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, on the ground that Mr Rhind was not a party to the cause.

Argued for the reclaimer;—He had undoubtedly an interest in the action. He had been recognised all along as a party to the cause, and had often appeared by counsel in it without objection. It would have been quite competent to pronounce a judgment for expenses against him.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—When Mr Rhind gave his consent and concurrence to this action he entered into an agreement with all parties that, so far as he was concerned, Mr Martin should control any interest he might have in the matter in dispute. If that view of the agreement is correct, it is quite hostile to the idea that he who has agreed that another person shall be the dominus litis shall be entitled to shake himself free from his agreement at any one stage of the proceedings, and to come forward and himself present a reclaiming note against an

Martin v.
Lindsay.

LORD ADAM.—I am quite clear that this reclaiming note is incompetent. Ex facie of the record Mr Rhind is not a party to the cause. It might be in certain cases that something which has passed during the progress of the action might change the position of a concurring pursuer and make him a party to the cause, but what has passed here leads to an opposite conclusion, for Mr Rhind appeared at some stages in the Outer-House and objected to certain interlocutors being pronounced against him, on the ground that he was not a party to the cause. I do not think that he can now be heard when he attempts to take an opposite view.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that the position of a concurring pursuer is that he enters into a contract to be bound by the issue as that is determined in an action between the principal pursuer and the defender. It is sufficient here to say that a party who merely grants his consent and concurrence has no title to reclaim against an interlocutor assailing the defender. Such a step cannot be taken by anyone but by the principal pursuer himself.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the reclaiming note.

Lease—Farm—Right to take peats from another part of estate—Sale of farm and of peat moss to different persons—Rent—Abatement—Retention—Act 1449, cap. 18.—In 1880 the tenant of a farm renewed his lease of the farm “all as possessed by him.” For many years he and his predecessors in the farm had been in use to take peats from a moss on another part of the landlord's estate, a particular lair being appropriated to the farm. Certain estate regulations were incorporated in the lease, under which, inter alia, the landlord reserved to himself “all the mosses on the estate, with power to regulate and divide them as circumstances may render necessary, . . . And in the event of the proprietor letting the mosses for cultivation, it is hereby specially conditioned and declared that he shall be under no obligation to find moss for the tenants in place thereof.” The tenant continued under the new lease to take peats from the moss, until 1887, when the proprietor sold the moss. The proprietor having subsequently sold the farm, held in a question between the tenant and the purchaser of the farm that the tenant had under his lease a right to take peats from the moss, and that he was entitled to an abatement from his rent corresponding to the value of the right to take peats of which he had been deprived.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the tenant's right to take peats from the moss was not protected by the Act 1449, cap. 18, so as to be good against singular successors in the ownership of the peat moss.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

By lease dated 30th June and 20th and 21st July 1880, the trustees of the Marquis of Huntly let to George Duncan the farm of Newton, on the Aboyne estates, “all as presently possessed by the said George Duncan,” for twenty years from Whitsunday 1878. The rent payable under the lease was £60.

The lease contained this clause:—“And whereas for the more effectually regulating the management of the said estate of Aboyne, the said . . . Marquis of Huntly has introduced certain conditions and regulations which are to be obligatory on all tenants on the said estate, . . . a No. 144 printed copy whereof is signed of even date with these presents by the said George Duncan; the said George Duncan binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to conform thereto, and to observe the same and such modifications as may be made thereon, so far as not inconsistent herewith, and that to all intents and purposes as fully and effectually as if the said conditions and regulations had been engrossed herein.”

May 17, 1894.
Duncan v.
Brooka.

These conditions and regulations were dated 1st December 1873, and were in substitution of earlier conditions and regulations in similar terms.*

Duncan's father and grandfather had been tenants of the farm before him, and they and he had all along been in the habit of casting peats on a moss known as the Moss of Tillychip, belonging to the Aboyne estates, but not on the farm of Newton. In this moss a special lair, known as the Newton lair, had been set apart for the special use of the tenants of Newton.

In 1888 Lord Huntly's trustees sold part of the Aboyne estates, including the Moss of Tillychip, to a Mr Wilson, and Lord Huntly's factor by letter intimated the sale to Duncan, adding, "you cannot be allowed, therefore, to go to that moss any more." In consequence Duncan refused to pay his rent in full, and during the next two years retained £10 per annum. Legal proceedings were threatened with the view of compelling payment of the portion of the rent so retained, but no proceedings were actually taken.

In 1890 the Huntly trustees sold to Sir William Cunliffe Brooks, another portion of the Aboyne estates, including the farm of Newton. Duncan refused to pay his rent in full to the new proprietor, and continued to retain £10 per annum.

In March 1893 Duncan raised the present action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Sir W. Cunliffe Brooks, praying for declarator "that the defender is bound to warrant and maintain the pursuer, as tenant of the farm of Newton of Glentana . . . in the enjoyment and possession of the allotment or peat lair in the Moss of Tillychip, known as the Newton lair, and till recently possessed by the pursuer as tenant forsaids . . . together with the right to dig, winn, and lead peats therefrom as fuel for his use as tenant of the farm of Newton of Glentana" from Martinmas 1890 to the termination of his lease at Martinmas 1897, "or otherwise, failing the defender so maintaining the pursuer," for declarator "that the pursuer as tenant of the said farm is entitled to an annual abatement on £60, the rent or tack-duty of the said farm and others for the years and crops 1891 to 1897 inclusive, and that to the extent of £15 sterling in each year, or to the extent of such other sum as the Court may modify," and that on payment of the stipulated rent of £60 under deduction of £15, or such other sum as might be fixed by the Court, the defender was bound to grant discharges in full of the rent.

* The 12th article of the conditions and regulations of 1873 was in the following terms:—"12. Mosses. The proprietor reserves to himself all the mosses on the estate, with power to regulate and divide them as circumstances may render necessary; and the tenants shall be bound to cast their peats and fuel in a regular manner, on the allotments set apart by the moss grieve, and shall replace the top sod, and shall not be entitled to sell or give away peats or turf; and each shall pay a portion of the moss grieve's salary, and of the expense of keeping the roads and drains through the mosses in repair, as well as of making new ones when required. And in the event of the proprietor letting the mosses for cultivation, it is hereby specially conditioned and declared that he shall be under no obligation to find moss for the tenants in place thereof."

No. 144.

May 17, 1894.
Duncan v.
Brooks.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The defender, as proprietor of the subjects from which the rent of £60 is claimed from the pursuer, and as holding the same, subject to the pursuer's lease thereof, is bound to warrant and maintain the pursuer in the full enjoyment of the same, and of all the rights, parts, and privileges thereof as let to him. At least he is bound to do so in so far as he seeks to draw rents therefrom. (2) The said allotment or peat lair in the said moss, being a material part and pertinent of the said farm as let to the pursuer, and no avoidance of the pursuer's rights thereto having arisen as against him, the defender is bound to warrant and maintain him in the said right, or suffer an abatement of rent commensurate with the value of the subjects not so warranted.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) All parties are not called. (2) The action is irrelevant. (3) The action is excluded by the terms of the pursuer's lease, and the conditions and regulations therein referred to. (6) The pursuer having, according to his own shewing, been excluded from an alleged part of his farm, and having taken no action against his landlords or their disponees, all before the defender acquired his estate, is not entitled to call on the defender to reinstate him, or pay damages, or allow abatements from the lease. (7) If the moss was, as alleged, part of the farm let to the pursuer, he was entitled to continue possession thereof against the purchaser of it, and cannot claim from the defender compensation for his failure to do so.

A proof was allowed. The evidence established the foregoing facts, in so far as they had been in dispute, and there was further evidence regarding the value of the peats to the pursuer.

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 20th January 1894, pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds (1) that the pursuer is in possession of the farm at Newton under a lease which terminates at Whitsunday 1898, and, along with the other tenants of the estate, he and his predecessors in the farm had been accustomed to take peats from the Moss of Tillychip, part of the same estate ; (2) that this practice is recognised and rules laid down for the exercise of the right or privilege in the regulations which are incorporated by reference into the lease forming the contract between the parties ; (3) that in 1888 the defender's authors intimated to the pursuer that he could not be allowed 'to go to the moss any more,' the same having been sold to a third party ; (4) that the pursuer thereupon refused to pay his rent, which, under the lease is £60 per annum—except subject to an abatement equal to the value of the privilege which he had previously enjoyed, and in the knowledge of this claim the then owners of the property sold the farm to the defender : On these facts, finds in law that the pursuer is entitled to an abatement from his rent corresponding to the value of the right or privilege of which he has been deprived by his landlord's act without his consent : Assesses the same at the sum of £7, 10s. per annum : Repels the defences ; and substituting the foresaid sum of £7, 10s. for the £15 claimed, decerns in terms of the last alternative conclusion of the summons."

The defender appealed, and argued ;—The pursuer never had any right to get peat from any particular moss. No such right was given to him by the lease or the estate regulations. Even if the landlord was bound to let him cut peats, so long as there was a moss available, he could send him to any moss that he pleased, however inconvenient for the particular tenant. Further, if the tenant had such a right, then it fell under the Act 1449, and was good against Mr Wilson. It certainly could not be good against the defender, as the pursuer was not in possession of the lair at the date when he purchased Newton.

The pursuer argued ;—The pursuer's lease, coupled with proved long possession, gave him a right to take peats from the Moss of Tillychip. No. 144. All that the landlord reserved to himself in article 12 of the estate regulations was the right of regulating the use of the mosses by the tenants, and of letting the moss for cultivation, which last event had not occurred. The landlord could not arbitrarily deprive the tenant of this right, which was indeed a material part of the subject let. Sir W. Brooks was only Lord Huntly's assignee, and in no better position.¹

May 17, 1894.
Duncan v.
Brooks.

LORD YOUNG.—The present litigation relates to a matter of trifling pecuniary value, but it raises questions of some interest, although, in my opinion, of no great difficulty.

The broad facts may be stated in a few sentences: The pursuer is tenant, and has been so for over thirty years, of a farm on the Aboyne estates known as the farm of Newton, and this farm had previously been occupied by the pursuer's father, and before that by his grandfather. It is averred, and may be taken as a fact, that from an early period of this century—to go no farther back—the tenant of this farm has been in the enjoyment and possession of a peat allotment or lair in the Moss of Tillychip, known as the Newton lair. The current lease of the farm, which is dated in 1880, refers to and incorporates certain conditions and regulations which are to be observed by the tenants. The 12th article of these conditions and regulations refers to mosses, and is in these terms:—"The proprietor reserves to himself all the mosses on the estate, with power to regulate and divide them as circumstances may render necessary." I regard this reservation as a reservation by the landlord of the mosses from the lands let to the tenants. We are all familiar with such reservations in the case of woods and plantations, where a regulation such as this reserves all the woods and plantations on the estate to the proprietor, he giving to the tenant such liberties therein in regard to the taking of wood and otherwise as he may appoint. Then the article goes on,—“And the tenants shall be bound to cast their peats and fuel in a regular manner on the allotments set apart by the moss grieve,” and so on. That implies, and indeed expresses, a right on the part of tenants to cast their peat in the allotments set apart for them by the moss grieve. Such an allotment was made for Newton, and the Newton tenant has cast his peats there from the earliest period of which we have any notice. No doubt the article goes on to provide the condition that in the event of the proprietor letting the mosses for cultivation he should be under no obligation to find moss for the tenants in place thereof. That condition, however, is limited to a particular case which has not occurred, and which tenants, in taking their farms, might not regard with much anxiety. Now, I must say that I regard this article, taken along with the lease and the long possession prior in date to the regulation, and taken along with the possession for a period of a quarter of a century at all events subsequent to the regulations, as importing a right to the tenants of individual farms to take peats from allotments set apart for their respective farms, and I think that it would not be according to the fair meaning of their contract of lease for the landlord arbitrarily to deprive the tenants of this power to take peats.

Lord Huntly sold the estate of Aboyne to different persons; the part con-

No. 144. taining Newton he sold to Sir W. Brooks, the present defender ; and the part
May 17, 1894. containing Tillychip moss he sold to Mr Wilson. On the sale of Tillychip, Duncan v. which took place first, the tenant of Newton notified to his landlord, Lord Brooks. Huntly, that he was disturbed in the possession of his right to take peat under his lease, and that he must either have this right restored or have an abatement from his rent granted. The landlord did not assent to this view, but the tenant took the matter into his own hands by withholding £10 per annum from the rent for two years. Then came the sale to Sir W. Brooks, and this dispute between the tenant and the new proprietor as to whether the tenant is bound to pay the whole rent or is entitled to deduct therefrom a proportionate part in the event of the proprietor being unable to restore to him his allotment or lair in the Moss of Tillychip. The tenant and Sir W. Brooks, the purchaser, being unable to settle the dispute, the present action has been brought.

The action contains a prayer for declarator that the defender is bound to warrant and maintain the pursuer as tenant of the farm of Newton of Glentana in the enjoyment and possession of the allotment or peat lair in the Moss of Tillychip known as the Newton lair, and till recently possessed by the pursuer as tenant foresaid, together with the right to dig, winn, and lead peats therefrom as fuel for his use as tenant ; with an alternative prayer to the effect that if the defender is not able to procure the pursuer the enjoyment of that right he is bound to allow him a reasonable abatement from the rent. Criticisms have been made on the form of the action, but I think that the question must be taken as the same, and must be decided in the same way as if the present defender was pursuer in an action for payment of the whole rent, and the present pursuer were defending it on the ground that he was not getting the whole subject let, and was therefore entitled to a reasonable abatement, unless the landlord was able to restore the right to take peats from this moss, or to give the tenant an equivalent privilege elsewhere.

Two questions are thus raised ; first, whether the tenant had a right under his lease to take peats from Tillychip. As to this I have already expressed my opinion that his lease does give him this right. The second question is whether there is a right in the tenant, a right to take peats from this moss, which is good against Mr Wilson, the purchaser of the moss. That raises a question under the Act of 1449.

Now, I am inclined to think—although it is not necessary to decide the point—that this right does not fall under the Act of 1449, and accordingly that the lease, so far as the taking of peats is concerned, is not good against Mr Wilson, the new owner of the moss. In this view, therefore, we have to take the case on the footing that the pursuer has by the action of his landlord been deprived of a right for which he agreed to pay part of his £60 of rent. If Lord Huntly had been here instead of Sir W. Brooks, I should have been clearly of opinion that he could not in such circumstances have enforced payment of the whole £60, but would have been bound to suffer an abatement of rent corresponding to the reasonable value to the tenant of the right to take peats. The question therefore comes to be whether Sir W. Brooks is not in the same position as his author Lord Huntly. I think that he is. I think that he has no right save what he got from Lord Huntly, and that Lord Huntly could give him no better right than what he himself had. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right, and ought to be affirmed.
I assume that the fair value of the right to take peats is that fixed by the Sheriff (namely £7, 10s.); indeed it would be ridiculous to have further inquiry into a matter of that kind. No. 144.

Duncan v.
Brooks.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that the right to take peats from the Moss of Tillychip is part of the subject of the lease; that the tenant has been deprived of that right, and therefore that the whole rent is not due. I think that the abatement allowed by the Sheriff must stand good.

LORD TRAYNER.—While I agree in the judgment which your Lordships have proposed, I should like to say a word on the general conditions and regulations to be observed by the tenants on the Huntly estates, one of which is founded on by the pursuer in this action. In my opinion if the tenant had no right to take peats from the moss except what is given to him by the regulations, I should be slow to hold that any right was given to the tenant to take peats, or any obligation laid on the landlord to allow peat to be taken. But I think that the lease as interpreted by long possession gives the tenant a right to take peats from the Tillychip moss. Therefore, founding not on the regulations, but on the lease, I agree with the decision proposed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 20th January 1894: Dismiss the appeal: Of new assess the abatement from the rent payable by the pursuer to the defender at the sum of £7, 10s. per annum, and repel the defences; and of new decern in terms of the last alternative conclusion of the summons," &c.

Railway—Statutory obligation to stop trains—"Ordinary trains."—A railway company was bound under its Act to stop "all ordinary trains" at a certain station.

Trains which were held to be ordinary trains in the sense of the Act.

(SEE Gilmour v. North British Railway Company, June 23, 1893, 20 R. (H. L.) 53.) 1ST DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

In an action of declarator raised in 1892 by John Gilmour, Esquire, of Lundin and Montrave, against the North British Railway Company, the House of Lords, on 23d June 1893, held that the defenders were bound to stop all "ordinary trains" on their line of railway between Thornton Junction and Anstruther, at the Lundin Links station, in virtue of the East of Fife Railway Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. clxv.),* and relative agreement, and remitted the cause to the Court of Session.

The question then arose, whether four trains running between

* Sec. 36 of the East of Fife Railway Act, 1855, enacted,—“That the company shall erect and maintain a temporary goods and passenger station at or near to Sunnybraes, Lundin Links, or at any other point on the said estate which may be agreed upon by and between the company and the owners of the said estate for the time; and at the said station all ordinary trains shall stop for the purpose of traffic.”

No. 145. Anstruther and Thornton Junction were "ordinary trains," and therefore fell to be stopped at Lundin Links station.

Gilmour v.
North British
Railway Co.

The defenders stated that they were express trains, and contended, inter alia, that express or fast trains were not in contemplation of the parties in 1855, and that the statutory obligation did not apply to these trains.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed a proof.

From the defenders' time-tables it appeared that five trains in the day from Thornton Junction stopped at every station, including Lundin Links. Four of these trains were in connection with main line trains from Edinburgh, Glasgow and the North, and ran by Anstruther on to Dundee. The fifth train, in connection with a main line Edinburgh train and North train, stopped at all stations up to Anstruther including Lundin Links, and did not go further.

Two other trains in the day (being two of the trains in question, which the pursuer wished to have stopped at Lundin Links station) ran from Thornton in connection with fast trains from Edinburgh and the North, passed Lundin Links station and three other stations out of a total of eight without stopping, and ran on to Anstruther, and did not go further.

The trains in the opposite direction were similar in number, two trains, being the remaining trains in question, starting daily from Anstruther and running (without stopping at Lundin Links and three other stations) to Thornton, where they connected with fast trains to Edinburgh and the North, one also connecting with a fast Glasgow train.

The parole proof mainly consisted of the evidence of practical railway men. The witnesses adduced by the pursuer maintained that "ordinary trains," as those words were understood by railway men, were all trains which were advertised in a company's tables as being run regularly for the accommodation of the public, and that the antithesis to "ordinary" was "special," i.e., trains run by the company for special purposes, or ordered by a member or members of the public for private and occasional use.

The defenders' witnesses said that the antithesis to "ordinary" was "fast" or "express," and that no train could be called "ordinary" which did not stop at all, or most, of the stations on the line.

It was further proved that the line in question, which was a single line, and skirted the coast of Fife along its south and eastern seaboard, left the defenders' main line at Thornton Junction towards the south, and after making a circuit joined the main line to Dundee again at Leuchars; that it was not the direct route from Edinburgh to Dundee and the north, but simply served the coast villages and towns of Fife. Anstruther, the terminus and starting point respectively of the four trains in question, was an ancient but small burgh.

On 23d December 1893, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in which he found that the defenders were bound to stop the four trains in question at the Lundin Links station.*

* "OPINION.—The defenders are bound by section 36 of the 'East of Fife Railway Act, 1855,' to stop 'all ordinary trains' at Lundin Links station, and the question is whether certain specified trains, viz., the trains leaving Thornton Junction for Anstruther at 11.38 a.m. and 5.34 p.m., and the trains leaving Anstruther for Thornton Junction at 7.45 a.m. and 4 p.m., are ordinary trains within the meaning of that section. Two other trains are mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, but as to these the defenders now admit that they are ordinary trains and must be stopped at Lundin Links.

"It appears from the judgment of the House of Lords in Burnett v. The Great North of Scotland Railway Company, 10 App. Ca. 147, that a stipulation of this kind between a landowner and a railway company is not to be viewed with any disfavour, but must be construed in its natural and reasonable sense. Except to that extent, the Crathes case is not a guide to the present, because the phrase there was 'all passenger trains,' which, of course, is a more comprehensive phrase than 'all ordinary trains.'

"The evidence shews that there is great difference of opinion among railway men as to the meaning of the word 'ordinary' when applied to a train, and probably the truth is that the meaning varies according to the connection in which the word is used. The pursuer's witnesses say that the proper antithesis of 'ordinary' is 'special,' and that all trains are ordinary which are advertised in the company's time-tables as running regularly for the accommodation of the public. Under 'special' they would include excursion trains, and also such Post-Office trains as are not under the control of the company, but have their hours and their places of call prescribed by the Postmaster-General. The defenders' witnesses, on the other hand, say that the proper antithesis of 'ordinary' is 'express' or 'fast,' and that no trains are ordinary except those which stop at all, or most, of the stations on the line.

"The pursuer's definition is, no doubt, the generic one, for it includes the whole regular train service of the company, and it excludes only what everybody would admit ought to be excluded. It is in this sense that the word is used in the Post-Office Act (1 and 2 Vict. chap. 98), in the defenders' Book of Rules, and in their time-tables, at pages 3, 118, and 126. On the last of these pages, for example, are the bye-laws and regulations made by the company with the approval of the Board of Trade, and one of the bye-laws provides that if a passenger travel by an 'ordinary' train in a class of carriage inferior to that for which he has a ticket, the difference of fare shall be immediately returned to him on application being made before the departure of the train. It is conceded that this would apply to an express train.

"On the other hand, if the word were used with reference to a question of speed, or of fare, it would be used as a rule in opposition to the word 'express.' In former days there was a very common distinction between the fares charged by ordinary and express trains, though it is almost unknown now, and to this hour there is a well-understood distinction between ordinary and express speed.

"In the present case the word occurs in a contract between a landowner and a railway company, for it is none the less a contract that it has received the sanction of the Legislature. Moreover, it refers to a line which was at the date of the contract, and still is, essentially a local line, serving a populous district with very frequent stations. By successive extensions the line has been connected with the defenders' main line to Dundee at both ends, i.e., at Thornton and Leuchars; but there is no through service of trains in the proper sense, and of the four trains which are in question here, two commence their journey, and the other two complete their journey, at the town of Anstruther. No doubt there are through carriages and a through guard by these trains between Anstruther and Edinburgh, but it is no disparagement to that ancient burgh to say that it is not a terminus of importance in a railway sense. In short, the trains are run, not for the convenience of Anstruther in particular, but for the convenience of the group of stations along the Fife seaboard.

"The question, then, is what did the parties intend by using the phrase 'all ordinary trains' in this connection? It is plain that if ordinary trains meant trains which stopped at every station, the landowner took nothing by his clause. But the defenders say, 'a train may pass a few stations without stopping, and yet be an ordinary train.' Well then, I ask, how many? The trains in question stop at four and pass four. If they stopped at Lundin Links, as the pur-

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am quite satisfied to rest my judgment upon the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary, but I desire to add this: The case has been argued to us on two grounds. It has been contended on behalf of the proprietor, on the one hand, that "ordinary" trains include all trains which are run daily and regularly, and that, on the other hand, if "ordinary train" in the contract is used in a sense which would distinguish express trains from those which are sometimes called "ordinary," even in that view it cannot be said that on this little line, which is only a single line and only serves local traffic, there are any trains which can be called "express" or other than "ordinary" trains. The latter is the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken, and it appears to me sufficient for the decision of this case. But it is plain in construing an expression of this kind that, apart from some special category or description suggested by the context, the word "ordinary" is a word of very vague and indeterminate meaning, and I should have difficulty in knowing what was intended to be excluded by the word "ordinary train" in the absence of expressions in the agreement pointing out trains of some extraordinary or special class. And therefore I should be disposed also to adopt the argument to the effect that in a line of this description every train which appears in the suer says they ought to do, they would stop at five, and pass only three. Why should they not be classed as ordinary trains? The only answer is that they are 'fast' trains. I think the defenders' witnesses felt the difficulty of calling them express trains, and therefore they fell back on the word 'fast.' The slowest of them (the 11.38 from Thornton) takes forty-seven minutes to get to Anstruther, while the fastest of the stopping trains (the 9.40 from Anstruther) takes fifty-two minutes to get to Thornton—a difference of only five minutes. The average speed of the so-called fast trains is at the rate of $24\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour, as against an average of $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour for the stopping trains. The defenders' manager says that the trains in question have marks—two discs by day and two lamps by night—which distinguish them as express or fast trains. But I demur to the notion that a railway company can convert a train from an ordinary to an extra-ordinary train by simply putting on discs or running it past a few stations and then calling it 'fast.'

"In short, it seems to me that the character of these trains enables me to decide the case in favour of the pursuer, without attempting any precise definition of the word 'ordinary' as used in the Act. If the East of Fife Branch had become a great through route between (let us say) Dundee and Edinburgh, with real express trains running over it, the change of circumstances might have been so great as to make it unreasonable to hold that the parties had such trains in contemplation when they framed the clause under construction. But the trains in question have no such character. They are essentially local trains, serving not termini but a district, just as the trains on that line have done all along; and if they are local trains of the best class, that only makes it the more natural that the landowner should desire to have the benefit of them. He must be held to have stipulated for something which the voluntary action of the company was not likely to give him. When, therefore, he stipulated that all ordinary trains should stop, I think the agreement was that all trains should stop which did not clearly belong to some other category; and I am of opinion that the trains in question do not belong to any other category."

company's time-tables, and is one that is run daily for the conveyance of passengers, is to be called an ordinary train. The exclusion would then apply to special trains or excursion trains, or trains indeed of any description other than those that are advertised and that are regularly run. It may very well be that under other agreements between railway companies and owners of land adjacent a different principle of construction might be applied, and it may be an element of importance that the station is on a main thoroughfare, on which trains have been run at express speed, conveying passengers without stopping from one terminus to another. But there is nothing here either in the local situation or character of the line, or in the context of the agreement, which to my mind suggests a use of the word "ordinary" as meaning the exclusion of any trains such as run regularly for the conveyance of passengers.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I am not prepared to define exhaustively the kind or kinds of trains which would be excluded from the operation of the contract as being extraordinary. I think it sufficient for the judgment to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the trains in question have not been shewn to us to be other than ordinary trains, and that as they do not belong to any other category they must necessarily fall within the clause in question.

Welsh v.
Russell.

Sale—Sale of heritage—Warrandice.—The purchaser of a heritable subject, holding a disposition containing a clause of absolute warrandice, has no remedy under the warrandice clause other than a claim for indemnity for loss sustained through eviction.

The purchaser of a house and garden, holding a disposition containing a clause of absolute warrandice, two years after the purchase brought an action against the seller concluding for decree ordaining the defender to make payment to the pursuer of £750, "being the present value of the subjects." The pursuer founded on the warrandice clause, and averred that after the purchase the owner of an adjoining property had obtained decree against him establishing the existence of a servitude of way over the garden; that he had thus been evicted from the subjects; that their "present value" was £750; and that he was willing to reconvey the subjects to the defender on payment of £750. Held that in an action upon warrandice a purchaser in a case of partial eviction was not entitled to obtain from the seller the value of the subjects on tendering a reconveyance, his only right being to obtain indemnification for the loss sustained through the eviction, and that as the present summons contained no averment of the pursuer's loss through the existence of the servitude, and no conclusion applicable thereto, it fell to be dismissed.

Expenses—Taxation—Process—A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5.—The A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, provides,—"Notwithstanding that a party shall be found entitled to expenses generally, yet if on the taxation of the account it shall appear that there is any particular part or branch of the litigation in which such party has proved unsuccessful, or that any part of the expense has been occasioned through his own fault, he shall not be allowed the expense of such parts or branches of the proceedings."

The defender of an action, who, besides denying the pursuer's averments on the merits, pleaded that the action was incompetent, did not reclaim against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling the plea to competency and allowing

No. 146. a proof. The Lord Ordinary, having heard the proof, gave judgment for the pursuer. At the hearing upon a reclaiming note against that judgment the defender insisted in his objection to the competency of the action, but admitted that his defences on the merits could not be entertained in the absence of a third party. The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dismissed the action as incompetent, and found the defender entitled to expenses. The pursuer objected to the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses in respect that under the A. S., July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, the Auditor ought to have taxed off the whole expenses of the proof. The Court repelled the objection, holding that the question raised was one which it was for the Court to decide when disposing of the motion for expenses, and not for the Auditor, and that the objection came too late, the Court having finally disposed of the motion for expenses.

1ST DIVISION. IN June 1890 James Russell, manufacturer in Selkirk, sold a house and back-garden in Selkirk to William Welsh, painter there, for £600, conform to disposition containing a clause of absolute warrandice, and bearing that the subjects were free from all burdens.

May 19, 1894.
Welsh v.
Russell.

On 27th December 1892 Welsh brought an action against Russell, concluding for decree that the defender was bound to free and relieve the subjects disposed of a servitude of passage through the back garden, possessed and enjoyed by Thomas Scott, as proprietor of the ground bounding the subjects on the east, and that by procuring from Scott, and duly recording a renunciation or conveyance of the said servitude right; and failing the defender procuring such recorded conveyance or renunciation, for decree ordaining him "to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £750 sterling, being the present value of the subjects and others before described"; and further, and in either case, for payment of £20, 4s. 8d., "being the loss and damage incurred by the pursuer by and in consequence of a decree of interdict" obtained by Scott against him.

The conclusions of the summons made no provision for restitution of the subjects.

The pursuer founded on the warrandice clause in the disposition and averred that in June 1892 Scott claimed a servitude of way through the pursuer's back-garden, and that the pursuer on 3d June intimated this claim to the defender; that on 15th August Scott brought a petition for interdict against the pursuer, and that the pursuer on 17th August intimated this petition to the defender; that the pursuer, being advised by his agents that Scott's claim was valid in law, intimated this to the defender, and further intimated that the action would not be defended in so far as he (the pursuer) was concerned; that Scott obtained interdict on 7th October 1892; that the servitude right was a legal burden over the subjects, and had existed from time immemorial; that it was not disclosed to the pursuer at the time of the sale; that it was of a very burdensome nature and materially depreciated the value of the subjects. "By and through the existence and exercise of the servitude, . . . and the said decree of interdict, the pursuer has been evicted from the peaceable enjoyment and possession of the subjects. . . . The present value of the subjects (which have been greatly improved by the pursuer at an expenditure of £150 or thereby), free of the said servitude, the pursuer estimates at £750, and he is willing to reconvey them to the defender on payment of the sums now sued for."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having purchased the subjects from the defender under a disposition containing absolute warrandice, and having been evicted therefrom, as condescended on, he is entitled to have the records purged of the said servitude rights as concluded for. (2) In the event of the defender failing to purge the records as concluded for, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusion of the summons, with expenses. (3) The pursuer having sustained loss and damage to the amount claimed, by and through the breach of warrandice condescended on, he is entitled to decree therefor against the defender, with expenses. No. 146.

May 19, 1894.
Welsh v.
Russell.

The defender denied the existence of the alleged servitude, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent as laid.

On 18th March 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) repelled the first plea in law for the defender and allowed a proof.

The evidence led at the proof was mainly directed to the question whether the servitude existed.

On 10th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor by which he found that the subjects were burdened with the servitude described in the summons; that the defender was bound to free and relieve the subjects of the said servitude or else to make payment to the pursuer of the present value of the subjects on obtaining a reconveyance thereof from the pursuer; and further, that the defender was bound to make payment to the pursuer of the expenses incurred by him in connection with the action for interdict; continued the cause in order that the defender might have an opportunity of disburdening the subjects, if so advised, and granted leave to reclaim.*

* "OPINION.—(After examining the evidence and coming to the conclusion that the existence of the servitude in question had been established)—The question remains whether he [the pursuer] is entitled to the remedy which he asks.

"Warrandice indemnifies against loss from defective right. Although the existence of an undisclosed and unsuspected servitude does not mean want of title, it constitutes a material limitation on the full right of property which the purchaser had reason to think he was acquiring. Accordingly, in Urquhart v. Halden, 13 S. 844, the discovery of a negative servitude over the ground acquired was held to give the purchaser a right either to have the burden removed or to be relieved of his bargain. It is said by the defender that this rule applies to servitudes only where they are of a very burdensome description, or, to use the words of Erskine, are 'uncommonly heavy' (Ersk. ii. 3, 31). I cannot say that this seems to me a satisfactory distinction, for it lays upon the Court the duty of determining a question of degree, which must depend to some extent on the use which the purchaser intended to make of his property. I do not find that it has ever received effect except in three old cases, two of which were cases of thirlage, and the third a case of peat-casting—(Sandilands (1672), M. 16,599; Symington (1780), M. 16,637; Gordonston (1682), M. 16,606). In the first and last of these great stress seems to have been laid upon the fact of the servitudes being of a kind 'notourly known,' but here all argument to that effect is excluded by the circumstance that the defender repudiates all knowledge on his own part, and cannot therefore impute knowledge to the pursuer. It is impossible to describe the servitude in this case as a very serious one, and I cannot help thinking that a very moderate amount of neighbourly forbearance on the part of Scott and the pursuer would have reduced it to a minimum. But, as a question of law, I am not prepared to affirm that a right of passage at all times through a small urban subject is not a material burden on the full right of property, and therefore I think the defender was wrong in taking up the uncompromising attitude which he did. It follows that the pursuer is entitled to his remedy, and I shall adopt the course which was followed in Urquhart's case by allowing the defender time to endeavour to have the servitude removed. I may add that, if the case should result in decree having to be pronounced for rescission of the bargain and payment of the value of the subjects, I am by no means satisfied that the pursuer has proved the full value which he claims."

No. 146. The defender reclaimed.

May 19, 1894.
Welsh v.
Russell.

At the hearing in the Inner-House the parties ultimately admitted that the question of the existence of the servitude could not competently be determined in the absence of the owner of the alleged dominant tenement.

Argued for the defender;—The action was incompetent in so far as it concluded that the defender, in the event of his failure to procure a renunciation of the alleged servitude, ought to be decerned to make payment to the pursuer of £750 as “being the present value of the subjects.” Assuming the pursuer’s tender of a reconveyance to be read into that conclusion, the conclusion amounted to a claim to have the bargain rescinded. But no relevant grounds were here stated for reduction of the contract. *Urquhart v. Halden*¹ was virtually an action for reduction of the contract, as it proceeded on the ground that the seller there was in bad faith in not disclosing the existence of the servitude. Here, on the other hand, the action was simply an action upon the warrandice clause, which assumed the contract to be effectual and entitled the purchaser to damages merely in the event of eviction. The pursuer’s proper remedy, therefore, was an action for damages in compensation of the loss which he had sustained through the eviction. But it was impossible to treat this action as an action of damages; there was neither averment nor proof of the injury which the existence of this servitude caused to the pursuer. The action ought, consequently, to be dismissed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was competent. The pursuer’s position was, that he had not got what he bargained for, and that consequently he was entitled to return the subjects, receiving in exchange their value. That was the proper course. Eviction from a part of the subjects was eviction from the whole. The defender’s contention came to this, that the remedy for a breach of warrandice was the actio quanti minoris. Such an action was contrary to the general principles of the law of sale in the case of moveables, and there was neither authority nor principle for holding that the sale of heritage was in this respect in a different position.

The parties were also heard upon the question, considered in the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, whether the existence of the servitude in question amounted to a breach of the warrandice.²

At advising, on 20th March 1894,—

LORD M^cLAREN.—This is an action founded on breach of warranty of a sale of heritable property in the town of Selkirk. The warranty is contained in a warrandice clause in the usual form, and the breach complained of consists in the successful assertion of a servitude of way or passage through the pursuer’s garden by the owner of an adjoining tenement. An action was brought in the Sheriff Court to constitute the servitude, and the present pursuer, after intimating the claim to the vendor, the present defender (who declined to interfere), allowed decree to pass in absence, and instituted this action with a view to indemnification. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, and on a consideration of the title-deeds, and explanatory parole evidence, found that the servitude was proved.

Before examining the case on the merits, it is desirable to consider what are the rights of a creditor in the obligation called warrandice, because unless the relief claimed in this action be consistent with the pursuer's rights under the obligation, it is useless to proceed further.

No. 146.
May 19, 1894.
Welsh v.
Russell.

The obligation of warrandice differs from all other obligations in this respect, that it is not intended that it should be performed immediately, or within a definite time, or even within what the law describes as a reasonable time. It remains latent until the conditions come into existence that give it force and effect, and it continues to affect the granter and his heirs until the possibility of adverse claims has been extinguished by the long prescription.

The obligation has also this peculiarity in common with other obligations of indemnity, that its extent is measured by the extent of the injury which the creditor in the obligation may sustain, because such obligations are designed to indemnify the purchaser not only against the consequences of complete eviction, but against the loss of the most inconsiderable fraction of the estate, or its diminution in value by reason of the establishment of a burden of any kind.

If the question were now raised for the first time, how a warranty of title should be enforced, everyone would admit that the remedies of restitution, or repayment of the price, are singularly inappropriate to such a case. To put a case which is quite pertinent to the inquiry, we may suppose that thirty-nine years after the sale of an estate a cottage or an acre of moorland, which had been included in a description of subjects, was found to belong to another proprietor. In such a case, we do not immediately recognise that it is consistent with legal principle or with justice that the heirs of the seller should be required to repay the price, or should be obliged to take back the estate diminished by the evicted acre. If the seller or his heirs should be in a position to purchase the evicted subject and should offer reinstatement, this would seem to be a very satisfactory way of performing their obligation. But again, it is impossible to entertain the proposition that the seller is bound to purchase the evicted subject, because the law does not give him the power of compulsory purchase from the true owner, and the law will not require any man to perform specifically something that is not within his power. It is indeed evident from the nature of the obligation of warrandice that it must in the general case, and probably in all cases, resolve into a claim of pecuniary indemnification for the loss of the subject of sale, or its diminution in value through the existence of real securities, real burdens, servitudes, or other real rights affecting the estate.

Passing to the question of authority, there can be no better authority on such a subject than Erskine, who in Book ii. title 3, treats of warrandice at considerable length, and in section 30 makes it quite clear that in his opinion the remedy is not restitution, but indemnification. He says that "it is uncontested that absolute warrandice, after the subject is evicted, founds the grantee in an action of recourse against the granter, for making up to him the full damage he has suffered, either through the contravention of the warrandice or any defect in the right. An offer by him who warrants a right, therefore, to put the grantee in his own place by making him full payment of the price he paid for it, with the interest from the time of eviction, is not sufficient. For though this would indemnify the grantee, so that he would be no loser by the bargain, yet the obligation to warrant is not intended barely for indemnifying the purchaser, but for securing him against all the consequences of contravention, and, of course, for making payment to him, in case of eviction, of the full value of the subject at that period, together with the loss he has sustained through the want of it from that time." If, as Erskine points out, there are cases where an offer of repayment of the price with interest would not be a sufficient fulfilment of the warranty, it is perfectly clear that there are cases where repayment of the price would be very much in excess of the true measure of the obligation, and if illustration were needed, I could not desire a better one than the present claim. In the 31st section, Erskine considers the case of servitudes and says (speaking with obvious reference to considerable estates) that "warrandice is not incurred by every light servitude that the grantor or his authors may have imposed upon the lands conveyed, such as lands are usually charged with, e.g., aqueducts, passages, or even a moderate thirlage. But, if the servitude be uncommonly heavy, the grantor who makes over the estate tanquam optimum maximum, incurs the warrandice." The liability thus incurred is, of course, the liability to make pecuniary compensation, which is the only kind of liability recognised by the author. It may be that in some cases of total eviction, or cases treated as such, the decree obtained has been in form a decree for repayment of the price with or without interest, according as the purchaser had or had not got benefit by the possession of the lands for the period subsequent to the sale. But this would only be because, in the particular case, the value of the property was unchanged, and the price originally paid was considered to be a fair measure of the loss consequent on eviction. It is proper to point out that repayment in the case supposed is really indemnification, not restitution. Restitution supposes that the purchaser reconveys the estate in exchange for repayment of the price. But in the case supposed reconveyance is impossible, because the estate has been evicted, and such cases lend no support to the theory that on the discovery of a servitude or burden whose existence was unknown to the parties at the time of the sale, the purchaser is entitled to return the subjects to the seller and to demand repayment of the price. If he has such a right, it can only be made good by a reduction on the ground of fraud or error, and not by an action on the warranty.

If I have rightly stated the limits of the liability undertaken by the seller, the present action must fail, because it is neither in form nor in substance an action of damages. The first conclusion is that the defender should free and relieve the subjects described of a servitude of passage by procuring a renunciation of that right. I think that in fair construction this conclusion is only expressed in such terms as to give the defender the option of discharging the servitude, and when so interpreted the conclusion is unobjectionable. But the alternative conclusion is that failing the defender producing such renunciation he shall be decerned "to make payment of the sum of £750, being the present value of the subjects and others before described." If the condescendence had contained any specific statement of damage corresponding to the existence of a limited right in the proprietor of a dominant tenement, it might have been possible to treat the second conclusion as a conclusion for an arbitrary sum of damages. But the theory of the condescendence is that the pursuer is entitled to be indemnified as for a total eviction, and it is not made clear whether he is also to keep the subjects or to restore them. There is neither averment nor proof of partial damage, and my opinion is that the claim for repayment of price or value is inadmissible and contrary to law, and that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary was invited by both parties to determine on the merits the question whether these subjects are or are not affected by a servitude, and he has decided it in favour of the pursuer. It is now admitted that that question of the existence of the servitude is not competently raised in this action, and cannot possibly be decided, for the party really interested in maintaining the existence of the servitude is not a party to the action. It is manifest that if there be any question whether the subjects are burdened by a servitude the true interest of the proprietor is not to maintain the claim but to defeat it; and it is equally clear that no judgment between him on the one hand and the defender on the other could be binding on the owner or alleged owner of the dominant tenement. It came to be conceded, however, I think, at the bar, that that question was not now before us.

No. 146.

Welsh v.
Russell.

The contravention of warrandice, of which the pursuer is entitled to complain, is not the existence of the servitude but a decree in absence obtained by Mr Scott in the Sheriff Court, by which the pursuer's right of property is so burdened as to restrict his use and enjoyment of the subjects purchased. Now, that decree may or may not be well founded, but it cannot be reviewed on its merits in this process. The seller of the subjects—the granter of the warrandice—having had notice of the Sheriff Court proceedings declined to appear, and accordingly the purchaser brings this action on the warrandice clause; and I think he would be quite entitled to say, that whether that Sheriff Court decree is well founded or not, so long as it stands it is an encroachment on his right and a contravention of the warrandice, and therefore that if it is invalid it must be set aside, or if it is well founded he must be indemnified. But I agree with what has been said by Lord M'Laren, that that being the position of his right he has chosen a wrong and inapposite remedy, because the only operative conclusion of the summons which he has brought, after allowing the defender an opportunity of clearing the subjects of the burden, is that the defender should make payment to him of the present value of the subjects described in the summons. Now, that is the ordinary and perfectly appropriate conclusion of a summons upon a warrandice where there has been a total eviction of the subjects from the purchaser, for then the measure of the indemnity which he is asking, and to which he is entitled, is the present value of the whole subjects of which he has been deprived. In such an action the conclusion is not for repayment of the price, as Lord M'Laren has explained, but a conclusion for the present value of the subjects. In the ordinary case, of course, there is no corresponding conclusion for restitution of the subjects, for the assumption of such an action is that they have been carried away.

But such a conclusion is clearly inappropriate to a case where the purchaser remains in possession of the subjects, and complains merely that his use of them is diminished by reason of a servitude right of way. It is impossible that a purchaser of land should recover the entire value of the land from the seller, except on condition of his restoring the land, and in circumstances which will entitle him to do so. It is said that although there is no provision for restoration to be found in the conclusions of the summons, an offer to restore is contained in the condescendence. But however that may be, it is not appropriate to an action for breach of warrandice. That is an action on the contract, and the pursuer of an action founded upon the contract cannot in the same action claim to recover the price and give back the lands, and so to set aside the con-

No. 146. tract. The pursuer does not maintain that he is entitled to reduce the contract. But if he did he could not have decree of reduction in an action founded upon the warrandice clause. The remedy to which he is entitled under the clause of warrandice is not reduction but indemnification. In case of a total eviction he is entitled to demand the whole value of the subjects. In case of a partial eviction he cannot be entitled to the whole value, but only to the value of what he has lost. The action on the warrandice, therefore, where the pursuer is left in possession of the subject, and complains merely of a burden by which its value is diminished, is in effect an action of damages. But if the pursuer has a good claim for damages, there is no conclusion in the summons which will enable us to estimate or give effect to such a claim.

I concur therefore in the opinion of Lord M'Laren.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the reclaiming note for the defender against the interlocutor of Lord Stormonth-Darling, dated 10th November 1893, and heard counsel for the parties, recall said interlocutor, dismiss the action, and decern: Find defender entitled to expenses: Remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax, and to report."

Upon the motion for the approval of the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses, the pursuer objected that, under the Act of Sederunt, July 15, 1876,* the Auditor ought to have taxed off the whole expenses of the proof.

Argued for the pursuer;—The proof had been made necessary in consequence of the defender's denial of the existence of the servitude, but he now admitted that the question of the existence of the servitude could not be entertained in the absence of the owner of the alleged dominant tenement. Either, therefore, the proof was a branch of the litigation in which the defender had been unsuccessful, or the expense of the proof had been occasioned by the defender's fault. The defender's account of expenses, quoad the proof, ought therefore to be disallowed.¹

Argued for the defender;—The defender did not desire a proof; he pleaded that the action was incompetent; but he was not bound to reclaim at once against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 18th March 1893 repelling that plea and allowing a proof. It was the pursuer who was responsible for the proof in consequence of his having insisted in the action; and as the action had ultimately been found to be incompetent he must bear the expense of the proof. At all events it was too late to raise this question now. It was not a question of taxation, but was a question for the Court when considering the motion for expenses.

LORD ADAM.—The objection which is here taken to the Auditor's report does not appear to me to raise a question of taxation. I do not think that "fault," in the sense of the General Regulation, means that the party has stated a plea which he ought not to have stated, so as to entitle the Auditor to determine whether the particular plea ought or ought not to have been stated. Nor do I see how it can be said that there is any branch of the case in which the defender has been unsuccessful; on the contrary, he has been entirely successful.

* The A.S. July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, provides,—“Notwithstanding that a party shall be found entitled to expenses generally, yet if on the taxation of the account it shall appear that there is any particular part or branch of the litigation in which such party has proved unsuccessful, or that any part of the expense has been occasioned through his own fault, he shall not be allowed the expense of such parts or branches of the proceedings.”

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that the Act of Sederunt does not entitle the Auditor to disallow the whole expense of this proof. If the pursuer desired that the whole expense should be disallowed he ought to have argued the question to us when we were dealing with the defender's motion for expenses; but if he had raised that question at that stage I am not sure that he would have been successful. The defender's first plea in law gave the pursuer full notice, in the Outer-House, of the objection to the competency of the action, and he must be held to have known that although the Lord Ordinary repelled the plea it was open to the defender to renew his objection at a later stage. It was for the pursuer, therefore, to consider whether he should go on with his action and so take the risk of the defender's objection ultimately proving successful, or abandon the action and raise another which might not be open to the objection of incompetency. Unless we are prepared to hold that a defender, who pleads that an action is incompetent, is bound to reclaim at once against an interlocutor repelling that plea, I do not see how we can say that this proof has been occasioned by the fault of the defender.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that the question raised is not a question of taxation but is a question for the Court to decide, and I think that it cannot competently be brought before the Court after the question of expenses has been finally disposed of by interlocutor.

Lease—Repair of farm buildings—Disrepair from natural decay—Damages—Personal exception—Mora.—In an action of damages at the instance of a tenant against his landlord on the ground that from 1887 to 1892 he had not had the use of the granary and piggery on the farm, the pursuer averred that in the former year those buildings became "unfit to be repaired" "on account of decay occasioned by the lapse of time," that at the rent collection in the summer of that year, and at every succeeding rent collection, he had asked the factor to put them into tenantable order, and that the factor had frequently promised to have this done, but had never fulfilled his promise. He had not, however, made or claimed any deduction from his rent. Held (1) that the tenant had a relevant action of damages, in respect that the landlord was liable for extraordinary repairs necessitated by natural decay; and (2) that the tenant was not barred by delay from insisting on his claim.

Process—Appeal for jury trial—Remit to Sheriff—Special cause—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 40.—In an action in a Sheriff Court at the instance of a tenant of a farm against his landlord for £100 damages, on the ground that he had not had the use of certain buildings on the farm, which had become useless through decay, the Sheriff allowed a proof. The defender having appealed for jury trial, the pursuer moved the Court to remit the cause to the Sheriff on the ground that the sum at stake was trifling, and that the Sheriff was already acquainted with the case, as, in another action, he had already settled the question of the landlord's liability to repair the buildings. Held that the defender was entitled to have the case tried by jury, no special cause to the contrary having been shewn.

GEORGE JOHNSTONE was tenant of the farm of Ringour, Kirkcudbrightshire, under a lease for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1881. The proprietor, Mrs Hughan of Airds, and her husband were bound under the lease to do certain specified work on the barn and stable, and to put the cart-shed in repair. The lease then contained the following clause:—"And with regard to the houses and fences on the premises hereby let, the said George Johnstone binds and obliges himself and his fore-saids to maintain them in good and sufficient repair during the currency of this lease."

In 1892 Johnstone raised an action in the Sheriff Court, Kirkcudbright, against Mr and Mrs Hughan, to have them ordained to execute such repairs on the granary and piggeries on his farm as might be found to be necessary to put them in a tenantable condition. The Sheriff-substitute remitted to a man of skill to report on the state of the buildings, and the report having been given in, Mr and Mrs Hughan agreed to execute the work specified therein, and this they afterwards did.

In February 1894 Johnstone raised a second action in the Sheriff Court against Mr and Mrs Hughan concluding for £100 damages in respect of the loss he had suffered from being deprived of the use of the piggery and granary for five years.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "A few years after the beginning of said lease certain of the office-houses on said farm, and particularly the granary and pig-houses, began to shew signs of decay, and the pursuer had several times to repair the same, but by about the end of the year 1887, on account of decay occasioned by the lapse of time, and not through any undue negligence on the part of the pursuer, the said granary and pig-houses had become unfit to be repaired, and required to be renewed." (Cond. 4) "In consequence of said decay the said granary and pig-houses had by the end of 1887 become utterly unfit for the purposes of the farm. Owing to the rotten condition of the roof and floor of the said granary, and the dilapidated state of the said pig-houses, the pursuer has since 1887 been unable to store his grain in said granary or keep pigs in said pig-houses. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer frequently called upon the defenders to put said office-houses into tenantable condition. At the half-yearly rent collection in the summer of 1887, and again at every succeeding rent collection, as well as on other occasions, he intimated to the defender's factor, Mr William Milroy, solicitor, Kirkcudbright, the state of the said houses, and called upon him to have them put into tenantable order. The said factor frequently promised to have this done, but delayed or neglected to do so, and the pursuer accordingly wrote to the said factor on 9th January 1890, and to the defender, the said Major Henry Houghton Hughan, on 11th January 1890, calling upon them to have the necessary work done. . . ."

"On 8th January 1892 the pursuer's agent wrote to the defenders' agent regarding the granary, and added,—'I have further to inform you that Mr Johnstone will hold the landlord liable for whatever loss he has sustained or may hereafter sustain from the said granary being unfit for use.'"

He then averred that in consequence of the defenders' failure to put the granary and piggery into repair he had been deprived of the use of them for more than five years. "He has thereby suffered loss, inconvenience, and expense, which he estimates at £100 sterling."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The parts of the subjects let above condescended on having fallen into decay through the lapse of time, and being past ordinary repair, the defenders, as landlords of the pursuer, were bound to execute the renewals and restorations necessary to put the said subjects into tenantable condition, and they having delayed and refused to do so, the pursuer is entitled to compensation for the loss and injury he has thereby sustained. No. 147.
May 22, 1894.
Johnstone v. Hughan.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the prayer of his petition. There is no specification of damage.

On 27th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) allowed parties a proof.

The defenders appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no relevant ground for holding the defenders liable in damages for any loss incurred by the pursuer through his exclusion from these buildings. It was evident from the terms of the lease that the landlord was to repair certain of the farm buildings, and that, quoad ultra, the tenant was to take things as they were. Even if it was incumbent on the defenders to renew these buildings, when it was properly brought to their notice that they required renewal the tenant, while he averred that he had made such a request, did not say that he had intimated a claim for damages until the letter of 8th January 1892. If a claim of damages on the ground of exclusion from part of the subjects of the lease was to be made it should have been intimated from the first, and the tenant should in each year have refused to pay the rent, or made a reservation with regard to his claim; as he had not done that, he must be held to have departed from it,¹ at least up to the date of the letter. Further, the averments as to the damage suffered were not sufficiently specific.

Argued for the pursuer;—The landlord was liable to keep these houses in repair, as it was not averred that the disrepair was caused by any fault of the pursuer, or by anything but decay.² In a question of damages the tenant was entitled to date his claim from the time when he first made an effective complaint,³ and that he did in the present case, in 1887, when he complained to the factor. The averments of damage were sufficiently specific.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the pursuer has a relevant case on record. I am unable to give effect to the appellants' argument that the lease as a whole absolves the landlord from the ordinary and inherent obligation on any person letting farm buildings to keep them extant. The case here is that the untenable condition of the granary and piggery was caused by decay,—that is to say, that it was not caused by the absence of timely repairs, such as fell to the tenant to make. In such circumstances there can be no doubt that the landlord is prima facie responsible, and it is going too far to say that, because the landlord has undertaken certain specified operations by way of renewals, that this completely exonerates him for the future from doing anything more to counteract the dilapidation of the premises by decay.

As regards the argument that the tenant has discharged his claim for damages,

² Mossman v. Brocket, May 19, 1810, Hume's Dec. 850; Napier v. Ferrier, June 24, 1847, 9 D. 1354, 19 Scot. Jur. 586.

³ Macdonald v. Johnstone, June 12, 1883, 10 R. 959.

No. 147. the case does not, I think, fall within the principle of the cases of Broadwood v. Hunter and Emslie. The tenant here says that he did make specific claims for certain operations to be carried out, and that his claims were met by specific promises by the factor that what he required should be done. That averment supplies what was absent in the cases I have referred to, and I cannot think that here the tenant has so conducted himself as to make the landlord believe that he had departed from his claim. No doubt the averments as to the damage are rather general and colourless, but I am not prepared to say that they are so insufficient as to disentitle the pursuer from going to trial.

May 22, 1894.
Johnstone v.
Hughan.

LORD ADAM.—The lease between the pursuer and defender dealt with certain matters regarding the state of the offices, and it imposed certain obligations on the landlord with regard to them, and then provided that, these things being done, the tenant should take them over and keep them in repair. In so far as the lease deals with these matters it is, of course, conclusive, but beyond these obligations there are other legal obligations on both sides with which the lease did not deal. Now, it appears that about the seventh year of the lease the granary and piggery on the farm, by no neglect of the tenant, got into a condition of natural decay, and the question is, What is the legal obligation with regard to the repair of these buildings? I am of opinion that when there is a case of what may be called extraordinary repairs (as they are called by Lord President Boyle in the case of Broadwood), the obligation to restore is on the landlord. Now, that is the case here, and therefore, I think, there is a relevant ground of damage stated.

It is, however, further said that the tenant is not entitled to insist in the claim, in respect that when he paid his rent in 1887, and subsequent years, he did not intimate and insist on a claim for damages. That plea is rested on the cases of Broadwood v. Hunter and Emslie. That plea amounts to a plea of mora, and that plea always refers us to the particular circumstances in which it is pleaded. The case of Broadwood was a periodical claim for damage done to a farm by rabbits, and it must be observed that, from the nature of the claim, if it is not made at once, the defender is not in a position to prove his defence. The case of Emslie was a claim of damages for insufficient heather-burning, and there it was proposed to go back for a number of years before the claim was made. There again, if the case had been held to be relevant, there would have been a clear injustice against the landlord, as he could not have proved all the facts,—as to the burning, the state of the weather in each year, and so on, necessary for his defence. That, as I understand it, is the principle of those cases, but the case here is not of that kind. In 1887 notice was here given to the factor of the state in which the buildings were, and he was then and subsequently called on to put them in repair. The factor promised to do so but did not fulfil his promise. That being so, I do not think that the case is within the rule of the cases I have referred to.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The defenders then moved that the cause should be sent to trial before a jury, on the ground that there were no special circumstances in the case to deprive them of their right to a jury.¹

The pursuer moved that the cause should be remitted to the Sheriff to proceed, looking to the trifling nature of the cause,¹ and to the fact that the Sheriff was acquainted with the cause, as he had already decided in a previous action the question of the landlord's liability to repair the buildings. No. 147.

Johnstone v.
Hughan.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this case must go to a jury. The appellants and defenders desire that that course should be taken. The action is one of damages, and I concur in the view expressed by Lord Adam in the case of Willison v. Petherbridge, July 15, 1893, 20 R. 976, where he says,—“This is an action of damages, and the Legislature says that such actions, when they originate in this Court, are to go to a jury unless special cause be shewn why this should not be done, or the parties agree otherwise. These actions of damages, arising in the Sheriff Court, may be appealed to this Court for jury trial, and that being so we must take it that the Legislature intended such actions to be tried by jury, just as if they had originated in this Court, provided the sum claimed is of the requisite amount. That amount is fixed at £40.”

On that ground I think the case must go to a jury, there being no special cause which does not apply to all similar cases of damages.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is quite settled that it is only in exceptional circumstances that an appellant is refused his privilege of jury trial. There are no exceptional circumstances here. The smallness of the sum claimed is an element for consideration in these questions, but there is nothing of that kind to be considered here. It sometimes happens that a defender appeals merely to raise a question of relevancy, and it has been decided that if it appears advisable the Court may thereafter send the case either to a jury or to proof before a Lord Ordinary or may remit it to the Sheriff, but in this case the appellants maintain their right to jury trial, and I am of opinion that they are entitled to this.

LORD KINNEAR.—There is nothing to render this case unsuitable for jury trial, and the smallness of the sum claimed is not in itself sufficient to induce us to refuse the appellants' motion for a jury trial.

THE COURT approved the following issue, and remitted the case to Lord Wellwood for jury trial:—“Whether, during the period from the beginning of 1888 to June 1893, or any part thereof, the floor and roof of the granary, and the floor, roof, and doors of the pig-houses on said farm were in such a state of decay as to render the said granary and pig-houses unfit for the purposes of the farm, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

By feu-disposition dated in May 1839 Alexander Middleton disposed a piece of ground on the south side of Belmont Road, Aberdeen, to Roderick M'Kay, who in the same year disposed the subjects to Misses Lamond, Isabella Jane, and Helen Leslie.

The feu-disposition provided, inter alia,—"The said Roderick M'Kay and his foresaids shall be bound within two years from the date of entry, under these presents, to erect on the ground hereby disposed one or more dwelling-houses or shops and dwelling-houses combined, similar in style and quality to and not exceeding in height the houses already erected by me on the south side of Belmont Road foresaid, or cottages, or two-storey houses (which however shall have no attics therein for occupation as dwelling-places, other than personally by tenants or others occupying the first or second floors of such dwelling-houses, subletting of said attics being excluded), not inferior to those on the north side of said road; but having the north or front walls thereof built of dressed or hammer-blocked ashlar work of granite stone; and which building shall be of the value of at least £1000 sterling; and my disponent is hereby specially prohibited from placing in the roofs fronting to Belmont Road of the houses to be erected by him as aforesaid projecting windows of any kind whatever, but such windows as are placed in the said roofs shall be flush with the same; but declaring that this prohibition does not apply to any cottages to be erected by my said disponent as aforesaid, the roofs of which may have projecting windows."

No buildings having been erected on the feu, in November 1891 Middleton raised an action in the Court of Session against the Misses Leslie to have them ordained forthwith to erect houses as stipulated for in the feu-disposition, and for damages.

On 19th May 1892 (19 R. 801) the First Division ordained the defenders to erect the buildings within one year.

In January 1893 the defenders submitted to the pursuer the plans of the proposed buildings. The pursuer objected to the plans as not being in conformity with the stipulations in the feu-disposition, but the defenders proceeded to erect buildings according to the plans.

The pursuer thereupon raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen to have them interdicted from proceeding with the building. This action was remitted to the Court of Session ob contingentiam, and was there conjoined with the original action.*

The pursuer then amended his summons by averring that the buildings then being erected were not conform to the stipulations in the feu-disposition, but were "inferior in style and quality to the houses erected by the pursuer on the south side of Belmont Road. The said buildings so erected by the pursuer consist of a tenement and a half, containing two shops, an office, and dwelling-houses, of which dwelling-houses five contain four rooms each, and five three rooms each. The buildings erected by the defenders consist of half houses, some of two rooms and others of two rooms and a closet each. In the houses containing three apartments the bedrooms are smaller than in the houses on the south side, and some of them contain no fireplaces, while the bedrooms of the houses on the south side all contain fireplaces. The houses on the south side of Belmont Road belonging to the pursuer let to tenants of the middle class at rents of from £14 to £17 annually. The houses erected by the defenders are much inferior to those, and will only let to an inferior class of tenants, and at rents of not more than from £8 to £12 a-year.”

Middleton v.
Lealie.

The defenders denied that the houses they were erecting were “in any respect in violation of the feu-disposition.”

Proof was allowed, but before it was led the defenders’ buildings were finished.

From the proof it appeared that the buildings erected by the pursuer and the defenders respectively were of the construction set forth in the amended condescendence above quoted. A large body of evidence was led by the pursuer to prove that the houses built by the defenders would attract a poorer class of tenant, and so reduce the value of the pursuer’s houses. The defenders on their side led evidence to disprove this.

On 10th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the houses erected by the defenders are disconform to the conditions of the feu-charter: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action raised in this Court, and dismisses the Sheriff Court action, and decerns.” *

* “OPINION.—The question in this case is whether a certain dwelling-house or tenement of dwelling-houses built by the defender on ground feued by him from the pursuer in Belmont Road, Aberdeen, is dissimilar in style and quality to a certain other tenement of dwelling-houses erected by and belonging to the pursuer, and situated on the same side of Belmont Road.

“The pursuer contends that the defender’s buildings are thus dissimilar. He says they are inferior buildings, or rather inferior dwelling-houses, and that he is entitled to damages in respect that their erection constituted a breach of the conditions of the defender’s feu—one of these conditions being that the feuar shall erect within a specified time ‘one or more dwelling-houses, or shops and dwelling-houses combined, similar in style and quality and not exceeding in height the houses already erected by the superior on the south side of Belmont Road aforesaid.’

“Upon the proof I am not able to hold that the defender’s tenement is dissimilar in style and quality to the pursuer’s. Externally it is admitted that there is no difference between the two. The complaint is that the two tenements are differently subdivided, the pursuer’s tenement being divided into houses of three and four rooms and the defender’s into houses of two and three rooms. This it is said implies a distinct difference in the probable class of tenants, and therefore that viewed with respect to occupation—that is to say, to the class of tenants—the houses forming the defender’s tenement are inferior to the houses forming the pursuer’s.

“Now upon the proof I am disposed to think that the houses within the defender’s tenement will probably be occupied by a lower class of tenants. Nay more, I do not know that I should object to say that the houses forming the defender’s tenement are by reason of their smaller size inferior in style and quality to the houses within the pursuer’s tenement.

“But the question I think is not whether the houses within the two tenements, but whether the two tenements—are dissimilar in style and quality. The feu-charter no doubt speaks not of tenements, but of ‘dwelling-houses.’ But what is meant by a dwelling-house is plainly a building—not a set of rooms within a building. In other words the tenements constitute the dwelling-houses to be compared, and that being so, the question, as I have said, is whether the two tenements are dissimilar ‘in style and quality.’

“Now ‘style and quality’ have in my opinion reference not to the occupation of the subjects, or to their adaptation to this or that kind of occupation. The reference is to their style and quality as buildings, and compared as buildings it is, I think, impossible to say that the two are dissimilar. Externally they are

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The words “similar in style and quality” in the feu-disposition applied both to the external appearance and internal arrangement of the houses to be built, and in tenements of houses the words applied to each individual house. Thus in the present case houses containing three or two rooms could not be said to be similar in style and quality to houses containing three or four rooms. Smaller houses naturally attracted poorer tenants, and thus lowered the general character of the whole street. The evidence proved this, and, therefore, the pursuer had an interest to enforce the restriction.¹

The defenders argued;—The clause being a clause restricting the rights of the defenders should be construed liberally. The word “dwelling-houses” in the feu-charter meant the whole building, and only applied to the external appearance of the tenements, and to the workmanship and material of which they were built. Such words did not apply to the internal arrangement of the building, or to the use to which it was to be put.² The evidence failed to prove any damage to the pursuer.

LORD ADAM.—This action raises a question between a superior and a vassal. The superior founds upon a clause in the feu-contract which imposes on the vassal certain obligations with regard to the building of houses or tenements upon the feu. The state of matters at the present time is this: At a previous stage of the case we held that the defender was bound to implement the obligation laid upon him by building a certain house upon the ground feued to him. He sent a plan shewing the house which he proposed to build, to the superior. The superior intimated in reply that he did not approve of the plan, but the vassal nevertheless built the house, and the question we have now to decide is, whether the house so built is in conformity with the stipulations of the feu-contract. The superior does not seek to enforce an irritancy against the vassal, but brings an action of damages, alleging that the manner in which the house has been built is not in conformity with the feu-contract, and that he has sustained damage owing to the vassal's breach of contract.

The clause in the feu-contract binds the vassal “within two years from the date of entry . . . to erect on the ground hereby disposed, one or more dwelling-houses, or shops and dwelling-houses combined, similar in style and quality to and not exceeding in height the houses already erected by me on the south side of Belmont Road.” It is then provided alternatively that the vassal may build cottages, and various other provisions follow, it being stipulated, for example, that the building to be erected shall be of the value of at least £1000.

the same, and the difference between them is not in the style and quality of the structures, but in the extent to which they are internally subdivided. I put it to the pursuer's counsel whether if the defender had erected, not a tenement divided into two-roomed houses, but self-contained dwelling-houses, or dwelling-houses divided into houses say of six or eight rooms, the pursuer could still have objected; and he was obliged to admit that his argument went that length. But this, as it seems to me, reduces the pursuer's argument to an absurdity. The superior cannot be supposed to have prohibited larger houses than those in his own tenement, and if so, I do not see how he can be held to have prohibited smaller houses. The thing prohibited is, it will be observed, ‘dissimilarity.’

“On the whole I am of opinion that the pursuer's objection to the defender's building is not well founded, and I must therefore find for the defender in both actions, with expenses.”

Middleton v.
Leslie.

The vassal is also prohibited from doing certain things. The part of the contract which has formed the subject of discussion is the provision that the vassal shall erect dwelling-houses, or shops and dwelling-houses combined, "similar in style and quality" to the houses built by the pursuer on the same side of the road. A material dissimilarity is said to exist between the houses built by the vassal and those built by the superior, and the dissimilarity is said to consist in this: The houses in the tenement built by the vassal consist of two or three rooms each, whereas those in the superior's tenement consist of four or five rooms each, and the objection taken is that the smaller houses attract tenants of an inferior class, and that the tenants are more numerous in number, with the result that there are more children about the street. That is in truth the leading objection, which is therefore one with reference to the internal construction, and not the external appearance of the building. The only objection stated to the external appearance is that the building erected by the vassal is one foot lower than that erected by the superior, but with reference to the observations which have been made on the use of the word "quality" in the feu-contract, I may say that in the matter of excellence of construction no objection is taken to the building either externally or internally. It is not said that the masonry or carpentry are of different quality or inferior workmanship.

The question is, whether houses which differ in the manner I have described are of the same style and quality. With reference to the whole clause, the first observation which I have to make is that it does not deal with use and occupation, and so far as I see, the house having once been erected, there is nothing to prevent the vassal from introducing any number of tenants into it. He might let it out in rooms, and I say again that, so far as use and occupation are concerned, there is no prohibition of any kind in the feu-contract. Mr Jameson founded upon the fact that there was a prohibition imposed as regards cottages in the event of their being built, that the attics should not be let out separately from the first or second floors, but that prohibition has reference only to cottages, and the fact that it is imposed in the case of the cottages goes in my humble opinion to support the observation that there is no prohibition as to the use and occupation of the houses.

In the next place, the words "style and quality" refer to the whole building, and not to any particular portion of it. It is provided, for example, that the houses are not to exceed in height the houses erected by the superior, which clearly refers to the height of the whole tenement, and shews that the words "style and quality" refer to the house as a whole, and not to the separate parts into which it may be divided.

If that is so, the question is whether the houses, so far as their external appearance and quality of construction and workmanship is concerned, are the same in style and quality. The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that they are, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I do not say that "style and quality" necessarily refer only to the external appearance. I think they may also refer to the internal construction so far as quality of material and workmanship is concerned. But these words do not in my opinion refer to the internal subdivision of the tenement, and the buildings being of similar quality and style in other respects, I cannot see that their difference in the matter of internal subdivision is such as to lead us to differ from the Lord Ordinary.

LORD KINNEAR—I am of the same opinion. I think Mr Abel was quite right in saying that when stipulations of this kind imposing restrictions upon rights of property are expressed in ambiguous terms, they must be construed contra proferentem, that is, against the superior and in favour of the vassal who is to be limited in the use of his property. I think that that general rule is applicable in this case, because the language used in the feu-contract is exceedingly vague. The houses which the vassal is taken bound to erect are to be similar in quality and style to those already erected by the superior. The superior says that he has erected a tenement of shops, offices, and dwelling-houses consisting of three or four rooms each, and he complains that the vassal has erected a tenement containing dwelling-houses, some of three and some of two rooms. The vassal's buildings therefore resemble the superior's in so far as they are tenements subdivided into dwelling-houses containing a very small number of rooms.

I agree with Lord Adam that the restriction in the feu-contract does not strike against use and occupation. The question therefore to be considered is, whether the division into houses of two and three rooms, instead of into houses of three and four rooms each, creates a dissimilarity in style and quality between the two buildings, and I cannot say that it does. If the superior intended to limit the subdivision which should be permissible to his vassal, he should have done so in express terms. I agree with Lord Adam that in order to satisfy the obligation of the vassal his house should in material and workmanship be as good inside and outside as the superior's—but it is not said that the two houses are different in this respect.

The other differences seem to be immaterial. I should, however, have thought that the difference in height between the two tenements might have afforded the superior a ground of objection if the condition in the contract had stopped at the word “quality,” but the following sentence contains a specific provision that the vassal shall not build higher tenements than the superior's, which seems to me to imply that the new buildings need not be of the same height as the old, provided they do not infringe the specific restriction.

As to the general construction of the clause, it appears to me that some light is thrown upon the question what the superior meant by “style and quality,” by a comparison of the clauses as to the different kind of buildings which the vassal may erect. He is bound to erect houses “similar in style and quality to and not exceeding in height the houses already erected” by the superior. But he (the vassal) is allowed as an alternative to erect cottages or two-storey houses subject to certain restrictions. The distinction seems to be between the general style of the houses already built and that of the cottages or two-storey buildings.

Howard's
Executor v.
Howard's
Curator Bonis.

Aliment—Husband and Wife—Maintenance of lunatic widow.—A husband died intestate and childless, survived by his widow, who was of unsound mind, and was confined in a lunatic asylum. She had no means of subsistence other than her right to a half of her husband's estate, which amounted to £200. In a special case between her curator bonis and the deceased's next of kin, held that the maintenance of the widow was not a burden on the husband's estate, and that the next of kin were entitled to immediate payment of one-half thereof.

GEORGE FREDERICK HOWARD, Leith, died there intestate and childless, 1ST DIVISION. on 26th April 1892, survived by his widow, Mrs Agnes E. Howard, who was of unsound mind. John Walker, C.A., was, on 28th February 1893, appointed to be her curator bonis.

He was also survived by George F. Howard, his father, and by a brother and sister. The brother, William Edward Howard, was confirmed executor to the deceased.

A question having arisen as to the division of the deceased's estate, a special case was presented to the Court, to which the executor was the first party, the widow's curator bonis the second party, and the father, brother, and sister were the third parties.

In the case it was stated that the widow had no means other than her interest in her husband's estate, and a letter from the physician of the asylum in which Mrs Howard was an inmate was set forth in which he stated that,—“There are no symptoms at present in her case contra-indicating recovery. She may or may not recover.”

In these circumstances the second party contended that in respect of Mrs Howard's insanity and inability to earn her own livelihood, her maintenance—she being without means of her own—was a burden upon her husband's estate, and that, therefore, so long as she remained in such condition, the executor was bound to hold the estate and apply it, so far as it would go, for the maintenance of Mrs Howard. The third parties, on the other hand, contended that the second party was only entitled to one-half of the estate, as jus relictæ, and that they were entitled now to the other half thereof as father and next of kin of the deceased. It was stated at the bar that the value of the estate was £200.

The following questions were submitted to the Court:—“(1) Is the second party entitled in the circumstances to require the first party to retain the estate and apply it, so far as it will go, for the maintenance of the deceased's widow, or to require payment of one half of the estate now, and to insist that the first party should hold the other half thereof until it is ascertained whether it is required for Mrs Howard's maintenance? or, (2) Are the third parties entitled to payment at once of one half of the deceased's estate as the father and next of kin of the deceased, the second party being paid the other half in full of the widow's claim on the estate?”

Argued for the third parties, the next of kin;—They were entitled to immediate payment of one-half of the estate. The widow's right to jus relictæ was a debt on the estate, but a claim to maintenance was not.¹ The law had settled what the amount of a widow's claim on her husband's Executor v.

Argued for the second party, the curator;—The first party was bound to retain the dead's part, and apply it as necessity arose to the maintenance of the widow—a claim for maintenance was a debt against the husband or his estate.¹ Wherever the legal provisions in favour of a widow were not sufficient to afford her reasonable maintenance, the Court had power to give her a maintenance out of the estate.² The cases cited were all cases of allowances out of income, but here the income was so small that no provision could be made out of it, and therefore the capital must contribute. The case of *Mackintosh v. Taylor*³ was distinguishable in this, that there the question arose between children, and if the claim had been given effect to the person against whom the claim was made would have been rendered a pauper himself.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The way in which this case is put by the second party is that he is entitled to require payment of one half of the estate now, and to insist that the first party should hold the other half thereof until it is ascertained whether it is required for Mrs Howard's maintenance. I am of opinion that we should answer the first question in the negative. The widow, it is not disputed, is entitled to get £100. That is sufficient to maintain her for three or four years, but the proposition of the second party is that, because the widow may possibly remain of unsound mind and unable to support herself, the Court ought to say that that portion of the estate which would in the ordinary course of law go to the next of kin shall not go to them, but be retained for the maintenance of the widow. I know of no authority for that proposition. No doubt there were cited cases to the effect that where a husband has died possessed of considerable estate, leaving his widow unprovided for, she has been found entitled to aliment out of the income of the estate, but that is not what is asked here. What is said is that on the arrival of an event which may never occur, the capital of that part of the estate which belongs to the next of kin shall be utilised for the widow's maintenance, and that it shall be kept up by the first party, and not paid to the next of kin, until it shall be seen whether that conditional event will ever occur. I do not think that we can give effect to that proposition.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should be sorry to throw any doubt on the rule of law under which a child or a widow unprovided for or insufficiently provided for by the deeds of the head of the family has a claim for aliment against the father's or husband's representatives. That such a claim exists is stated by Lord Stair, with the limitation that it only arises if the father has left a competent estate. The case mentioned by Stair is that between son and son, but of course the principle applies equally to the case between a widow and her husband's representatives. Such a claim is recognised in the cases cited by Mr Craigie, cases which are not recent, but which are of undoubted authority. All those are cases where from the way in which the estate was invested the widow or child making the claim of aliment had not received a fair share of the intestate's succession.

In the present case the estate is moveable, and by operation of law it falls to be divided between the widow and the next of kin. Now, it seems to me that when a widow has received her full legal share of the husband's succession this is complete fulfilment of the husband's obligation to provide for her. In the present case it is admitted that the widow is entitled to receive £100, the total amount of the estate being £200.

Howard's
Executor v.
Howard's
Curator Bonis.

No authority has been cited for the proposed extension of the doctrine of the liability of the deceased's estate for aliment, and such extension might lead to very inequitable results, for the claim, if it exists at all, must continue through life, and it would be in the power, for example, of a child who had spent his share of the succession to come down at any time upon his more provident brothers and sisters for aliment.

Some of the decisions relating to aliment are cases where the conventional provisions were insufficient. Such a state of matters may very easily happen. A father whose means are small may make what he thinks at the time a suitable provision for his wife and children, and yet that provision may be quite insufficient if the father dies in affluent circumstances. The reasonableness of a provision depends upon whether it is reasonable in all the circumstances of the estate. It must further be noticed that in some of the cases cited the provisions in favour of the claimant were of the nature of annual payments out of income. Now, here the curator is entitled to go on spending the £100 which the widow gets until it is exhausted. She is therefore not at present destitute, and the necessity for a further sum for aliment may never emerge; the widow may succeed to money, or she may die before the £100 is exhausted, and so the necessity for aliment may stop. I see no justice or equity in the money, which by law belongs to the next of kin, being held over to meet this event which may never occur.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have examined the cases in Morison cited by Mr Craigie, and I find in them certain features widely distinguishing them from the present.

1. Where the Court has granted additional aliment there has been a great disproportion between the income of the heir's estate and the income from the widow's share. In the case of Thomson the husband died infert in only a small portion of the lands, with the result that the yield of the terce amounted to only one-sixth of the free income of the whole lands of which the husband had died possessed. There the Court held that the mere fact that there was a legal provision for the widow did not exclude her from claiming further aliment; and they acted on the view that the legal provision did not afford to the widow the sort of provision which the law holds to be just.

2. There, again, what the Court gave to the widow was a payment out of income and not out of the capital of the legal share of the heir or next of kin.

3. Further, the criterion of the amount of aliment to be given was not the amount of the widow's income, but the amount of the total income of the estate. That that is so is clearly brought out by what was said from the bench,—“Where there are no conventional provisions the widow is entitled to an aliment out of her husband's estate suitable to its free income. When her legal provisions of terce and jus relictæ are not adequate to this, she is entitled to an additional aliment out of it.”

Now, turning to the present case we find in the first place that there is no

No. 149. disproportion between the share taken by the widow and that taken by the next of kin. On the contrary, the two shares are equal moieties of the whole estate; 2d, what is asked for by the widow here is not a part of the income of the husband's estate, but the capital of the whole of it; and 3d, the claim is put forward solely on the ground of the widow's needs, and so far from equitably adjusting the rights of the next of kin and of the widow, it would operate the total extinction of the rights of the next in kin in the succession. I think, therefore, that we should answer the second question in the affirmative.

Succession—Option to take over heritable subjects at specified price—Enhancement of value after date of settlement—Recompense—Mora.—By trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1868, and codicil dated in 1871, a truster directed his trustees to carry on his business, assuming as a partner his eldest son, and to assume his second and third sons as partners with shares of profits when and as soon as the trustees should think proper, and to retain the balance of the profits for the general purposes of the settlement. The sons assumed as partners were to have the option of taking over the business premises, subject to a bond for £20,000, at the price of £8000. In 1872 the business premises, which had cost £29,500, were totally destroyed by fire. The testator recovered from insurance companies £11,550, giving security to the bondholder that he would rebuild the premises. The testator approved of plans for their reconstruction on a more expensive scale, and partially carried out the building prior to his death in 1873. The trustees expended £13,000 beyond the insurance money in completing the buildings. The new buildings were valued in 1884 at £51,000. The trustees with the eldest son carried on the business, and in 1884 the second son was assumed as a partner, and in 1891 the third was assumed. After the assumption of the latter the three brothers intimated to the trustees that they exercised the option of taking over the business premises.

In a special case held (1) that the three sons had not lost their right to exercise the option by delay, and (2) that they were entitled to have the subjects conveyed to them on the conditions set forth in the settlement, without compensating the general estate for the sums expended on them since the testator's death.

1ST DIVISION.

HUGH FRASER died on 12th February 1873. He left a trust-disposition and settlement and relative codicil, dated 24th November 1868 and 26th January 1871 respectively. He was survived by his widow and by five sons and three daughters.

Doubts having arisen as to the effect of the trust-disposition, a special case was presented to the Court, to which the trustees under the deed were the first parties; the testator's eldest son the second party; his second and third sons the third parties; his fourth and fifth sons the fourth parties; the testator's daughters and their husbands the fifth parties; and the children of such of the fifth parties as were married No. 150. were the sixth parties.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the testator conveyed his whole estate to his trustees for certain purposes. By the fourth purpose he bequeathed to his children equally share and share alike in liferent, and to their respective issue in fee, the heritable subjects which formed his business premises, "declaring, however, that in the event of any of my sons entering into my business, and being desirous to hold said heritable subjects in their own name for the purpose of business, he or they shall have the option of having said subjects conveyed over to him or them upon payment of the sum of £8000 sterling as the value thereof beyond the heritable burden thereon [£20,000], and which sum of £8000 sterling shall be invested in separate sums in heritable securities in the names of my said children in liferent, and their respective issues in fee." May 25, 1894.
Fraser's Trustees v. Fraser.

By the 18th purpose he, inter alia, directed, authorised, and empowered his trustees to carry on, along with Mr M'Laren (his partner) and eldest son James, his business as a warehouseman until the expiry of the partnership then subsisting between him and Mr M'Laren, and for a longer period if the trustees should think it advisable, and to leave in the business the remainder of the testator's capital. By the codicil to his settlement, dated 26th January 1871, the testator directed his trustees in addition to assume his two sons John (born in 1864) and Hugh (born in 1866) as partners, with a share of profits, when and so soon as the trustees should think proper, and to retain the balance of the profits not appropriated to the sons for the general purposes of the settlement.

It appeared from the case that at the date of his death the testator carried on his business of warehouseman in property belonging to him in Buchanan and Argyle Streets, Glasgow. The property, which he acquired in 1867, had cost him £29,500, and he had granted a bond over it for £20,000. In 1872 the buildings were entirely destroyed by fire. He recovered, with consent of the bondholder, £11,550 from insurance companies, and gave security to the bondholder that he would rebuild the premises. Plans were prepared for reconstruction of the buildings on a more expensive scale, and contracts were made for the execution of the work at schedule rates, which left it open to the testator to restrict the work to any extent. At the testator's death work to the value of £5987 had been executed and £3987 had been paid, but the buildings were not then habitable. The trustees resolved to complete the work according to the plans, and spent £18,578 in completing them. The total cost of rebuilding was £24,565, involving an expenditure by the testator and his trustees of £13,015, in addition to £11,550 received from insurance. The premises were completed in 1874 and they were valued in 1884 at £51,000.

From the date of the testator's death the trustees carried on his business, and were still carrying it on at the date of this case.

The eldest son, James Arthur, was assumed as a partner as from the testator's death. John, the second son, was assumed in 1884, and Hugh, the third son, in 1891.

The case stated that when Hugh was assumed the three brothers informed the trustees that they wished to hold the business premises in their own names, and that they exercised the option given them by the settlement of having the premises conveyed to them on payment of £8000.

In these circumstances the following question was, inter alia, submitted to the Court:—“(2) Are the second and third parties entitled to demand that the said heritable property be conveyed to them in terms of the fourth purpose of the settlement and first codicil?”

Fraser's Trustees v. Fraser.

Argued for the second and third parties ;—The trustees were bound to carry out the plans for the re-erection of the business premises which had been sanctioned by the testator, and the amount necessary for that purpose was heritable destination.¹ The testator, who had sanctioned the plans, evidently had anticipated and intended that the business premises should be enhanced in value. Further, the sons had not lost their right to exercise their option by the lapse of time. The option must have remained open until the third son was assumed as a partner, and there had been no such delay since that time as to infer a forfeiture of the right.

Argued for the fourth, fifth, and sixth parties ;—The testator had contemplated that when his sons exercised the option the heritable subjects would be of the value of which they were when the settlement was executed. The second and third parties were, therefore, bound to recoup the general estate to the extent to which the business premises had been enhanced in value. Further, the second and third parties had lost their right to exercise their option by delay. It was inequitable that they should be allowed to put off exercising the option till they saw whether the estate was appreciated or depreciated in value.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question is one of some complication. As regards the heritable subjects, which are the business premises, the primary bequest is, "to my children equally, share and share alike in liferent, and to their respective issues in fee"; and the option conferred upon the sons to buy those subjects is ancillary and subordinate to that bequest. But at the same time the option is one which so far is very clearly expressed. The testator wishes the business continued; he directs his trustees to carry on the business; he has already assumed one of his sons, and his contemplation is—I am taking the settlement now as a whole—that two of the others may yet come into the business, and then he wishes that if these sons like they shall take over the business premises. So far all is clear enough, but the matter is complicated by two considerations. In the first place, even if nothing had occurred to the premises by way of fire, the scheme of the settlement, taken in connection with the ages of the young men, is such that it was plain that intervals of time might elapse between the assumption of one son and the assumption of another. Now, taking the question apart from the occurrence of the fire, I am disposed to think that the sound view is that the first son assumed could not by declining to buy exclude the younger son, who might thereafter be assumed, from having the benefit of that option, and the only way of relieving the management of the estate of the difficulty which would arise from the disparity of ages would seem to be that which was adopted by the trustees, because in the conduct of the trust it appears to have been assumed that it was not until matters were matured—not until the trustees had made up their minds which of the sons were to come in—that this option could be effectively exercised. And, accordingly, had there been no fire, I think that one could not say the trustees were wrong in the view which they seem to have acted on—that they must wait until they had exercised their powers of assuming the sons as partners in order to see whether the option might or might not be exercised.

Then the other complication in the case is that after the settlement was executted, and before the testator died, a fire had occurred, and the testator had proceeded to rebuild the premises, and had expended a certain amount of money in that work. At his death, however, the premises were far from being completed, and in the scheme of rebuilding which was adopted a sum of £18,000 was after his death expended by the trustees. No. 150.

Fraser's Trustees v. Fraser.

Now, the suggestion of the trustees is, that while they admit—or, at least, while for the sake of argument they may admit—that there is still an option in the sons, so far as the lapse of time is concerned, they can only exercise their option by paying a greater sum than the testator directed in his will. Now, I think it is impossible at one and the same time to hold that the option is exercisable now by the three sons who have come in, and at the same time that they are to pay more than the amount fixed in the deed. It is quite true that the course of events, to a considerable extent, dislocates the apportionment of this gentleman's goods among his family, and although we might do what was competent to us to redress that, at the same time I find myself unable to hold either that the sons are precluded from exercising the option, or that they are bound to give more for the property than is expressed by the testator in his definition of the option which he confers upon them. And I am reconciled to some extent to that view of the situation by seeing that the testator does not seem to have been diverted from his intention of giving them the option on these terms by the circumstance that the value of the property had considerably altered between the date of his settlement and the date of his death. What I mean is this, that when he said,—“You shall pay £28,000” (for that is the plain English of it) “for a conveyance of those lands,” he was speaking of subjects more valuable than those which he offered at his death by adhering to his will, inasmuch as the premises had been burnt down and only partially rebuilt. But then, in that state of circumstances, I cannot imagine very well how a son could have claimed more than what his father bade his trustees give him, and that was a conveyance to the lands. A further circumstance, as was pointed out to us, had taken place in the diminution of the value owing to the fire, yet these were the terms upon which alone the sons were to be entitled to buy the property. The other case, which is that which has occurred, is that there has been a change of value to the better in the premises, and that is owing to the action of the trustees in spending this money. Can I, who think that the price for the depreciated property would have been £28,000, say that the price for the appreciated property is to be more? Then again, if the trustees treat the question as one of implied intention, I must confess that I think the simple and plain-sailing theory of intention is to hold that the man read over his will before he died, and said,—“I am not going to cut or carve upon this; I may have my own opinion about the value of the property; but say anything you like, I adhere to the £28,000 as the price which my sons shall pay if they want to have the buildings.” In like manner I should suppose it eminently likely that he should be willing that they should have a fairly good bargain if the property should improve in value before the option came to be exercised. But I cannot find material out of his will for constructing a theory that in this state of matters we are to fix another price than that which he has expressed in his will.

But then it was said that the trustees have a claim of recompense for this expenditure of theirs. I suppose the way in which that would work out would be this: “If you say you are entitled to exercise the option to buy, you pay down your £28,000, but we have expended on the property £18,000, and you must make that good to us before we quit hold of the property." But then there is this to be considered. It is not the case that the trustees were holding for behoof of the partners as the ultimate owners of the property. On the contrary, the option might be exercised, or might not be exercised, and in the event of its not being exercised, the refusal to exercise it might—on the hypothesis of the case which I adopt, viz, the legality of the course of the trustees' administration—only be declared twenty years after the buildings were put up. Then we would have to consider whether this rebuilding by the trustees, if within their powers—which for the present I assume—was done for the general behoof of the estate, and in the view possibly that the buildings might belong not to the partners but to the eight children. But there is more than that; even in the event of the option being exercised it is to be observed that the trustees were largely interested for the other beneficiaries in the prosperity of this business; because after Mr Johnston's examination of the effect of the codicil it is quite plain that in any event a part of the profits would belong to the trustees for the purposes of the general settlement, because I think the fair reading of the words in the codicil about purposes "therein provided for" means the general purposes of the estate. Now, that shews that the trustees were interested in this business, not merely for the people who might eventually become partners, but were interested also for the general estate. And the law of recompense cannot apply to a case where a man is interested himself in the property, because it is presumed that the expenditure is made for his own interest primarily, and only incidentally for the interest of others. Accordingly, I think that the plea of recompense cannot be sustained.

My opinion upon the whole is (1) that the option is not excluded by the events which have happened; and (2) that if that be so it is impossible for us to prescribe other conditions than the payment of the £8000 above the bonds.

LORD ADAM.—Two questions are raised. The first question is whether it is too late for the three sons, who are partners, now to exercise the option given to them by the trust-deed to purchase the premises in which the business is carried on at the sum named by the testator. Now, if this option had been exercisable after the succession opened, and there had been unreasonable delay in exercising it, I should have said that there was great force in saying that it was too late now to exercise it, because a party is not entitled, if he has an option to take, to say when he is to exercise it. The subject of the option might increase or diminish in value as time went on, and if it turns out to be valuable, the party to whom the option is given is not entitled to say, "I will take it over"; or, if it turns out the reverse, to say, "I don't desire to take it." But I do not think that that is the case we have got to deal with here, because if my interpretation of the deed is the right one, then it is not too late to exercise the option. The deed says,—“In the event of any of my sons entering into my business and being desirous to hold said heritable subjects in their own name for the purpose of business” they are to have the option of taking them over; then follow provisions, the effect of which is that the sons may not be in a position to join the business except after a lapse of years. They were young when this will by the father was executed; one of them, I think, was assumed into the business as late as 1891, and the option of purchase necessarily remained open to him all that time. If we are to give effect to these words, “if any of my sons shall join the business,” I cannot think it is too late now for the sons who have joined the business to exercise the option given them, because they allowed a couple of years or so to expire after the assumption of the third son before declaring that they would exercise it. People are not so very sure of their rights all at once, and I do not think that the other children are right in saying it is now too late to exercise the option.

No. 150.

Fraser's Trustees v. Fraser.

If, then, there is a right to exercise an option, what is the option they are to exercise? That option is of taking over these premises at a particular sum, viz., £28,000. There is no other option given to them. If that is so, and if the option is still open, I do not see that we have any alternative other than to give effect to it. We are not empowered to say, "Oh, but the value is very much increased." That might have been a reason for saying that the testator did not intend the option to continue all through this long time; but if the option is still exercisable, can you say anything else than that the option given by the deed is to take the premises at the sum named, and no other? Now, if that is so, I think that is all we have to answer upon the subject. It is said that they may take, but take under conditions, the terms and conditions being, as I understand, that they shall pay the value of the meliorations or improvements which are said to have been made by the trustees upon the premises. Now, I do not think myself that this is a case for the application of the doctrine of recompense at all. It is quite true that if a person builds on another man's property and the property is taken from him, he, of course, must be paid for what he has expended on the property. That is the sort of case where the doctrine of recompense comes in. Or if a person, thinking he has a good title to property himself, expends money upon it, it may be that if the true owner claims it he is bound to pay for the improvements made upon it. That is the class of case where the doctrine of recompense applies. But that is not the class of case we have to deal with here. The case we have to deal with here is this: The trustees were in the occupation of these premises; they knew, and were bound to know, that certain persons had a right to purchase them at a certain price; they possessed the property upon these terms all along, and knew exactly what position it was in; and before the time came for the exercise of the option they thought it right to build those premises at a certain expenditure. We must therefore hold that they knew that these sons could at any time come and say, "We require to have those buildings at a certain sum." It was, I presume, with their eyes open that they performed all this work. It may be—I say nothing about it, and it is not even suggested in this case—that the trustees, in the knowledge of these facts, should not have spent so much money in the erection of these buildings. It is not suggested by anyone that they were not right in doing so, and thence arises the difficulty I have. If they chose to expend this money with their eyes open, what right have they to come and say to the sons who have been assumed into the business,—“We know that the deed directs us to convey this property to you, but we shall not do as the testator directs us; we shall not give you this property for the sum of £28,000, because we have made it better”?

I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—When a testator dies leaving his building or undertaking which he has begun unfinished, and his trustees proceed to complete the building according to the testator's scheme, I think that their action should always be regarded with the greatest consideration and indulgence, and especially would that be the case where, in completing the work which the testator has begun, they are carrying out, or taking means to carry out, the scheme of administration prescribed by his settlement. Now, in the present case, the scheme of administration was certainly not one of realisation and division of realised value. On the contrary, we see in the anxious directions contained in this gentleman's will that he contemplated the continuance of this business for the benefit of his family, first through the administration of the trustees, and eventually, but only if his sons desired it, through the introduction into the partnership of certain members of his family. It was impossible that the trustees could carry out the directions given to them to continue to carry on the testator's business if they had allowed the premises to remain unfinished, or had sold them as unfinished buildings to other parties. On these considerations, I have not the smallest doubt that in completing the buildings, and providing for their completion out of the trust moneys, the trustees were strictly fulfilling their trust obligation, and that they had no option or discretion in the matter.

Now, in what they did it is not alleged that they wasted the money in any way, or that they paid more than what was necessary to the proper completion of the testator's design. Having done so, the effect of that was to increase the value of one part of the estate, because a new building is generally more valuable than the old one which it replaced. But that was done, not in virtue of any line of action or idea originating with the trustees themselves, but in fulfilment of the trust which was committed to them. When the time came for the two sons of the testator, to whom a right of entering the business was given, to declare their option and to take over the business premises if they thought proper, I think that in determining the conditions on which they were entitled to take over the premises no claim of recompense arises, and that their right was to receive a conveyance of the heritable subjects on payment of £8000. I read this settlement as prescribing that as the sum to be paid, irrespective of the value of the subjects for the time being, whether depreciated by change of fashion or otherwise or increased in value by improvements. It is quite intelligible that the father of a family should, in order to avoid disputes or ill-feeling, think it proper to name a sum, not as representing the actual value of the subjects, but that sum for which he thinks proper in the exercise of his will to declare that certain of his family shall take over the property. Or, it may be that the sum was fixed after considering the probable ability of the sons to furnish the money with the funds they might have at the time. But whatever the reason may be, I have no doubt that they are entitled to the property on payment of £8000. I agree with your Lordships in considering that the option certainly existed up to the time when the younger of the two next oldest sons was taken into partnership, and that that option has not been lost from the delay of somewhat less than three years which has occurred. I rather think that it was not intended that there should be an indefinite power of purchasing the property at any time during the sons' lives. I think it was to be exercised in connection with the scheme by which the three sons, or one of them, should enter the business. But as this case shews that there is a question between those three sons and the other members of the family as to the terms on which the property was to be taken over, and until that question was settled of course nothing could be done, I cannot say that a delay of about a couple of years is such as to lead to the forfeiture of this valuable right to acquire the heritable property.

Valuation Acts—Remit to obtain further information—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), sec. 9.—Circumstances in which in a valuation appeal the Court, on the motion of the appellant, in terms of the 9th section of the Valuation Act, 1879,† remitted the case to the Valuation Committee to take further evidence, although the appellant had declined to avail himself of an opportunity of leading the evidence when the case was before the Commissioners.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee for the Badenoch district of the county of Inverness, held at Kingussie on 23d September 1893, to dispose of appeals against the valuation of lands and heritages by the County Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1894, Sir John Ramsden, Bart., and Alfred Frederick Style, Esquire, appealed against the Assessor's entry in the Valuation-roll of the shootings of Glenshiere, of which they were respectively proprietor and tenant, at a yearly rent of £920, and they craved that the valuation should be reduced to £236, 10s.

The shootings were originally let to Mr Style in 1889 at a fixed rent of £1000 for five years, but under a back-letter accompanying the lease the tenant was entitled on certain conditions to terminate his tenancy at the end of the first year. In 1891 the tenant exercised this power and entered into a new arrangement with Sir John Ramsden as to the rent to be paid for the shootings, the effect of which was that it was agreed between them that the rent was to be calculated at £1 for every brace of birds shot on the moor during the season, subject to the condition that the ground should be fully shot.

This arrangement was contained in three letters between the parties which were produced by the appellants' agent, Mr Kenneth Macdonald, before the Valuation Committee. Macdonald gave the undernoted evidence‡ before the Committee.

In answer to a question Mr Macdonald said that his evidence was founded solely on communications from the appellants, and that he had

The said Judges . . . may, if they think fit to do so, remit the case to the commissioners or magistrates by whom it was stated, with such instructions as the said Judges may consider necessary for having the case more fully stated.”

‡ Macdonald deponed,—“ He (the Assessor) has entered Glenshiere at the full rent in the lease, a lease under which the parties practically ceased to act three years ago, the rent of the shooting now being really £1 per brace of birds killed. I produce a letter under the hand of Mr Style shewing that the number of grouse killed on Glenshiere this year is 633, being 316½ brace, and I produce a letter from Sir John Ramsden shewing that that statement has been accepted by him. Mr Style has left Glenshiere for the year, and I produce a letter of his stating that there has been a great scarcity of birds (as I know from other sources has been the case all through Badenoch this year) and saying that he would take Glenshiere for another year provided no more birds are shot this year.”

no personal knowledge of the capabilities of the shootings or of the number of birds shot thereon. He stated that prior to the Valuation Court on 13th September, at which he attended, but at which a quorum of the Committee did not attend, the Assessor had informed him that he would not insist on formal evidence of the facts, but would accept his statement made at the bar, and that he had relied on that assurance.

The letter from Sir John Ramsden referred to by Macdonald in his evidence, and purporting to accept Mr Style's statement as to the number of grouse shot during the season, was for some unexplained reason omitted from the print of documents appended to the case, and was not produced at the hearing of the appeal.

The appellants contended that upon the facts deponed to by their agent, supported by the letters produced, the rent for the current year was proved to be £316, 10s., which, after certain admitted deductions had been made, left a balance of £236, 10s. to be entered as the value of the shooting for the year.

The Assessor on the other hand maintained that he was entitled to rely upon the lease in fixing the rent, subject, it might be, to a deduction under the back-letter, but that it was for the appellants to shew what the amount of that deduction, or rather repayment, really was.

The Assessor contended that as the grouse season did not end till 10th December, and no evidence had been adduced to shew that the moor was incapable of affording farther sport till that date, or even to shew the number of birds already killed, or whether the ground had been fully shot during the season preceding the date of the appeal, the Court had no option but to apply the lease, and enter the rent as therein given, under deduction of the usual allowances of wages, lodge, &c.

With reference to Mr Macdonald's statement to the effect that he had gone to the Court relying on a statement by the Assessor that he would not insist on formal evidence of the facts, the chairman put it to Mr Macdonald whether he had any further evidence to adduce, adding that if he had such, but had not the witnesses present, the Court should be adjourned to Inverness to give him an opportunity of bringing forward such evidence. Mr Macdonald replied that he did not propose to adduce further evidence.

The Committee dismissed the appeal on the ground "that there was no evidence to shew what abatement (if any) from the rent falls to be paid to Mr Style under the back-letter from Sir John Ramsden."

The appellants took a case, from which the above facts appeared.

Their counsel moved the Court to remit the case to the Valuation Committee to allow the parties to lead further evidence.

Counsel for the Assessor opposed the motion as incompetent, and relied on Assessor for County of Argyle v. Marquis of Breadalbane, Jan. 30, 1889, 16 R. 793.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am very averse to sending back a case for further proof, especially where the appellant has had an opportunity of leading the proof he proposes before the Valuation Committee, and has declined to do so. But in the present case we might run the risk of not doing justice if we refused to grant the motion made by the appellant. His statement is that he attended the Valuation Committee under the impression that something short of exact legal evidence was required as to the number of grouse shot during the year, and as to the terms of the modification of the original lease. Apparently, however, when the appeal came before the Committee, either the Assessor or the Committee were not satisfied that proof of these facts, falling short of full legal proof, was sufficient, and they held that the statement made by the appellant's agent and the letters produced did not constitute legally sufficient proof. In this view I am inclined to agree, and I think the appellant would have been well advised if he had accepted the offer which the Committee made to him of an adjournment in order that he might lead further proof. In ordinary circumstances I should not be inclined to give the appellant any further indulgence, but the case is a peculiar one, and I think the course which we ought to follow is to remit to the Committee to take further evidence on the points in dispute. Looking to the general complexion of the case, the proof should be short. The facts requiring to be established cannot admit of much doubt. The letters ought all to be available, especially the missing letter from Sir John Ramsden to the tenant of the shootings. From these it can be ascertained what rent was actually paid for the year in question; and it can also be easily ascertained whether any more grouse were shot after the tenant left the shootings for the season. If the letters furnish that information, there need be nothing more than a formal appearance before the Valuation Committee. I therefore propose that we should remit the case for further proof.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. I should be sorry in any way to derogate from the authority of the judgment to which we have been referred. But I do not think that the course we here propose will have that effect. Upon the question of allowing or refusing further proof, every case must rest on its own circumstances, and in each case the course to be followed is a matter upon which the Court must exercise its discretion. I do not therefore think there is any obstacle to our here remitting for further inquiry, if in our view the justice of the case requires it. The fact that the letter of Sir John Ramsden has for some reason not been produced is itself a sufficient reason for some further inquiries, and if there is to be inquiry I think it ought to be extended to all the matters involved, including the original agreement, the number of birds shot, and the rent actually paid and accepted for the year's sporting.

THE COURT remitted the case to the Valuation Committee in terms of the appellants' motion.

Lord Middleton v. Assessor for Ross-shire, March 1, 1882, 10 R. 28, distinguished.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Wellwood.
Ld. Kyllachy.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of Fife on the 8th September 1893, the trustees of the late Eden Colville, Esquire, of Craighflower, appealed against the following entries in the Valuation-roll for the parish of Torryburn:—

Case 154.

No.	Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Inhabitant Occupier not rated (48 Vict. c. 3, secs. 3 and 9).	Annual value of Dwelling-house of Inhabitant Occupier (Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889), or Feudal duty or Ground-Annual of other subjects.	Yearly Rent or Value.
1	Craighflower House, Offices, and Garden.	Trustees of the late Eden Colville, Esq., per Messrs Mackenzie & Black, W.S., Edinburgh.	Fred. Pitman, Esq., W.S., per Mackenzie & Black, W.S., Edinburgh.	Same.	£140
9	Woodlands, Lawn, and Shrubberies.	Do.	Proprietor.	£55

The appellants craved that these valuations should respectively be reduced to £100 and £20.

The mansion-house, offices, garden, lawn, and shrubberies, together with the shootings (which were entered separately at a rent of £20) had been let, for one year, from Whitsunday 1893 to Mr Frederick Pitman, W.S., at a gross rent of £500. The terms of the lease were as follows:—

"1. The lease to be for one year, from Whitsunday 1893.

"2. The rent to be £500 per annum, payable Martinmas and Whitsunday.

"3. The whole wages of gardeners and cost of upkeep of gardens and grounds to be paid by proprietor. The tenant to have whole produce of garden.

"4. The proprietor need not supply a gamekeeper, it being understood that the head gardener continues to act as such, and to supply a man to carry game bags when required.

"5. The proprietor to make cottage in village into a laundry by introduction of water, a mangle, fixed washtubs, &c.

"6. Some furniture to be put into coachman's house.

"7. The furniture in mansion-house to be handed over to tenant, per inventory."

The appellants maintained that the mansion-house, offices, garden, lawn, and shrubberies having been actually let, the rent obtained ought to form the basis of valuation under deduction of the annual cost of the furnishings and services provided by the proprietor. In accordance with this principle they laid before the Commissioners a detailed statement* shewing that the valuation of the house, garden, and grounds, including the shootings, should be £93 only, but they expressed their willingness to consent to the entry for the mansion-house, &c., exclusive of the shootings, being at £100. With reference to this statement of deductions claimed, the appellants explained that only three-fourths of the wages of the eight gardeners, and of the hire (£60 per annum) of the horse for mowing, carting, &c. had been deducted, as the head-gardener acted as estate overseer, and the garden men and the horse were occasionally employed for estate purposes, one-fourth of the cost on wages, &c. being regarded by the appellants as sufficient to cover the services rendered for purely estate work.

No. 152.

Colville's
Trustees v.
Assessor for Fife.

The appellants further, as a consequence of the principle of valuation contended for by them, maintained that the lawn and shrubberies being included in the lease should be entered along with the other subjects let, and that the woodlands which were not let should be separately valued, the value of the latter being placed at £20.

The Assessor explained that he neither admitted nor denied the accuracy of the statement of outlays made on behalf of the appellants; that he had no materials to enable him to form any opinion on the subject; that the appellants admitted that all the eight servants (the head-gardener included), and also the horse, were used for general estate work as well as in the gardens, so that the sum imputed to the latter must be quite arbitrary; without a diary of each man's work it was impossible to say whether the amount allocated to garden work was right or wrong.

It appeared that for more than fifteen years the mansion-house, offices, and garden of Craigflower, while in the personal occupation of the late proprietor, Mr Colville, had been valued at £140, the rate fixed by the Assessor for the year in question.

The Valuation Committee were of opinion "that £140 had not been proved to be an excessive rent for Craigflower house, offices, and garden," and confirmed the valuations as made by the Assessor.

The appellants took a case.

Argued for the appellants;—The Assessor's basis of valuation was erroneous. The lease was the proper basis of valuation. The question was, for what was the rent paid, and how much of it was to be taken as paid for lands and heritages, and how much for conveniences and advantages not heritable.¹ The Assessor was bound to have given effect to the statement of deductions claimed by the appellants, which represented actual payments, with the exception of the deduction claimed in respect of furniture, and the allocation of three-fourths to the garden work, and one-fourth to the estate work.

Argued for the respondent;—The case of Lord Middleton did not apply. In it the Assessor did not dispute the accuracy of the statement of the deductions claimed. The lease here did not determine the rent of the heritable subjects. The appellants' allocation of three-fourths of the outlay as to garden work was purely arbitrary. There was no material for determining to what extent the gardeners' services were given to the let and to the unlet parts of the estate. The subjects were then rightly valued as they had stood for fifteen years.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of opinion that no sufficient grounds have been stated to us for interfering with the decision of the Valuation Committee.

The house, grounds, and shootings of Craigflower were let to Mr Pitman for one year from Whitsunday 1893 at a total rent of £500, and there were certain stipulations in regard to other matters which formed an ingredient in fixing the amount of that rent. One of the conditions was that the whole amount of the wages of the gardeners, and the cost of keeping up the gardens, were to be paid by the proprietor, and that the tenant was to have the whole produce of the gardens. There was a provision that the head-gardener should, when required, act as gamekeeper, and that other services of minor importance were to be provided by the landlord on behalf of the tenant. The tenant was also to have the use of the furniture in the mansion-house.

It is plain, therefore, from the terms of the lease that the cumulo rent of £500 was not paid exclusively for the use of the mansion-house and grounds, but was partly referable to the other valuable considerations which must have been taken into account by the tenant, and therefore when the Assessor proceeded to value the mansion-house, gardens, and shootings, he would have to consider what deductions ought to be made from the sum of £500. No doubt when the lease fixes the yearly rent of the subjects, then that yearly rent is taken as conclusive, but the difficulty in this case is that the lease does not fix the rent of the heritable subjects as distinguished from the other considerations in the lease. Had the mansion-house, gardens, and shootings represented the whole of the subjects upon which the services of the gardeners and other services mentioned in the lease were to be bestowed, I should have been prepared to have accepted, as forming the amount of the deductions, the actual wages paid for the services by the landlord, because the tenant was entitled to the whole benefit of them during the year. In that case the principle of valuation contended for by the appellants would probably have furnished the best test of the real value of the subjects. But the obstacle to the application of that method in this case lies in the admitted fact that the services were required for other parts of the estate as well as for that let to Mr Pitman, and by the fact that we do not know, and have no means in the case of ascertaining, to what extent they were given to the let and to the unlet parts of the estate. It appears that for fifteen years previous to the present valuation during which the mansion-house was not let, it had been entered in the roll at £140. The Valuation Committee have determined that no sufficient reasons were shewn to them for departing from this valuation or for holding that it was excessive. The Committee had no more information than we have to enable them to say how much of the services of the gardeners was to be referred to the subjects let to Mr Pitman and how much to the rest of the estate—but they had the advantage of local knowledge, and I am not surprised that they should have reached the result stated in the case. I propose that we should find that the determination of the Committee is right.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt as to the statutory rule that where a heritable subject is let the rent actually received is to be taken as the value for the purpose of assessment. That rule applies absolutely where a heritable subject is separately let, or is let at a separate rent, and it may often be capable of application even to furnished houses, and to other heritable subjects which are let at a cumulo rent along with subjects which are not heritable. We have an instance of that in the case of Middleton, 10 R. 28, where it appeared that the assessor and the owner had adjusted an admission of the annual value of the furnishings and services of which the tenant had the benefit in consideration of his rent. The question is whether we can apply the same rule in this case, or rather whether this is a case in which the Valuation Committee were bound to apply it. Now, I confess I think it was quite open to the Committee to hold that the best way in the circumstances of this case, of reaching the proportion of cumulo rent belonging to the heritable subjects, was to take the valuation as it stood for the fifteen years prior to 1893. I do not say that it might not have been ascertained by the method for which the appellants contend. But in their judgment that method was unsatisfactory, and I am not prepared to say that they were wrong. The lease itself did not fix the rent of the heritable subject or furnish materials for fixing it. It would therefore have been necessary to ascertain from outside the lease what was the proportion of cumulo rent applicable to the heritable subjects. Now, it seems to me that the outside materials before the Valuation Committee were not here such as to make it incumbent on the Committee to enter upon the calculation proposed by the appellants. On these grounds I agree with your Lordship.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Case 157.

(VIDE Harvie v. Assessor for Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, March 18, 1893, 20 R. 630.)

At a meeting of the County Valuation Committee for the Upper Ward of the county of Lanark, held on 11th September 1893, William Harvie, Esquire, of Brownlee, and Wilsons & Clyde Coal Company, Limited, appealed against being entered upon the Valuation-roll as proprietor and tenant respectively of a subject described as the "Colliery Shawfield," at a yearly rent of £6920, 8s., and they craved that the valuation should be reduced to £6406, 13s. 6d.

It had been decided in an appeal by these appellants (Harvie v. Assessor for Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, March 18, 1893, 20 R. 630) that Harvie, who was the proprietor of the minerals in the lands of Taponhill, forming part of the colliery in question, was not entitled, in the entry of the colliery in the Valuation-roll, to have deducted from the royalty received by him from his tenants, the other appellants, an annual payment which he had by an agreement in 1891 undertaken to make to Mr Ramsay, the proprietor of the surface, for liberty to bring down the surface, and the benefit of which agreement he had, by subsidiary agreement, communicated to his tenants, on their contributing one-half of the payment.

In the present case it appeared that in September 1893 a new lease of the coalfield had been entered into between Harvie and his tenants to take effect from Martinmas 1892. In this lease the lordships were fixed at 11d. per ton for great coal, 1d. per ton for dross, &c. The lease also provided in effect that Wilsons & Clyde Company (who, as stated, formerly were bound to make one-half of the payment to the surface-owner for liberty to bring down the surface) should in future undertake to pay the whole of it.

The Assessor arrived at his valuation by adding to the sum returned by the appellants as the rent the amounts paid by the mineral tenants to the surface-owner, being for the half year ending Martinmas 1892, at 1d. per ton, £171, 10s., and for the half year ending Whitsunday 1893, at 2d. per ton, £342, 4s. 6d.

The Valuation Committee sustained the Assessor's valuation, and at the request of the appellants stated a case, from which the above facts appeared, and in which it was further stated,—“The appellants contended, as regards the addition of £171, 10s. made by the Assessor for the half year ending Martinmas 1892, that he had, while there was no change of circumstances, departed from the principle of assessment adopted by himself last year and judicially confirmed (20 R. 630), and in terms of which the appellants' present return had been made, and that this sum being over and above the lordships in the lease, and being payable by the tenants in respect of surface damage and freedom from restoration, is not assessable.

“The appellants contended as regards the addition of £342, 4s. 6d. made by the Assessor for the half year ending Whitsunday 1893, that the sum payable by the tenants to Mr Hamilton Ramsay under the new lease likewise not being return received or receivable by the owner of the minerals from the subjects let is not rent or annual value, and is not assessable.

“The appellants further contended that the payments to the surface proprietor being not for rent but for surface damage and restoration, and for the right to withdraw support from the surface, were not assessable, a landowner's right to keep his land uninjured not being a separate land and heritage in the sense of the Valuation Acts, and they founded upon the appeals of Assessor for Fifeshire v. Curror, March 16, 1888, 15 R. 632, and of the present appellants (20 R. 630).

"The Assessor contended that the appellants' lease had been altered since the previous year and that the payments to the surface proprietor now falling to be made by the tenants under the new lease were part of the consideration for it, and as such were of the nature of rent and were assessable."

The arguments appear in the opinion of Lord Kyllachy.

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case we decided last year that where the proprietor of a coalfield, who is not proprietor of the surface,—and is consequently disabled from working his coal so as to bring down the surface,—has purchased from the surface-owner for an annual payment the right to bring down the surface, he cannot claim to have that annual payment deducted from his valuation, as being a payment which truly diminishes the rent of the coalfield. We considered that such a transaction simply enhanced the annual value of the coalfield, making it possible to work it to a greater extent and to greater advantage; and we thought it immaterial that in the case before us the payment was an annual payment, instead of, as it might have been, a capital sum down. We also considered that it was not possible to represent the payment in question as simply a commutation of surface damages—that is to say, of such surface damages as are usually paid by a mineral tenant. Such surface damages, if paid by a landlord out of his rent, instead of being paid in the usual course by the tenant, in addition to his rent, might, we thought, fall to be dealt with in the same manner as, for example, tenant's taxes similarly paid; but in our view, the transaction in question was a great deal more than the mere commutation of surface damages, and accordingly, last year we dismissed the appellants' appeal.

We have now in the present appeal to decide whether it makes any difference that during the last year (viz., in September 1893) a new lease of the appellant's coalfield, dating from Martinmas 1892, has been entered into; and that thereby the mineral tenant, who formerly undertook one-half of the payment to the surface-owner now undertakes the whole of it, and so relieves the appellant of his whole obligations under the agreement with the surface-owner. The Assessor contends, and the Valuation Committee have upheld his contention, that such a payment made by the tenant is simply an addition to his rent, and that it makes no difference in principle whether, as last year, the landlord pays directly what is due by him, or, as this year, gets his tenant to make the payment as part of the consideration for the tenancy. That is the Assessor's contention. The appellants, on the other hand, contend that the payment in question is truly a payment for surface damages, and further that, in any event, there should be no addition to the valuation in respect of the half year's payment made by the tenant under the old lease, which, as I have said, expired in the middle of the year of computation, viz., Martinmas 1892. They say that, by our last year's judgment, we in effect decided that the rent actually paid under the old lease should, while the lease lasted, be taken as the total rent received by the landlord.

I am of opinion that the appellants have failed to make out either of these contentions. It may be that to some partial extent (which we have no means of estimating) the payment referred to does not represent what would in any case have been paid by the mineral tenant as surface damages, but, as I have already pointed out, the right which the agreement conferred is a right going far beyond the mere immunity from surface damages. It is a right to bring down the surface—a right which, even on payment of surface damages, the mineral owner did not previously possess. Whatever allowance therefore may be claimable in future years, in respect that the payment in question includes surface damages, which the tenant would in ordinary course, and apart from stipulation, have had to pay, we cannot under this appeal make such an allowance. Neither we nor the Court below have had materials for making an estimate of this kind.

As to the other point, all that need be said is, that we were not asked last year to deal with any question as to this tenant's contribution towards the annual payment. The Assessor took the rent or lordship actually paid as the basis of his valuation, and there was no appeal raising the question whether the tenant's contribution was to any extent truly an addition to the rent.

On the whole therefore I propose that we should decide that the Valuation Committee was right.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree with Lord Kyllachy. Taking this as an A B case, A, the mineral-owner, lets coal underlying lands of which B is the surface-owner, to C, the mineral tenant.

Although all the coal is let, it cannot all be worked out without B's permission, which must be purchased. But if B's permission is obtained, A's returns are increased by the amount of the royalties paid on the coal which was required for the support of the surface being worked out.

If A before letting settles with B, he will when he lets the minerals stipulate for and receive a larger return than if he were to let the coal without power to bring down the surface.

If, again, A lets the coal subject to the restriction, leaving C to settle with B, C will naturally pay A a smaller rent or royalty than if he had received the subject unrestricted; and as A will in that case receive the benefit of C's payment to B, that payment may at least to some extent be said to represent a consideration other than rent.

In the present case, when he let the coal to C, A was already under agreement with B, inter alia, to pay for bringing down the surface. Instead of stipulating for a return which would cover payment to B for bringing down the surface, A took his mineral tenant bound to relieve him of that, amongst other obligations, to B. Consequently he demanded and received from C a smaller return than he would otherwise have done, and therefore C's adoption of the agreement was a consideration other than rent.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

 Ayr Harbour
 Trustees v.
 Assessor for
 Ayr.

Valuation Acts—Valuation—Deductions—Harbour—Tenants' profits.—The trustees of Ayr Harbour were by statute empowered to administer the harbour, and to levy rates upon vessels and cargoes using the harbour, and were bound to apply the revenue derived from the rates, 1st, in payment of costs of management and maintenance, 2d, in payment of interest on borrowed money, 3d, in prescribed payments to a sinking fund, 4th, the surplus, if any, in paying off borrowed money, or in improving or otherwise for the benefit of the undertaking.

The Assessor, in estimating the annual value of the harbour for the Valuation-roll, deducted from the gross revenue derived from the harbour-rates the charges and expenses necessary to earn that revenue, including interest on moveable plant and floating capital, together with the expenses of collection and management.

The trustees maintained that they were entitled to a further deduction in name of tenants' profits.

Held that as the whole surplus revenue was devoted by statute to other purposes, there could be no tenants' profits.

Valuation Acts—Harbour—Apportionment of value between two parishes—Quayage.—In apportioning the cumulo valuation of a harbour between two parishes within which it was situated, the Assessor did so according to the lengths of quayage in the two parishes respectively. One of the parishes maintained that it should be first credited with revenue derived from certain fixed machinery locally situated within its bounds, and that only the remaining revenue should be apportioned according to quayage.

Held that the harbour fell to be regarded as a unum quid, and that the allocation by quayage was right.

By the Ayr Harbour Acts, 1855 and 1893 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. cxix. and 56 Vict. cap. li.), the Ayr Harbour Trustees were empowered to administer and manage the Ayr Harbour, and to levy rates upon vessels and cargoes entering the harbour.

By section 7 of the later Act it was enacted,—“All moneys coming to the trustees by way of revenue shall, after the passing of this Act, be applied in the manner and order following, and not otherwise:—

“1. In payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the management and maintenance of the undertaking.”

2, 3, and 4. In payment of interest to holders of A, B, and C debenture stock.

“5. In payment to the sinking fund as hereinafter provided.

“6. The surplus (if any) shall be expended as the trustees think fit in paying off principal moneys due by the trustees, or in improving, or otherwise for the benefit of the undertaking.”

The trustees had also power to let the rates to a lessee, subject to the restrictions imposed by the Acts.

The Assessor for the burgh of Ayr fixed the valuation of the harbour for the year 1893-94 at £14,400, which he thus distributed:—

For the parish of Ayr, . . .	£4,790	0	0
For the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, . . .	9,580	0	0
For the parish of St Quivox, . . .	30	0	0

rived from the harbour proper, and from this he deducted the charges and expenses necessary to earn that revenue, including interest on moveable plant and floating capital, together with the expenses of collection and management. The amount thus brought out he assumed to be the rent which the harbour would fetch if let as a heritable subject.

I. At a meeting of the Magistrates and Town-council, sitting as the Valuation Appeal Court for the burgh of Ayr, held in September 1893, the Harbour Trustees appealed against the Assessor's valuation, and maintained that it ought to be reduced to £11,520. They claimed that 20 per cent on the sum of £14,400 should be deducted as representing tenants' profits, and they based their claim on the ground that they were empowered under sections 56, 57, and 58 of the Ayr Harbour Act, 1855, to lease the rates, and that they were not therefore precluded from making profit.

The Magistrates dismissed the appeal, and the appellants obtained a case, in which the above facts were stated.

Argued for the appellants;—The statutes contemplated the letting of the undertaking to a tenant, and consequently that tenant's profits should be earned. Under the 1855 Act the trustees had power to lease the rates, and under the Ayr Harbour Amendment Act of 1879* they were empowered not only to lease the slip-dock constructed under the authority of that Act and the rates levied therefrom, but also "the whole other works and conveniences at the harbour." That clearly referred to the whole harbour works, and not merely the slip-dock. *The Mersey Docks*¹ case did not apply, because in it the trustees could not let either the rates or the undertaking, and under the statutes which created the trust no profit could be earned by the trustees themselves. In the Dundee Gas Company case² also there was no statutory power to lease. It might be that any profits earned by the trustees themselves would under section 7 of the 1893 Act have to be expended in clearing off debt and improving the harbour, but that did not amount to a prohibition against a tenant of either the rates or the harbour-earning profits. In the recent case of the *Irvine Harbour*³ tenants' profits had been allowed.

Argued for the Assessor;—The trustees had no power under the statutes to lease that with which alone the Assessor was concerned, viz., the heritable subject. Their power was limited to the letting of the rates. The Act of 1879 dealt only with the slip-dock and the works connected with it. There was no reference to tenants' profits in the judgment in the Irvine Harbour case. The question was settled by authority.⁴

II. There was also lodged before the Magistrates a complaint at the instance of the Parochial Board of the parish of Newton-on-Ayr. These complainers complained, inter alia, of the Assessor's valuation, maintaining that he had erroneously allocated the cumulo valuation

Trustees v.
Assessor for
Ayr.

They maintained that "the Assessor ought to have included in 'the valuation of Newton parish exclusively (without sharing with Ayr parish) the whole amount of his valuation in respect of revenue from the entire dock and its appurtenances, and from all fixed machinery, cranes, hydraulic hoists and lifts thereof, locally situated in Newton parish,' and that Ayr parish was not entitled to any share of such valuation."

The Committee dismissed the complaint, and upon the request of the complainers they also stated a case for them, in which the following facts were held to be proved:—"(1) That on the south or Ayr side of the harbour the fixed machinery, plant, or equipment consists of two wooden sheds and two hand-cranes; (2) that all the rest of the fixed cranes, machinery, quay equipment, and hydraulics, &c., of the harbour and dock are on the north or Newton side of the river, but a considerable portion of them can be moved without injury to the south side of it when necessary." (9) That the apportionment of the cumulo annual value of the harbour, dock, &c., by quayage had been arrived at with the consent of the Parochial Boards of the parishes of Ayr and Newton after conference with the Assessor, and that the arrangement had been acquiesced in and acted upon unchallenged till after the Assessor had completed his roll.

Argued for the Parish of Ayr, who appeared as parties in the case upon a point not now reported;—The appeal at the instance of the complainers was incompetent. The question was one for the Court of Session, where the parties would be properly called, and where the question of boundaries, &c., would be inquired into if necessary. The appeal would, if successful, involve a corresponding reduction in the amount allocated to Ayr. It was a mere accident that Ayr parish was here as a contradictor. The method of apportionment proposed was erroneous. The harbour fell to be regarded as a unum quid, and the method of allocation by quayage was the only practicable one, and had been acted upon for thirteen years.

Argued for Newton-on-Ayr Parish;—The complaint was competent under section 13 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854. The whole revenue of the harbour, with the exception of that earned by two hand-cranes, was earned by Newton parish, which had no concern with the effect which the appeal if successful would have upon other parishes.

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—We have here to dispose of various appeals against the valuation of the Ayr Harbour, and the first appeal is that of the Ayr Harbour Trustees, which is confined to the question of tenants' profits. The Assessor has valued the harbour (which I need hardly explain is in the trustees' own hands, and is managed by their officials) in the usual way. He takes the gross revenue of the year so far as drawn from the harbour proper. He then deducts the charges and expenses necessary to earn that revenue, including interest on moveable plant and floating capital, together with the expenses of collection and management; and the amount thus brought out he assumes to be the rent which the harbour would fetch if let as a heritable subject to a hypothetical tenant. This valuation has been upheld by the magistrates, but the Harbour Trustees challenge it in respect that the Assessor ought, as they say, to have deducted from the net revenue 20 per cent in name of tenants' profits.

I am of opinion that in this matter the Assessor is right. I do not think the question turns on the possibility under the Harbour Acts of letting the harbour. There is, it appears, an express power to let the rates, but it is disputed whether the trustees have power to let the undertaking. I do not think it is material whether they have that power or not. For the purposes of the Valuation Acts the letting of the harbour must, I think, be assumed, whether—under the Harbour Acts—it would or would not be a lawful transaction.

Neither do I think that the question is solved by the circumstance that the Ayr Harbour is a public as opposed to a private undertaking. There may conceivably be harbours privately owned, the conditions applying to which are such that no allowance for tenants' profits could be permitted. There may, for example, be harbours free from all statutory restrictions, where nevertheless, by the owners' choice, the rates are fixed not on commercial principles, but so as merely to meet the interest on outlay and expenses of upkeep. In such cases, if the harbour were let, the tenants' profits requiring to be provided could of course only be so by increasing the rates, and so augmenting the revenue. On the other hand, there may conceivably be public harbours where the existing rates leave a margin beyond the prescribed expenditure; and in such cases, if there be any, I am not prepared to say that it may not be possible to have an allowance greater or less for tenants' profits. Each case which presents itself must, I apprehend, be considered on its own merits,—the special principle as regards statutory undertakings being, I think, only this—that the undertaking must be valued with regard to the whole statutory conditions affecting the revenue of the undertaking, or affecting the application of that revenue.

Now this being so, what are the facts with respect to this statutory undertaking of the Ayr Harbour? The main points to be noted are, I think, these—

1. The valuation in controversy is, it will be observed, made as usual on the basis of the existing revenue—that is to say, the Assessor takes the existing rates as the basis on which he calculates his assumed rental. Any increase, therefore, of the rates would as a matter of course increase the valuation.

2. The existing rates are, as appears from the accounts, no more than sufficient to meet the prescribed annual expenditure. That is to say, they are more than exhausted by charges prescribed by the Harbour Statutes, viz., expenses of management, interest on debt, and prescribed contribution to sinking fund. It may be (I do not enter upon that at present) that the statutes make an exhaustive application of the whole rates which may be levied whatever their amount, but there is at least no doubt that they make what is de facto an exhaustive application of the existing rates.

3. Amongst the charges which thus exhaust the existing rates, there is no provision for tenants' profits. There is a charge, amounting to about £800 a-year, for expenses of collection, but nothing more. If, therefore, the harbour were let, and the tenant, in fixing the rent, claimed and got an allowance for tenants' profits, the result must be either (1) that the existing rates must be raised; or (2) that there must be a shortcoming in the prescribed expenditure—that is to say, a non-compliance with the Harbour Statutes.

4. In this particular case there does not appear to be any statutory obstacle to the raising of the rates, if such rise is required for the purposes of the harbour. Accordingly, the result of making the supposed allowance for tenants' profits would, I take it, simply be this, that the Assessor in making the allowance would at the same time require to assume a corresponding addition to the existing rates. He would be entitled and indeed bound to do so, and the result would of course be that his valuation, or assumed rent, would remain just as before. No. 154.

5. Supposing, however, that the rates could not be raised, or could not be raised for such a purpose, the ultimate result would be still the same. The Assessor would in that case have to deal with a subject where, on the one hand, the revenue was statutorily restricted, and where, on the other hand, it was statutorily protected from any charge in respect of tenants' profits. Now, how is the Assessor to deal with such a subject? He must, as I have said, assume a tenancy, but in making up his assumed rent he must, I apprehend, take the statutory conditions affecting the subject as a whole. That is to say, he may be bound to accept as his basis the statutorily restricted revenue, but, on the other hand he cannot be at the same time required to submit to a charge on that revenue which is inconsistent with the statute. Per contra the appellants cannot, in disregard of the statutes, claim an allowance for tenants' profits, and at the same time, in virtue of the statutes, claim the benefit of the statutorily restricted revenue. If they appeal to the statutes they must appeal to them as a whole. Apart from the statutes their position (I mean as regards the valuation of their undertaking as a heritable subject) would probably be not better, but worse.

On the whole, therefore, it is, I think, sufficiently manifest that in this matter the Assessor is right, and that the present case cannot really be distinguished from the Mersey Docks case (L. R., 9 Q. B. 84), Dundee Gas Company case (9 R. 1240), and Kirkwall Harbour case (9 R. 1243), all of which cases were referred to at the discussion. It is said that a different decision was pronounced by us last year in the case of the Irvine Harbour, and it certainly appears that in that case there had been an allowance for tenants' profits made in the Court below, and that on appeal the valuation was not disturbed. The matter of tenants' profits is not, however, referred to in our judgment, and we have no note of any argument on the subject. If, therefore, the position of Irvine harbour is similar to that of the harbour of Ayr, the question of tenants' profits must not have been pressed in argument, or must in some way have been overlooked.—(His Lordship here referred to an appeal by the Parochial Board of Ayr upon a minor point not reported.)

The other appeals are by the Parochial Board of Newton-on-Ayr, and are three in number.—(His Lordship here referred to the first and second appeals not reported.)

The third appeal, by the Parochial Board of Newton-on-Ayr, relates to the appointment of the cumulo valuation between the parishes of Ayr and Newton-on-Ayr. The Assessor, following a practice which has been in force without objection for thirteen years, has apportioned the cumulo valuation according to the lengths of quayage in the two parishes respectively. The parish of Newton-on-Ayr now contends that it should, in the first instance, be credited with the revenue derived from hydraulic hoists, cranes, and other fixed machinery locally situated within its bounds, and that only the remaining revenue should be apportioned according to quayage. The reply is that the harbour is a unum quid:—that the proposed method of valuation is impracticable, and that the apportionment by quayage, although rough, is on the whole fair, and has been shewn to be so by the acquiescence of all parties up to the present time.

I have considered the argument addressed to us on this subject, and I have come to the conclusion that there is no call to disturb the existing practice or to alter the decision of the Magistrates.

On the whole, therefore, I propose that we should find that the sum of £100 falls to be added to the valuation of the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, in respect of the rental of railways leased to the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and that for the rest the decisions of the Magistrates are throughout right.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree generally in Lord Kyllachy's opinion. The principle question, viz. that of tenants' profits, is one of great difficulty. The circumstance that an undertaking is carried on for the public benefit and not for private gain certainly affords no reason for valuing and taxing it more heavily than a private concern. Again, even if letting of such an undertaking is prohibited by its constitution, that of itself is not, in my opinion, an obstacle to valuing it on the assumption that it can be let.

But then such undertakings are invariably fenced with restrictions as to the power of levying rates and the application of revenue; and these restrictions must be taken into account in valuing the subjects, just as the existence of a servitude affects the valuation of a farm. It will accordingly be found in cases such as the present that if the restrictions are considered and given effect to there is practically no room for an allowance for tenants' profits. As Lord Kyllachy has pointed out, the revenue derived from rates (and consequently the valuation of the subjects) is lower than it might have been if the undertaking had been in the hands of a private trader, just because the purposes to which the revenue must be applied are restricted and higher rates are not required, and of this the trustees get the benefit. In short, it is difficult to argue from the one kind of undertaking to the other; and although there may be some features in this case which are not to be found in the cases to which we were referred, I think the safer course is to follow the principle on which the Mersey Docks case, the Dundee Gas Company case, and the Kirkwall Harbour case (which is scarcely distinguishable) were decided.

My recollection as to our decision in the case of Irvine Harbour, decided last year, coincides with that of Lord Kyllachy. Although I find nothing on my papers to shew that the point was given up, I find no note of an argument; and although the question may have been noticed in opening by the appellants' counsel, I fancy that it must have been lost sight of owing to the prominence given to the question of water-way, which bulked largely in the discussion, and to which our opinion was confined.

On the other point in the present case I agree with Lord Kyllachy, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT were of opinion that £100 fell to be added to the valuation of the harbour and to be apportioned to the part of the valuation pertaining to the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, and that quoad ultra the determination of the Magistrates was right.

ASSESSOR FOR MIDLOTHIAN, Respondent.—Dickson—Cullen.

Valuation Acts—Subjects of valuation—Paper mill—Steam-engines—Fictures—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), sec. 42.—Section 42 of the Valuation of Lands Act, 1854, provides that all machinery fixed or attached to any lands or heritages shall be considered as lands and heritages and be valued accordingly.

The steam-power of a paper mill in the hands of the proprietor was supplied by a number of engines of different sizes, which were fixed by bolts and nuts to solid foundations of masonry, specially designed for their reception. Although they could be removed without injury to themselves or to the buildings, the foundations would have required alteration to adapt them to engines of any other shape or size.

Held that the engines were heritable fixtures in the sense of the Act of 1854, and fell to be valued as part of the lands and heritages.

Observed that the rules which regulate the rights of landlord and tenant in regard to machinery erected by the tenant during the currency of his lease had no application; and that the principles to be applied were practically those which regulate the rights of heir and executor.

Valuation Acts—Principle of valuation—Paper mill—Valuation by floor area.—An assessor valued the buildings of a paper mill at a uniform rate per square yard of floor space.

Held in an appeal by the proprietor, that, as he did not propose to give information as to the profits of his business, but merely stated the alternative of valuation by cost of construction, the Assessor's valuation was right.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the Midlothian County Council at Edinburgh on 13th and 19th September 1893, Messrs Alexander Cowan & Sons, Limited, papermakers, Penicuik, appealed against an entry of them as proprietors and occupiers of the Valleyfield Paper Mill (including the Valleyfield Mill and the Low Mill) at a yearly rent of £3212.

The appellants sought to have the valuation reduced to £641, 10s., appealing against the proposed assessment under these heads—(1) assessment for steam-power; (2) assessment for water-power in so far as exceeding £3 per horse-power; (3) assessment of the buildings at a rate per yard of floor space; and (4) the assessment generally as being greatly in excess of the rent for which the subjects could be let.

I. The Assessor had entered the steam-engines used in the mill under the head of "steam-power," including driving-gear, engine-houses, boilers, boiler-houses, and chimney, at £569 for Valleyfield Mill, and £92 for Low Mill, making in all £661. The appellants maintained that only one compound condensing steam-engine (No. 3) fell within the description of "machinery fixed or attached" to the heritage in the sense of section 42 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, and that all other engines were not assessable. They admitted that engine No. 3 was assessable at £30.

From a list appended to the case it appeared that the steam-power of the mill was supplied by eighteen engines for Valleyfield Mill and six engines for Low Mill. Nos. 1 and 2 were of 65 and 56 horse-power respectively, No. 3 of 20 horse-power, and the horse-power of the remainder was from 17 to 2. With the exception of No. 3, which was built into the heritable structure, the engines, as appeared from the evidence of Mr Reid, Mr Belfrage, and Mr Ormiston, quoted infra by Lord Wellwood in his opinion, were fixed by nuts and bolts, in some cases of 10 or 11 feet long, into solid structures of great depth made specially for their reception. They could be removed without injury to themselves or to the foundation structures, but the latter would require alteration to adapt them to engines of any other size or shape.

The appellants contended that on the evidence it was clear that the engines (with the exception of No. 3) were moveable, and therefore not assessable, and they relied on North British Railway Company v. Assessor of Railways, &c., decided by Lord Fraser, Sept. 26, 1887, 25 S. L. R. 4.

The Assessor maintained that the same principle of valuation had been adopted in Midlothian for the last thirty-seven years, and that all the engines were fixed or attached to the building.

II. As to the assessment of water-power, the evidence shewed that the Assessor had not valued the water-power proper above £3 per horsepower.

III. The Assessor's entry for the buildings and land was for Valleyfield £1659, and for Low Mill £590. He had fixed the value of the buildings according to floor space at Valleyfield at 1s. 8d. per yard, and at Low Mill at 1s. 6½d. per yard.

The appellants maintained that in assessing at a uniform rate per yard of the space he had adopted an improper method of valuation. The buildings were of a widely different value; some had been erected recently in a substantial manner, while others were of wood, erected early in the century, of very small value, and intended for purposes entirely different from that for which they were now used. They contended that a more correct method was to take the value of the buildings as they now stood, and to take a percentage upon such value, and if this method were adopted, and a certain amount allowed for depreciation year by year, they believed a much lower value would be brought out. Upon this basis their valuation for the two mills, including buildings, land, and assessable steam-engine, amounted to £2001.

IV. The appellants contended that the valuation was excessive, as the works could only be carried on subject to the conditions of an agreement with the Duke of Buccleuch and other riparian proprietors on the North Esk, to prevent pollution. As the Court held that there was no evidence to enable them to decide whether the agreement was prejudicial to the appellants, this objection need not be further referred to.

The Valuation Committee having sustained the Assessor's valuation, the appellants asked for and obtained a case for appeal to the Lands Valuation Appeal Court, from which the above facts appeared.

Argued for the appellants;—The question whether these engines were to be valued for the purposes of assessment as being “fixed and attached” to the heritage, in the sense of section 42 of the Act of 1854, must be decided not as if the question arose as between heir and executor, as in such cases as *Fisher v. Dixon*¹ and *Brand's Trustees*² but as if it arose as between landlord and tenant. The practical rule in the latter case was that articles were not to be regarded as heritable which, although fixed, could be removed without injury to the building or to the article itself.³ The only alternative would be to hold that all tools of trade in a workshop or manufactory which were fixed merely to secure stability were liable to assessment.

Argued for the Assessor;—The sole test under the 42d section of the Act was whether the machinery was “fixed and attached.” These engines were so fixed and attached as to be partes soli.⁴ The cases between landlord and tenant had no application. A tenant was permitted to remove fixtures not because they were not physically fixed or attached, but from favour of trade. In any question as to what was fixed or attached to the heritage, and so partes soli, not arising between landlord and tenant, it was immaterial that the things fixed could be removed without injury to themselves or the building, or that the object of the annexation

The arguments on the third ground of appeal appear from the opinion of Lord Wellwood.

Cowan & Sons,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Midlothian.

LORD WELLWOOD.—The principal question raised in this appeal is whether the steam-engines—a list of which is given on pages 6 to 18 of the case—are to be valued for purposes of assessment as part of the lands and heritages belonging to the appellants, Messrs Alexander Cowan & Sons, Limited, at their paper mills at Valleyfield. The question depends upon whether they are heritable fixtures in the sense of the Lands Valuation Act of 1854. That Act contains the following express provisions in regard to the valuation of machinery (section 42):—"The following words and expressions when used in this Act shall in the construction thereof be interpreted as follows, except when the nature of the provision or the context of the Act shall exclude or be repugnant to such construction, (that is to say), the expression 'lands and heritages' shall extend to and include all lands, houses, shootings, and deer forests, . . . fishings, woods, copse, and underwood, from which revenue is actually derived, ferries, piers, harbours, quays, wharfs, docks, canals, railways, mines, minerals, quarries, coalworks, waterworks, limeworks, brickworks, ironworks, gasworks, factories, and all buildings and pertinents thereof, and all machinery fixed or attached to any lands or heritages." I shall afterwards advert to the mode in which these steam-engines are fixed to the buildings, but in the first place I shall consider the principles upon which machinery should be dealt with in the valuation of lands and heritages.

The appellants maintain that the question whether this machinery is to be dealt with as heritable for the purposes of valuation must be considered as if a question had arisen between landlord and tenant as to the property of the machinery. I have no hesitation in rejecting this contention. A tenant's right to remove machinery which, for the purposes of his trade, he has himself fixed or attached to the heritable subject leased, is an exception introduced from favour to trade; and it proceeds on the assumption that otherwise such machinery would be treated as heritable fixtures. Indeed, strictly speaking, the machinery, if sufficiently fixed or attached, is the property of the landlord; but the tenant has right to make it his own by removing it, a right which can be transferred or renounced by assignment—Miller v. Muirhead, March 10, 1894, 21 R. 658.

The Valuation Act, section 42, provides, without qualification, that all machinery fixed or attached to any lands or heritages shall be considered as lands and heritages, and valued accordingly. If the appellants' contention were well founded this provision would be practically inoperative; but I think that a little consideration shews that the rules which regulate the rights of landlord and tenant in regard to machinery erected by the tenant during the currency of his lease have no application in the question of valuation for rating purposes. If, in a lease of ordinary duration, the tenant hires fixed machinery from the landlord, as well as the buildings, the rent paid to the landlord for the whole concern will, under section 6 of the Act of 1854, be taken as the yearly value of the subjects, as regards both the proprietor and the occupant. But if he hires the buildings alone, and uses his own machinery, which he erects and fixes in order to be used, the value of the machinery thus erected and fixed will not enter the valuation, because the tenant will be entitled to remove it at the expiry of his lease (provided always that this can be done without serious injury to the fabric of the building), and the landlord derives no benefit or return from it.

We are familiar in this Court with analogous cases where, under his lease, a tenant is empowered to erect temporary buildings, which he is entitled or bound to remove at the end of the lease. Such buildings are fixed or attached to the heritage; but it has been repeatedly decided that, for the reasons stated, they must not be valued. Thus in a question of valuation, the tenant's interests, as distinguished from the landlord's, are not affected; their interests are identical. The question must, therefore, be considered as if the subjects to be valued were in the occupation of the proprietor, as indeed is here the case, and the principles to be applied are practically those which regulate questions between executor and heir.

In the case of the North British Railway Company v. Assessor of Railways, &c., Sept. 26, 1887, 25 S. L. R. 4, cited at the discussion, Lord Fraser (Lord Ordinary on the Bills) said:—"The reason for this special enactment as regards machinery is not far to seek. According to the Scottish mode of assessment for public burdens the landlord pays a certain proportion, and the tenant pays the rest. The assessments are laid on according to the annual value as contained in the Valuation-roll. The 6th section of the Valuation Act enacts that where heritages are bona fide let under a lease of twenty-one years or less the rent shall be taken as the annual value; but if the lease shall be more than twenty-one years, then the rent shall not necessarily be assessed as the yearly value, but such value shall be ascertained irrespective of the rent. Now, suppose the shipbuilding yard or joiners' premises, or any other premises wherein engineering works are carried on under a lease for more than twenty-one years, and the tenant brings all the plant (the rent received by the landlord being payable merely for the shell of the building), it would be a very hard case in such circumstances to enter in the Valuation-roll not merely the annual value of the building but also the value of the tenant's plant, and upon such value to lay an assessment upon the landlord, who derives no sort of return from the plant, which is not his. It would be different if the machinery which is valued were fixed and annexed to the realty, because such machinery becomes a part of the realty, and will go to the landlord at the termination of the lease. It must have been upon some such ground that the special enactment in reference to machinery was made by the Valuation Act." It will be time to consider this question when it arises; but as Lord Fraser's observations have a bearing on the question before us, I feel bound to make the following observations,—First, The statute provides that in the case of such leases the tenant shall be taken to be the proprietor of the lands and heritages; and it may therefore be maintained that machinery should in such a case be valued on precisely the same footing as here; secondly, the true proprietor of the land is only bound to relieve the tenant of such proportion of the assessments laid upon the valuation as shall "correspond to the rent payable by such lessee to such actual proprietor as compared with the amount of such valuation"; and thirdly, the special mention in the statute of machinery fixed or attached seems to me to tell against rather than for exemption from valuation of machinery which would be held to be "tenant's plant" in a question between landlord and tenant. No. 155.

An examination of the authorities, both Scotch and English, shews that it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down general rules which shall be of universal application. The words "fixed or attached" require construction; the question is necessarily one of degree. On the one hand it is not necessary that the machinery should be so attached to the soil or to the building as to become pars soli in the sense in which a house or building is pars soli. On the other hand, it is not every mode or degree of attachment which will make machinery heritable quoad valuation. For instance, a sewing machine which is fastened with screws or bolts to the floor simply in order to keep it steady would be held to be moveable notwithstanding attachment to a heritable subject, there being in no proper sense any dedication of the heritable subject to the machine, or vice versa. These are extreme cases; the intermediate cases are more difficult of solution.

May 25, 1894.
Cowan & Sons,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Midlothian.

The fact that machinery can be removed without injury to itself and without material injury to the building is, no doubt, an element in favour of exemption from valuation, pointing, as it does, to the machinery being moveable; but it is by no means conclusive. It is necessary also to consider the degree of attachment: whether the building has been specially adapted to the machinery, whether the annexation is of a permanent or quasi-permanent character, and how the use and enjoyment of the building would be affected by the removal of the machinery.

If it appears that the machinery has been attached to the building by the proprietor in order that it may be permanently or quasi-permanently used in that position, and that the building has been altered and specially adapted to the use of the machinery, and would require to be reconstructed or altered if the machinery were removed, unless it was replaced by machinery of precisely the same size and shape, then, in my opinion, the words of the statute are sufficiently satisfied, and such machinery must be regarded as fixed or attached to the buildings, and accordingly valued as lands or heritages, although it can be separated and removed without destruction to itself and without actual injury to the buildings.

Now, with regard to the mode in which the engines in question are fixed or attached there is no dispute. The appellants admit that the compound condensing steam-engine (No. 3 of the list) is assessable, being built into the heritage; but they maintain that all the others are moveable because they are held in their seats merely by bolts and nuts, and can be removed without injury to themselves or to the buildings. A model of a horizontal engine is in process, which shews the way in which all the steam-engines are fixed to their seats. They are not all of the same size, but they are all fastened in the same way. They are thus described by the witness William Ormiston (page 72 of case):—" (Q.) You examined these engines and boilers. Were they attached or fixed to the property in any way? (A.) They were fixed to the seat in the way shewn—a foundation at the bottom, and then a huge structure of brickwork. In the one case of the largest engine, I went down the hatch by a ladder about eight or nine feet deep, and examined the brickwork, and saw that the attachment was done in the way shewn in the model. The engine-house had a very large roof, 40 feet by 20 feet, and as high as this room. Below that was a 10 feet deep bed, into which the seat was built. (Q.) And was the whole building, both

No. 155. above and below, specially adapted and fitted for the reception of such an engine as you saw? (A.) In that case it specially was. In some other cases an old building had been taken down and the engine-seat formed and the engine put into it. But in some cases the whole building was new and specially made for an engine-house. (Q.) Was it the case that the house was rather made for the engine than the engine for the house? (A.) It was a new engine-house, and the engine put into it. (Q.) You say you regard these as fixtures; why? (A.) Because they are fulfilling the words of the Act, 'fixed and attached' to the building. (Q.) As matter of course, that is part of the building? (A.) It is inside the building, standing on the same earth that the walls of the building are standing on. It is there specially for that and no other purpose." It will thus be seen that although it is true that they are kept in their seats simply by bolts and nuts, the seats are solid structures of great depth made specially for the engines and undoubtedly partes soli; and the bolts are, in some cases at least, 10 or 11 feet in length. The view which I take of those engines coincides with that expressed in the evidence of A. W. Belfrage, C.E. (pp. 68-69 of case). He says that he regards the engines as fixtures, because the under-structure is so very substantial that it cannot be taken apart from the super-structure, and the two must be valued as one subject; that the under-structure is of no other use than merely fixing the engine; "that the structure in stone and lime is made in relation to the under-structure. The upper-structure is made with relation to the whole, and the building is made in relation to both. No doubt the iron-work can be removed, but no other engine unless it were a fac-simile could be reinstated there without this immense under-structure being remodelled." His view, in short, is that the building has been dedicated to the machinery, and can only be used for these machines or others of precisely the same model and size.

Cowan & Sons,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Midlothian.

Judging from the nature of the questions put to the witnesses, the appellants' case is rested upon what I hold to be an erroneous view, that the rule of tenant's fixtures applies in this matter. Once that view is rejected, I think it is clear upon the authorities that machinery so fixed or attached is heritable quoad valuation. A heavy burden lies upon the appellants, because, not only has such machinery been invariably valued as heritable in Midlothian, but if I am not mistaken, it has been so valued by common consent throughout Scotland from the time of the passing of the Valuation Act, 1854. But the question having been now seriously raised and argued, it is right that we should give our judgment upon it, and not proceed solely upon a practice, however long and settled.

I shall now make a few remarks upon the cases to which our attention was drawn in the course of the arguments.

The English decisions which deal expressly with the valuation of machinery for purposes of rating, such as Laing v. Bishop Wearmouth, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 299, and Tyne Boilermakers Company v. The Overseers of Long Benton, 1886, 18 Q. B. D. 81, must be received with caution; because some of them seem to proceed upon the footing that although machinery is not attached to the realty and remains personal property, yet its value may be taken into consideration as enhancing the value of the realty if it is placed on rateable premises with the intention that it shall be permanently used for the purposes for which the premises are adapted.

I profess to express no opinion whether these decisions are justified by the terms of the English statutes. I do not proceed upon them to any extent

There is no doubt that under the 42d section of the Scottish Statute of 1854 No. 155. machinery must be fixed or attached to the land before it can enter the valuation.

May 25, 1894.
Cowan & Sons,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Midlothian.

But the English decisions in questions between executor and heir, and mortgager and mortgagee, are directly in point, because the law of England is the same as the law of Scotland in such questions. Now, it has repeatedly been decided in England that machinery fitted in the way in which the engines in question are fixed is heritable. For instance, in the case of Walmsley v. Milne, 1859, Scott's Rep. 7 C. B., New Series, 115, the articles were attached by bolts or nuts, and could be removed without injury to the building or to themselves; but they were held to be heritable, the Court being of opinion that they were attached for the purpose of improving the inheritance, not for any temporary purpose. The same judgment was pronounced in the case of Mather v. Fraser, 1856, 2 Kay & Johnson, 536, and Climie v. Wood, 1869, L. R., 4 Exchequer, 328.

There are, no doubt, cases which seem to conflict with those I have mentioned; but I think that the true explanation of the conflict is that in those cases the Court lost sight of the distinction between the right of a tenant to remove articles which were fixtures, and the character of the machinery as between executor and heir.

Coming to the Scots cases, I need only refer to the second case of Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, Feb. 2, 1878, 5 R. 607, which is the sequel to the case decided in the House of Lords in March 16, 1867, 3 R. (H. L.) 16, as an authority directly in point. I may add that the older decisions in the Valuation Court are in accordance with the views which I have expressed. I refer in particular to the case of Wilson, December 15, 1859, Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, No. 17; Home, October 9, 1858, 24 D. 1451; Drumgray Coal Company, April 8, 1867, 11 Macph. 977; and Chalmers, Jan. 28, 1871, 11 Macph. 983; and the practice of assessors has, I believe, been in accordance with those decisions.

The decision of Lord Fraser in The North British Railway Company v. Assessor of Railways and Canals, September 26, 1887, 25 S. L. R. 4, is relied on by the appellants as a decision to the contrary. Although I am not prepared to agree with all that his Lordship says in the course of his opinion, I do not think that that case is necessarily in conflict with the judgment which we are about to pronounce. Some of the articles, such as grindstones and troughs, were not attached to the ground in any way whatever. Again, there was a drilling-machine which rested on the ground without any bolts. Other small articles, such as sewing-machines, axle-turning lathes, and a small punching-machine, were fastened to the ground by bolts, though not riveted. Now, as I have said, the question is always one of degree. The articles first mentioned were clearly moveable, not being attached at all; and those which were attached by bolts were articles of comparatively small size which could be equally well used at other parts of the works, and for which no elaborate preparation had been made by preparing a solid foundation or seat.

Lord Fraser says, with reference to the 42d section of the Valuation Act, 1854,—“The enactment is not that all machinery that shall be found to be adapted to the particular mill or gaswork or shipbuilding yard shall be deemed heritage to be valued; it must be machinery fixed or attached,—fixed, that is to say, in such a manner that it cannot be detached from the building without destruction to the building.” If by this his Lordship meant that before

No. 155. machinery can be held to be rateable it must be so fixed that it cannot be removed without actual injury to, that is, dilapidation of, the building, I do not agree in his opinion. But having regard to the articles under consideration, I do not read that passage as covering a case like the present, where, although not a stone of the buildings would necessarily be injured by the removal of the engines, the solid and specially adapted foundations would be rendered useless except for machinery of precisely the same shape and size.

Cowan & Sons,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Midlothian.

2. The next question raised by the appellants is with regard to the Assessor's valuation of water-power. The Assessor has valued the water-power at £7 per horse-power. The appellants maintain that this is too much; but it appears from the evidence that of the £7 only £3 represents water-power proper, and that the remainder represents the water-wheel, mill-lade, and damhead; and that if the value of these adjuncts were not included under the head "water-power," it would go to swell the valuation of the building and works.

3. The next objection is to the Assessor's valuation of the building according to flooring. Valuation according to flooring is a somewhat old-fashioned and, when taken by itself, not a conclusive mode of valuation; but before discarding it, it is necessary to consider what is the alternative proposed by the appellants, especially as it seems to have been adopted and acted upon without objection for about thirty years in the county of Midlothian. Now the only alternative suggested by the appellants is valuation according to the cost of construction. But that is a mode of valuation which is open to objections quite as serious as those applying to valuation according to flooring, and has been discountenanced by this Court in more cases than one. The appellants do not propose that the value shall be fixed according to profits, for obvious reasons. That mode of valuation is not a favourite with traders, involving, as it does, disclosures of the contents of their books. Now, it has latterly been decided by this Court that the most satisfactory way in which to ascertain the valuation of trading premises with the view to seeing what rent could be obtained for them is to value them according to the profits of the undertaking. But that course is not here proposed, and the only alternative course being valuation by cost of construction, I am not prepared to condemn the method adopted by the Assessor. At the same time I reserve my opinion for future years in the event of the appellants proposing that the valuation shall be according to profits in preference to valuation by flooring, and leading evidence, and placing before the Committee materials to support that mode of valuation.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Exemption—Business premises—Messengers—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 13, subsec. 2—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. cap. 12), sec. 24.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 2, exempts from inhabited house duty "every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business," and enacts further that "this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such house or tenement for the protection thereof." No. 156.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 24, enacts, "with reference to" the foregoing exemption "the term 'servant' shall be deemed to mean and include only a menial or domestic servant employed by the occupier, and the expression 'other person' shall be deemed to mean any person of a similar grade or description not otherwise employed by the occupier, who shall be engaged by him to dwell in the house or tenement solely for the protection thereof." Inland Revenue v. Standard Life Assurance Co.

An insurance company who had been assessed to inhabited house duty in respect of their offices appealed on the ground that they were within the foregoing exemption. The case upon appeal set forth that the only persons who occupied the premises at night were two messengers whose duties were to lock up the premises at night and open them in the morning, and in the day-time to go errands, attend in the lobby, and perform various miscellaneous duties of a similar nature. The case further bore that the company "rested their appeal on the fact that the messengers were servants absolutely necessary for their business, not merely for the protection of their premises."

Held (1) that the words "for the protection thereof" in sec. 13, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1878 applied to "servant" as well as to "other person"; (2) that this construction was not modified by sec. 24 of the Act of 1881; and (3) that the company were not within the exemption, in respect that the messengers did not reside in the premises solely for the protection thereof.

Question, whether the exemption would apply to the case of premises in which more than one person resided, such persons being necessary for the protection of the premises, and residing in the premises solely for the protection thereof.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-tax and Inhabited House Duties for the county of Edinburgh, the Standard Life Assurance Company, Edinburgh, appealed against an assessment to inhabited house duty for the year 1893-94 on the annual value of the premises Nos. 3 and 5 George Street, Edinburgh, belonging to and used by the company as business offices, on the ground that the premises in question fell within the exemption provided by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 2, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, sec. 24.* Exchequer Cause.

Inland
Revenue v.
Standard Life
Assurance Co.

The decision of the case ultimately came to turn upon whether two persons, described in the case as "messengers," who lived in the premises at night, and were, as appeared from the case, the only persons who did so, belonged to the class of persons contemplated by the statutes referred to. With reference to these messengers, the case stated that "the duties of the two messengers were . . . to lock up the premises at night and open them in the morning, and in the day-time to go errands, deliver letters, attend in the lobby, and perform various miscellaneous duties of a similar nature." The case further stated that the company "rested their appeal on the fact that the messengers were servants absolutely necessary for their business (not merely for the protection of their premises)."

On the assumption that each of the messengers belonged to the class of persons described in the statutes founded on, the further question arose, whether the company was, under the statutes, and looking to the character of the premises, entitled to have more than one such person on the premises at the same time, and facts were stated in the case bearing on this question. For the purposes of the present report, the nature of these facts is sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the Lord President.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Court.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—I must say that I think the case a very clear one for the Crown. To begin with, Nos. 3 and 5, although they bear a name which sounds in the plural, are neither more nor less than one house,—that is to say, if you go back to the beginning of things, you will find that No. 3 was one house and No. 5 was another house, but at the present time they have this strong element of solidarity, that there is but one door to the building, and the owner of the building and the occupants of the building are just one company. It is true that for their convenience, and apparently following out tradition, they have kept the two branches of their business more or less apart, and that the partition of the staff corresponds with the former differences between the two houses, but that cannot found any distinction in favour of the Standard Insurance Company on the present question of inhabited house duty.

Well, then, this being one house, we find that there are living in it as inhabitants two servants of the company. Now, on looking at the existing statutes, and perhaps still more on looking at the catena of the statutes upon the subject to which Mr Young has very properly referred, this stands out quite clear, that while the Legislature were minded to exempt from the duty houses which were occupied solely as business premises, there occurred the slight complication that sometimes a man had to sleep in the house for its protection, and it was plain enough that that circumstance did not, in the view of the Legislature, and should not, detract from the exemption—the fact of the man living in the house being more or less incidental to the proper exercise of the trade or calling on which the exemption is to be conferred. Therefore when we come to the existing statutes, this is the expression used by the Legislature,—“Every house or tenement” is to be exempt “which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, and this exemption shall take effect No. 156. although a servant or other person may dwell in such house or tenement for the protection thereof." Now, I think it is hopeless to maintain that these last words "for the protection thereof" do not apply to the word "servant" as well as to the words "other person." The permission or licence given to the trader is merely to keep his house protected. If he likes to have one of his own servants, let him do so. If he wants to have caretakers let him have caretakers, but the words "other person" are clearly put there in order to cover the case of someone who employs, not one of his staff, but an outsider, to protect his house; but in the case of the "servant," as in the case of an outsider, the legitimacy of his residence there, in the question of exemption, is determined by the question—Is he there for the purpose of protecting the house or not? When we look at the reason of the thing, it is manifest that, if the Legislature intended to exempt persons who let their servants live in the house, although not required for the protection of the house, any number of people might be furnished with dwelling-houses within a building of this kind, and that would entirely defeat the purposes of the Revenue Statutes.

* At the hearing counsel for the Crown founded on the following earlier statutes:—48 Geo. III. cap. 55, rule 5, sched. (B); 57 Geo. III. cap. 25, sec. 4; 6 Geo. IV. cap. 7, sec. 7; 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36; 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, sec. 11.

Inland
Revenue v.
Standard Life
Assurance Co.

Now, when we turn to the statement on the face of this case, it becomes as clear as anything can be, that these two messengers who live in this one house which bears the plural name are not there for the protection of the premises but for the general purposes of the business. That is said in so many words. The Standard Company rested their appeal on the fact that the messengers were servants absolutely necessary, for what?—for their business, and not merely for the protection of their premises. Now, it seems to me that that puts the Standard Company entirely out of Court.

I am therefore clearly of opinion that these premises are assessable, and that we must reverse the decision of the Commissioners.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant referred to the words of subsection 2 of section 13 of the Act 41 Vict. cap. 15. That subsection gives exemption from premises being assessed as inhabited houses where such premises are solely occupied for the purposes of trade or business; and then it goes on to say that this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such premises for their protection. As a matter of construction I think it is impossible to apply the last words of that section—"for the protection thereof"—to the words "other person" by themselves. I do not think the meaning of that clause is modified by section 24 of 44 and 45 Vict., because that is an interpretation clause, and merely reads into the clause the words "menial or domestic servant." It does not at all affect the application of the condition that the servant who is a menial or domestic servant shall reside there solely for the protection of the house.

In the next place, I do not think it necessarily must be one servant or other person. There may be facts which would shew that more than one was de facto residing in the premises for the purpose of protecting them. There is the case of Buckingham Palace, which was taken as an illustration. There might be dozens of people put there necessarily for the protection of the premises. But then I think this case entirely fails upon the facts. As your Lordship has pointed out, it is perfectly obvious that the two messengers do not live in the house for the protection of the premises, and are not there solely for that purpose. No doubt, as Mr Dundas says, the greater the number the greater

No. 156. the protection, but there can be no doubt at all that these two messengers are kept there for the convenience of the company.

May 29, 1894.
Inland
Revenue v.
Standard Life
Assurance Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, but I would wish to say that I reserve my opinion on the question of whether the provision, or rather the exemption, applicable to the case of a servant or other person dwelling in the premises for their protection can ever be extended so as to include a plurality of persons in that position. I think the case contemplated is a case of usual occurrence, that there may be some person living in business premises during the night who can be there to open the door in case of fire or emergencies of any kind. I do not think that the case contemplated is that of complete protection of the premises against external risks, but merely that there may be someone there for protection in the sense I have mentioned, and as a means of communication between persons outside who may have cause to come to the building. However, that point is not raised here, because it is not stated that the messengers in the present case were there solely for the protection of the premises.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. It is probably unnecessary to decide whether the residence of two or more persons in a building devoted solely to the purposes of trade or business would deprive that building of the exemption accorded to buildings of this class, provided it appeared that two or more persons were living in the building solely for protecting it, because I agree with your Lordship that it is clear enough on the face of this statement that the two messengers are not occupying premises solely for the protection of those premises. I think that is a sufficient ground of judgment.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and sustained the assessment.

No. 157. MRS MARY M'CALLUM, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Hunter.

May 30, 1894.
M'Callum v.
Graham.

MRS MARY GRAHAM, Defender (Reclaimer).—Watt—Macaulay Smith.

Issue—Facility—Fraud—Undue influence—Nurse and patient—Reduction.—In an action for reduction of a will the pursuer averred that the testatrix had, through excessive drinking, become deteriorated in her mental and physical condition, and facile and yielding in her disposition; that the defender, three months before the death of the testatrix, had been engaged to attend her as nurse; that taking advantage of her position of nurse, and of the patient's craving for alcohol, she had plied her with drink, and that by this means, by excluding her relations, and by various false stories, she had induced the patient to make a will in her favour. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of undue influence, but only to an issue of facility and fraud or circumvention.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood. IN December 1893 Mrs Mary M'Callum raised an action in the Court of Session against Mrs Mary Graham concluding for reduction of a settlement, dated 15th June 1892, made by the deceased Margaret Anderson Middleton, niece of the pursuer, by which she left the residue of her estate to the defender.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) "Shortly after her father's death Miss Middleton became very intemperate in her habits and very much addicted to excessive drinking, and these habits of intemperance gradually increased, she being at times in a state of intoxication for days together. From the time of her contracting said habits until her death Miss Middleton's physical and mental condition deteriorated, and she never recovered the full possession of her normal faculties. She lost much mental firmness, and became of facile and yielding disposition, and easily influenced by any one with whom she was in personal contact."

No. 157.
May 30, 1894.
M'Callum v.
Graham.

She then averred that owing to Miss Middleton's state it became necessary about three months before her death that a strong nurse should be engaged, and that the defender was engaged. She then averred ;—(Cond. 6) "The defender perceiving the weak and facile condition of Miss Middleton, and her liability to be easily imposed upon and unduly influenced, immediately set herself to induce Miss Middleton to execute a will in her favour. In pursuance of said scheme the said Mrs Graham succeeded in acquiring a powerful influence over Miss Middleton, and in controlling her every action. She endeavoured as far as possible to prevent any other person having access to Miss Middleton; persuaded Miss Middleton to dismiss the servant girl who had been in her employment for about three years; and refused admittance to Miss Middleton's minister and her friends when they called to see her. Further, the defender, Mrs Graham, in direct violation of the medical instructions, encouraged Miss Middleton in her habits of drinking. She on several occasions drove and walked out with Miss Middleton, and brought her home in a state of intoxication. She falsely pretended to Miss Middleton that she was a trained nurse, and the widow of a doctor of medicine. . . . The consequence of the actings and representations of the said Mrs Graham was that Miss Middleton was induced to execute the deed presently under reduction a few weeks after she obtained access to the house."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said Margaret Anderson Middleton having been in a weak and facile state of mind, and the said Mrs Mary Elizabeth Duncan or Mack or Graham having taken advantage thereof, and fraudulently or by circumvention induced the said Margaret Anderson Middleton to execute the said deed, it ought to be reduced. (3) The defender, Mrs Mary Elizabeth Duncan or Mack or Graham, being in a position in which she exercised a dominant or ascendant influence over the said Margaret Anderson Middleton, and having unduly influenced the latter to grant the said deed, it ought to be reduced.

On 6th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) approved the following issues as the issues for the trial of the cause:—" (1) Whether on or about the 28th day of March 1893 the deceased Miss Margaret Anderson Middleton was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and whether the defender, Mrs Mary Elizabeth Duncan or Mack or Graham, taking advantage of her said weakness and facility, did, by fraud or circumvention, obtain or procure from the said Miss Margaret Anderson Middleton the general disposition and settlement dated on or about 28th March 1893, No. 9 of process, to the lesion of the said Miss Margaret Anderson Middleton? (2) Whether the defender, the said Mrs Mary Elizabeth Duncan or Mack or Graham, being the nurse of, and having in that position acquired a dominant and ascendant influence over the deceased Miss Margaret Anderson Middleton, did, by undue influence, procure and obtain from the latter the said general disposition and settlement dated as aforesaid, No. 9 of process, to the lesion of the said Miss Margaret Anderson Middleton?"*

* "OPINION.—The line which separates the first and second of the issues proposed is very narrow, because, to support an issue of undue influence, there must be proof of weakened will, which borders on facility, and of undue influence, which is not easily distinguished from circumvention. But under the latter

No. 157.

May 30, 1894.
M'Callum v.
Graham.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There was no objection to the first issue, but the second ought not to be allowed. The first issue covered the pursuer's whole case. There was no definite standard for testing what "undue influence" meant, and a separate issue of undue influence had never been allowed¹ except in cases between agent and client, where there was a well-recognised relation of trust, of which the law took a very strict view.²

Argued for the pursuer;—She was entitled to the two issues approved by the Lord Ordinary. She had averred a special relationship, that of nurse and patient, a relationship which opened the door very wide to undue influence, and here the averment was fortified by a statement that the nurse excluded the patient's relations. Where a relationship affording special opportunities for influence was averred, an issue of undue influence would be granted.³ That was recognised in Gray v. Binnie and Munro v. Strain, though the Court in the latter case held that the circumstances of the case did not disclose a relevant case of undue influence, and therefore the issue was refused.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the pursuer's case on record is a case of facility and fraud or circumvention, pure and simple. The story is that this testatrix had got into a debilitated condition of body and mind, and was not in the full possession of her normal faculties; that a nurse was got to attend her; that this nurse, taking advantage of the patient's craving for alcohol plied her with drink, and by this means, and by false stories, got the patient to make a will in her own favour. This is, on the face of it, a very plain sailing case of facility and circumvention.

The general issue of weakness and facility and fraud or circumvention is in its terms, and according to our practice, applicable to a great variety of circumstances and relations, and to the manifold forms in which facility and circumvention appear and meet. In a large proportion of cases, the success of the circumvention implies the establishment of influence; and this influence often arises from some more or less specific relation between the testator and the person issue full proof of facility and circumvention is not required. It is sufficient to establish that ascendancy was acquired by the defender in a position of trust over the will of another, and the abuse of that position by unduly influencing the person over whom ascendancy was so acquired to execute a deed in favour of the defender.

"It only remains to consider whether there are sufficient statements on record to warrant an issue of undue influence. I am of opinion that there are. The pursuer avers that the defender, having been employed as a nurse to prevent Miss Middleton from drinking, instead of doing so, gave her facilities for drinking, and by this means, and by excluding her relations and friends, obtained such ascendancy over her that, in the course of a few months, she obtained a will leaving everything to herself, with the exception of a legacy to the Infirmary.

"A nurse has as great, if not greater, opportunities of acquiring an ascendancy over her patient than a medical man has, who probably visits his patient only once a day, if so often; and I therefore see no reason why an issue of undue influence should not be granted in the present case."

impetrating the will. But the element of undue exercise of legitimate influence does not make it necessary to take a separate issue. No. 157.

The pursuer claimed the second issue on the ground that, even if she failed to prove weakness and facility, she was entitled to prevail. This is not the view of the Lord Ordinary, who thought that the pursuer, even under the second issue, would have to prove "weakened will bordering on facility," but the answer to the pursuer's demand is that the case which she has on record is one of which facility is the basis. MRS CATHERINE M. MACNAB, Nominal Raiser, Pursuer and Defender (Reclaimer).—Johnston—Chree. No. 158.

PETER WADDELL, Real Raiser (Respondent).—Dickson—Abel.

May 30, 1894.
Macnab v. Waddell.

Process—Multiplepinding—Double distress—Fund in medio.—Where there were competing claimants to one half of a trust-estate, the right to the other half not being in dispute, one of the claimants raised an action of multiplepinding in name of the trustee, bringing the whole estate into Court as the fund in medio. Held that the action was incompetent.

By antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1865, Peter Macnab, Oban, conveyed his whole estate to trustees, of whom his future wife, Catherine M. Ferguson, was one. One of the purposes was that in the event of the husband predeceasing his wife the trustees should make over one half of the estate to the widow for her absolute use, and the other half to any person whom the husband might appoint by writing, and failing such appointment to his own next of kin. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

Peter Macnab died on 9th May 1892, leaving a holograph settlement, by which he bequeathed to his nephew, Peter Waddell, the half of the estate over which he had a power of appointment.

Waddell thereafter called upon Mrs Macnab, who was the last survivor of the trustees, to convey one half of the trust property to him in terms of Macnab's settlement. She, however, refused to do so, alleging that she had claims against her late husband for which she was entitled to retain that half of the estate, and that Mr John Macnab, the brother of Peter Macnab, had also claims on it, in virtue of an inter vivos assignation.

In August 1893 Peter Waddell raised a multiplepinding in the name of Mrs Macnab as pursuer and nominal raiser. Mrs Macnab, Peter Waddell, and the next of kin of Peter Macnab, were called as defenders.

The whole of the estate was set forth as forming the fund in medio.

The nominal raiser pleaded, inter alia;—2. The action is incompetent in respect (1) that ex facie of the summons there is no double distress; (2) that there is and can be no competition between the real raiser as a beneficiary under the marriage-contract and the pursuer and others as creditors on the deceased's estate; and (3) that any claim which the real raiser may consider he has should have formed the ground of an action of accounting.

On 8th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences and sustaining the competency of the action.*

The nominal raiser reclaimed, and maintained that the action was incompetent in respect there was no double distress.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Lord Adam has pointed out what seems to me to be an unanswerable objection to the competency of this multiplepinding, and this appears on the face of the Lord Ordinary's opinion. The only double distress alleged to exist consists of competing claims, not to the fund in medio, but to one half of the fund in medio. As regards the other half there is no dispute whatever. The real raiser seems to have assumed that if he could shew the existence of a competition for any part of the estate this was enough to support the competency of a multiplepinding, throwing the whole estate into Court as the fund in medio. This view cannot be supported, and its adoption would be highly inconvenient. If we were to sustain this multiplepinding, the necessary and probably the intended result would be that the administration of the whole marriage-contract estate would be taken out of the hands of the marriage-contract trustee. For this there is no valid reason. It is the duty of the trustee to divide the estate. A dispute, such as we have here, as to who is entitled to this particular share of the estate might be settled by a multiplepinding for the distribution of the one half which is the subject of the dispute. The present action is in my opinion incompetent.

LORD ADAM.—Peter Macnab and the defender and nominal raiser Mrs Catherine Macnab entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract by which Mr Macnab conveyed his whole estate to trustees, of whom the nominal raiser is the sole survivor. In the event of the husband being the predeceaser of the spouses (which has happened) one half of the estate goes to the widow for her absolute use. There is no question as to that portion of the estate. The other half of the estate was destined to any person whom Peter Macnab might appoint, whom failing to his next of kin. As regards this half of the estate there is double distress. A claim to it is lodged by Peter Waddell, who is the heir under a will left by Macnab. There is also a claim made to this half by John Macnab, a brother of Peter Macnab. If the fund in medio had been limited to the latter half of the estate, I should have agreed with the Lord

* "OPINION.—The nominal raiser pleads that there is no double distress in this case, and that therefore the action is incompetent.

"The real raiser claims the one half of the marriage-contract estate, which was contributed by the late Peter Macnab, under the holograph settlement left by the latter. He avers (and it is not denied) that the same part of the marriage-contract estate is claimed by John Macnab, a brother of Peter Macnab, by virtue of an inter vivos assignation granted by the latter in his favour.

"These circumstances appear to me to satisfy the definition of double distress given by Lord Kinloch in the case of *Russell v. "I shall therefore repel the defences."

Ordinary in thinking that there was double distress, but the fund is not limited to that half, but comprises the whole estate. It is, however, the duty of the marriage-contract trustee to administer the estate, and having done so, to pay over the estate to the person in right of it. No. 158.

Macnab v.
Waddell.

It appears to me, that though two persons may have a claim to one half of the estate, that affords no ground for throwing the whole estate into Court, the effect of such a course being to oust the trustee from her right to administer the estate. I do not think that that course is competent, and I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNENAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, found the action to be incompetent, and dismissed the same.

Lord Donington v. Mair.

Road—Public right of way for foot-passengers over road suited for carriage traffic—Right of proprietor to erect gates to prevent carriage traffic.—Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the proprietor of a road, which was suited for carriage traffic, and of the whole of which the public had been found entitled to "the free use," for foot-passengers only, was entitled to erect, and to keep locked, gates at each end of the road, across the carriage-way, for the purpose of preventing any public traffic along the road other than that of foot-passengers, swing-gates being left unlocked at each end sufficient to permit the entrance and egress of foot-passengers.

ON 4th December 1891 Hugh Smith, weaver, Newmilns, Ayrshire, raised an action against Lord Donington, Loudon Castle, Galston, concluding for declarator that the road or way leading off at or near Hag Bridge from the turnpike road between Newmilns and Galston to the public road near Woodhead farm-steading, was a public road or right of way, and for decree ordaining the defender to remove the locked gates, fences, and other obstructions which he had put upon said road, in order that the public might have free and uncontrolled access and admission thereto, and for interdict against the defender troubling or obstructing the public in the peaceable use, enjoyment, and possession of the foresaid public right of way. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

Lord Donington lodged defences, and the cause was tried before Lord Low and a jury.

The following was the interlocutor, dated 23d June 1893, of the Lord Ordinary applying the verdict:—"Applies the verdict of the jury: And in respect thereof, finds that there is a public road for foot-passengers along the road in question, and that the pursuer and all others are entitled to the free use of said road for foot-passengers: To that extent and effect decerns and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: . . . Quoad ultra assolzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns."

Lord Donington subsequently moved the Lord Ordinary to restrict the right of way along the road to a width of 4 feet 6 inches. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion.

Lord Donington took no steps to have the procedure in the action just narrated set aside, but in November 1893 he brought an action in the

No. 159. Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock against George Mair, factory-worker, New-milns, and certain other persons residing there, in which he prayed to have the defenders ordained to re-erect a gate-post and two gates, and to restore the said gate-posts and gates belonging to the pursuer to the condition in which they were between the 22d and 23d days of September 1893, before the defenders' interference therewith; and failing the defenders re-erecting and restoring as aforesaid within such period as the Court should appoint, for warrant to the pursuer to re-erect and restore said gate-posts and gates at the defenders' expense; and for interdict against the defenders taking down, removing, or otherwise interfering with said gate-posts and gates, and any other gate-posts and gates that might be erected on the said road by the pursuer, "so long as the public road for foot-passengers along same is not affected."

May 31, 1894.
Lord Donington v. Mair.

The pursuer stated that he had, on 21st and 22d September 1893, erected at each end of the Hag or Lime Road a gate 9 feet wide across the carriage-way of the road; that these gates were kept locked with a view to preventing all traffic other than that of foot-passengers along the road; that he had also erected at each end of the road a swing-gate 2 feet 9 inches wide; and that these swing-gates were kept unfastened and presented no obstacle to foot-passengers using the road.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The pursuer being proprietor of said Hag or Lime Road, subject only to a public road for foot-passengers, along the same, is entitled to protection against the acts complained of, and to have the gate-posts and gates restored to their former condition as craved in the conclusions of the petition. (3) The defenders having interfered with the property of the pursuer as libelled, the pursuer is entitled to be protected against such interference being repeated, and interdict should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The road in question having already been judicially declared to be a public right of way, and the pursuer ordained to remove all gates or obstructions put by him on the same or any part thereof, the matter is res judicata, and the erection by the pursuer of said gates was illegal, and the petition should be dismissed. (3) It having been found in a case to which the pursuer was a party that the said road for its entire breadth had been a public roadway for time immemorial, and had never had gates or any obstructions thereon or any part thereof, the present action is incompetent, and should be dismissed. (5) In any view, the pursuer is not entitled to decree as craved, or to make any erections that will in any way interfere with the public use or character of said road, and the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (6) Separatim, The pursuer having failed to obtain authority to put up gates or other erections in the course of the declaratory action in the Court of Session the present application is incompetent, and should be dismissed.

On 14th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Hall) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by judgment of the Court of Session, dated 23d June 1893, it is res judicata that there is a public road for foot-passengers along the Hag or Lime Road in question: Finds that on 21st and 22d September 1893 the pursuer erected at each end of the said road two gates, one 9 feet wide and locked, the other a swing-gate, 2 feet 9 inches wide and unfastened: Finds that on 23d September 1893 the defenders, or some of them, took down and removed the said gates: Finds in law that the said gates having been an obstruction to the free use of the said road by foot-passengers, the pursuer was not entitled to erect them, and is not now entitled to have them restored; therefore sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses. . . ."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The question was, whether where the existence of a public right of way for foot-passengers, but not for other traffic, had been established, the proprietor was entitled to put up gates so as to prevent other traffic, sufficient space being left for the entrance and egress of foot-passengers. The defenders' objection was that the gates across the carriage-way were there at all, not that the space for foot-passengers was too narrow. The property of the solum over which this right of way had been found to exist remained in the pursuer,¹ and he was entitled to the exclusive use of the solum, subject only to the exercise of the public right, and to take such measures as were necessary to protect the public from using the solum otherwise than in accordance with the right which they had vindicated.² The gates here in question were necessary to prevent the public from using the road for carriage, horse, and cattle traffic; on the other hand they to no appreciable extent obstructed the public right of footpath. Interdict ought therefore to be granted.

Lord Donington v. Mair.

Argued for the defenders;—The verdict of the jury gave the public a right of footpath over the whole length and breadth of this road. It was not the case of a right of footpath over unenclosed ground. It was to the latter class of cases that the authorities cited on the other side applied. There was no case in which the proprietor had been held entitled to put gates across a defined road over the whole of which a public right of way for foot-passengers had been found to exist. [LORD RUTHERFURD-CLARK referred to the interlocutor applying the verdict, and asked, Does that give you a right over the whole road, or merely along it?] A right over the whole road was intended. The conclusions of the original action shewed that. Further, the Lord Ordinary had refused the motion to limit the breadth of the road. As, therefore, the pursuer had to an appreciable extent—that was, to an extent which the law would recognise—diminished the right to which the public had been found entitled, interdict ought to be refused.³

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are:—(1) That there is an old road wide enough for carts and carriages, between two public places, upon the estate of the pursuer; (2) that it has been judicially found that there is a public right of way over this road, but that such right is one of passage on foot only; (3) that the right is not one of footpath merely, but extends over the whole breadth of the old road.

In this state of facts the present dispute has arisen in consequence of the proprietor of the solum having erected gates at both ends of the road, consisting of a swing-gate 2 feet 9 inches wide, which is unfastened, and a gate closing the rest of the width of the road, which gate is locked. The public have resented this as an unwarrantable interference with their right of use of the road for walking, and have broken or pulled down the gates, and the pursuer has appealed to the jurisdiction of a Court of law for a remedy.

Lord Donington v. Mair.

The pursuer says that he cannot, without the gates, prevent the use of the road by horse and carriage or by cattle, and that he does not interfere with its use by persons on foot. The defenders maintain that their use of the road on foot is illegally obstructed, and that the pursuer has no right to erect gates.

It can hardly be questioned that if this were a case of right of footpath only, the presence of swing-gates, giving an opening of 3 feet when swung back, could not be held to be an illegal obstruction. The peculiarity of this case is, that as the whole breadth of ground which formed a private road for vehicles has been held to be subject to a public right of passage on foot, the space covered by the locked gate is technically part of the ground over which the right to walk exists. Upon this ground the Sheriff-substitute has held that the locked gates are not legal, and that the pursuer cannot demand that they be restored by those who have removed them. It is, I conceive, a well-established principle that at any place over which the public have a right to go, the owner of the solum, who is subject to this public right, cannot diminish it in however small a degree, and defend his action only by maintaining that what he has done does not practically interfere with the enjoyment of the public right. He is, as regards mere occupation, by an obstruction of any part of the solum over which there is a right to go, in the same position as if it were a public highway. If anything is put up that prevents free movement over the ground, it must be defended on other grounds than that there is plenty of space left for the traffic. This rule is well illustrated by the case of The Queen v. The Telegraph Company, 31 L. J. Mags. Cas. 166, referred to at the debate, in which those interested in maintaining a right of open road on a highway were held entitled to have the erection of telegraph posts stopped, although it could not be said that ample room was not left for use of the road after their erection. It is therefore, in my opinion, no answer to the defenders' contention to say that the wickets left by the pursuer are amply sufficient for the use of the road by foot-passengers. I think they are so, but in my opinion that is not a sufficient answer to the defenders' contention, and if that were the only answer I should reject it.

It is quite true that a servitude road or a mere public right of way over the property of a citizen is not in the same position as a highway. In the case of a highway, the right to prevent any erection on the highway is absolute; whereas in the case of a servitude or public right of way it is a question of circumstances whether the right of those who possess the servitude or of the public is to have it removed. But still anything which covers up and prevents the unobstructed use of the ground, subject to the right for its exercise, must be justified by the owner. He may do so by shewing that what he is doing is required for the proper working of his estate, as by dividing fields or the like, and that it is an immaterial interference with the rights of the dominant tenement in the one case or of the public in the other. The case of stiles on a footway is an illustration of this. They are obstructions, but may be put up as not interfering materially with the right, and as being requisite for the reasonable working of the owner's estate. This is well settled by decision.

The pursuer's contention in this case is that what he has done has been done to protect his property against illegal encroachments beyond the existing public right, which the leaving of the ends of the road open to free use by any traffic would give rise to, and that in doing so he has in no material way interfered with the enjoyment of the right existing over his property. If that be so, I think it is a good answer to the defenders' objection to what he has done. The questions are, is this a true statement of the matter?—and if it is, is it a competent answer to the defenders' objection? It appears to me that the statement is true. The pursuer is compelled to keep a road, wide enough for carriage traffic, free for the use of foot-passengers, while having the right to exclude animals, horsemen, and vehicles. If he is to fence himself against the latter, he can only do so by stopping their ingress to this road, which must be accessible to the foot-passengers.

The only remaining question is, has he the right to do so by the mode which he has adopted, and which is the ordinary and reasonable mode where it does not interfere with the rights of others? This question is not by any means an easy one. The Sheriff-substitute has expressed himself as of the opinion that it is "clearly illegal." I do not feel able to express myself with such absolute confidence, but I have on consideration come to be of a different opinion. It appears to me that the rights of a proprietor whose private estate is burdened with a servitude road or a public right of way are to have that right exercised in the way least burdensome to him, consistently with its free exercise, and that any reasonable protection to his estate from other causes tending to restrict or injure his enjoyment must be conceded to him, even although in a technical sense it may, at a particular point, cause those enjoying the right acquired over his property to do in some minute and immaterial particular what they would otherwise not require to do. This is well illustrated in the case already referred to, viz., the placing of stiles across a footway which is subject to a servitude or a right of way, which it has always been recognised is the right of a proprietor, if in utilising his property he requires to erect a fence to divide his ground. No more distinct obstruction could be placed on a way than a stile to be clambered over, yet so distinctly was the right of placing stiles across footpaths recognised in early times, that in the case of Wood, March 9, 1809, F. C., the party who was objecting to a swing-gate tried to get over the argument deducible from stiles having been sanctioned by the Court, by maintaining that they improved the footpath. This extraordinary contention was disregarded by the Court, and declared to be "palpably insufficient and contrary to common sense," since, as it was expressed, "all the world knew that styles (sic) were not an improvement of the footpath, but to a certain degree an obstruction of it."

It thus, as I hold, is established law, that a right to pass from one place to another over private property is one which does not imply the power to prevent the proprietor from beneficial use and protection of his own property, because his mode of obtaining these things may require the right to be exercised at some particular point under some immaterial restriction, which in no true sense injures the enjoyment of the right. Applying this plainly equitable view to the present case, can it be said that there is any practical distinction between the placing of a stile for crossing an obstructing fence and the arrangement in this case. In the case of the stile, the person using the right is entitled to walk along the ground of the proprietor from one place to another. Nevertheless, he may be required at one or more places on the road to leave the ground and climb over a fence by steps provided. In this case, at points where fences are provided, he has for a distance of two or three inches to pass along one side of the road. The cases seem to me to be quite parallel—to be, in the words of the judgment in Wood's case, "an interference not material." Lastly, I do not think that a different rule is to be applied in the case of a right of public foot-way over private property to that which is applied in a case of servitude road. In both cases I hold that the proprietor is entitled to all enjoyment of his property consistent with his not obstructing the exercise of the right granted, and that in this case the proprietor is not to be held to obstruct the right by the course he has taken, which practically leaves the whole road available to the foot-passenger, and only requires him at the moment of entering or leaving the private property of the pursuer to do so in such a manner as does not injure him, but enables the pursuer to protect his property from illegal trespass by other classes of road traffic.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—There is a road which runs through the property of the appellant called the Hag or Lime Road. By a judgment of this Court pronounced on 23d June 1893 it was declared “that there is a public road for foot-passengers along the road in question, and that the pursuers and all others are entitled to the free use of said road for foot-passengers.”

At a subsequent period the appellant moved the Judge before whom the case depended to restrict the width of the road to 4 feet 6 inches. The motion was refused.

In these circumstances the appellant maintains that he is entitled to erect a locked gate at either end of the road with a swing-gate at the side of the width of 2 feet 9 inches. He had erected such gates at his own hand, but they were removed by the respondents or some of them. He asks the authority of the Court to their being re-erected. He explains that the road is not fenced, and he says that while the gates will be an advantage to him both in preventing the use of the road for wheeled traffic and the trespass of animals, they will not in any way interfere with the use of it as a footroad.

The appellant relies on the case of Sutherland, 3 R. 485, in which it was held that the proprietor of lands through which a public footpath ran was entitled to put swing-gates across the footpath, provided that they were not of an obstructive character. I accept that decision as an accurate statement of the law. But the question remains whether it will justify the action of the appellant.

I do not understand the judgment to determine more than that an easily opened swing-gate is not an obstruction to a public footpath. It applied to public footpaths the rule which had been established in the case of Wood, March 9, 1809, F. C., in regard to a servitude road. Swing-gates do not prevent the full use of the footpath. They interpose, no doubt, a certain obstacle to its use, but one which the passenger can easily and at once remove. They are a great benefit to the proprietor, and of no disadvantage to the public, and in view of the benefit the Court thought that the trouble of opening might be thrown out of account.

The appellant cannot bring himself within the rule of this case unless he can shew that the locked gates are not an obstruction. I do not think that he can. They cannot be opened by those who are using the road. They are intended to form, and do in fact form, a permanent obstruction at two places of the road. At these two places they reduce its width to 2 feet 9 inches, and absolutely prevent the rest of it from being used. They are, in my opinion, an obstruction, and cannot be justified on the principle of the case on which the appellant relies.

But he urges that the footpath is not obstructed, inasmuch as he leaves at each gate a sufficient space for the exercise of that right. If he had only to submit to a right of public footway through his property, it might be true that the Court would cause to be laid off a footpath of sufficient breadth and no more. No. 159. But we have no such case before us. It is, I think, the just meaning of the judgment which I quoted that the right of footway exists over every part of the Hag or Lime Road. The public are "entitled to the free use of said road for foot-passengers." It seems to me that the appellant is not entitled to withdraw any part of the road from the use to which it is subject, or to narrow it at any part of its course. I do not mean to say that the appellant may not erect swing-gates. I give no opinion on that point. I am dealing with the locked gates only, which I hold to be an illegal interference with the rights of the public.

I confess that I have come to this opinion with reluctance. The gates would probably be of much advantage to the appellant, and I doubt if the public would suffer by their erection. But I am bound to give my decision in accordance with what I believe to be the legal rights of the parties before us.

LORD TRAYNER.—The road in question in this case is situated on the property of the complainer—the solum of the road is his. But along that road the respondents and other members of the public have a right of way as foot-passengers, but no other or higher right. The respondents' right, however, is one of passage over every part of the road—not merely over a defined footpath or part of it. In September last the complainer, in order, as he alleges, to prevent carting, riding, and driving over said road, erected at each end of the road (I quote from the finding of the Sheriff-substitute) "two gates, one 9 feet wide and locked, the other a swing-gate 2 feet 9 inches wide and unfastened." It was admitted at the bar that if the complainer was entitled to erect gates at the ends of the road at all, the swing-gate of 2 feet 9 inches wide was sufficient for the access or egress of anyone who desired to use the road. But the respondents dispute the complainer's right to erect gates at the ends of the road in question, and maintain that he is bound to leave it open and unfenced to its full breadth. The Sheriff-substitute has sustained this contention on the part of the respondents, and in doing so has taken a view of the rights of parties in which I cannot concur.

Considered apart from strict law, in the meantime, the position taken up by the respondents is not one which can be regarded with favour. The gates complained of are, I suppose, an inch or 2 inches wide, and therefore it is only for that space at each end of the road that any obstruction is presented. Access to and egress from the road is duly provided, and after access has been obtained there is nothing to hinder the use of the road over its whole breadth. The purpose of the complainer's action is to prevent the road being used in a manner in which no one but himself has right to use it. The right of the respondents is practically left intact, and they are not subjected to any inconvenience in the exercise of their right. I cannot regard the respondents as acting otherwise than in emulationem.

But I think the complainer is within his legal right in putting up the gates in question. Such a right seems to me to have been recognised in the case of Wood, March 9, 1809, F. C. (which was the case of a servitude road), and in the cases of Rogers, 7 S. 287; Kirkpatrick, 19 D. 91; and Sutherland, 3 R. 485, which were cases of public footpaths, the right to use which had been acquired by the public, as in the present case, by prescription. The differences in detail between the three cases last cited and the present do not appear to me

The pursuer intimated that he did not ask that the defenders should be found liable in the expense of re-erecting the gates.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, granted warrant to the pursuer to re-erect the gates, and interdicted the defenders from interfering with them.

Playfair's Trustees v. Playfair.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion.—A testator by trust-disposition and settlement conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after making provision for his widow, and for payment of certain legacies, directed his trustees to hold and apply the residue for behoof of the whole children whom he might leave, equally among them, share and share alike; to pay or expend for behoof of the children respectively the interest of their shares, or so much thereof as the trustees should think necessary, until the children respectively attained the age of twenty-five, or, if daughters, were married; "and on my children respectively attaining said age of twenty-five years if sons, or attaining that age or being married if daughters, I direct my said trustees to make payment to them of their respective shares," it being declared that the shares should not become vested in the children until the respective periods of payment arrived, and there being a conditional institution of issue and a clause of survivorship for the case of children dying without having taken a vested right. The deed gave the trustees a full and unlimited power to sell the whole estates, heritable and moveable, but contained no direction to sell.

The testator died possessed of heritage to the value of about £56,000, and of moveable property valued at about £50,000. He was survived by nine children, two of whom died unmarried, and without having taken a vested interest in the fee of the residue. Thereafter M, a daughter, died unmarried and intestate, but, having attained the age of twenty-five, with a vested right to a one-seventh share of the fee of the residue. At the date of M's death no part of her share had been made over to her, and the trustees had not exercised the power to sell the heritage.

In a competition between M's heir-at-law and her heirs in mobilibus, held (1) that the exercise of the power to sell the heritage was indispensable to the due execution of the trust, and therefore (2) that the whole of M's share was moveable quoad her succession, and fell to her heirs in mobilibus.

2D DIVISION. PATRICK PLAYFAIR, merchant in Glasgow, died on 21st November 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after making provision for his widow and appointing payment of certain small legacies, in the fifth place directed his trustees "to hold and apply the whole residue and remainder of my whole means and estate for behoof of my whole children whom I may leave, equally among them, share and share alike, and to pay or expend for behoof of such children respectively the interest or annual proceeds of their shares, or such part thereof as my trustees shall think necessary, for their board, education, and maintenance respectively, accumulating the remainder until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-five years complete if sons, and until they shall respectively attain that age or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen, if daughters; and on my children respectively attaining said age of twenty-five years if sons, or attaining that age or being married if daughters, I direct my said trustees to make payment to them of their respective shares, . . . declaring that the shares of such of my children as are sons shall not become vested in them until they shall respectively attain the said age of twenty-five years, and the shares of such of my children as are daughters shall not become vested in them till they attain that age or are married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and I provide that in the event of any child or children predeceasing me, or surviving me and dying before the term of payment and vesting of their shares without leaving lawful issue, then the shares of such deceasing child or children shall accrue to and be divided equally between and among my surviving children and the lawful issue of such as may have died leaving issue equally among them per stirpes; but in the event of the deceasing child or children leaving lawful issue, such issue shall in every such case receive (if more than one equally among them share and share alike) the share or shares which would have fallen to their deceased parent or parents had he, she, or they survived."

The trust-disposition further gave full powers to the trustees to enter into possession of the trust-estate, and to lend or invest the same in certain securities and investments, and to change and vary the said securities and investments from time to time, and to take other securities and investments of the same description as they should think necessary, and then proceeded as follows: "And I grant full and unlimited power to my trustees from time to time as they shall think proper, to sell and dispose of all or any part or parts of my estate and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, hereby conveyed, and all other estate and effects, heritable and moveable, which may at any time form part of my trust-estate, by public roup or private bargain, at such price or prices, and with or without advertisement, as they shall think proper, and with full power to my trustees to grant all dispositions, assignations, conveyances, discharges and renunciations, and every other deed or writing necessary or proper for any of the above purposes, containing all usual and necessary clauses, and particularly a clause binding my heirs in absolute warrandice of the same, and generally with full power to my trustees to do every other deed, matter, or thing for implementing and fulfilling the directions herein contained, and carrying into effect the whole purposes of the trust hereby created in the most full and ample manner." The deed did not contain a direction to sell.

Mr Playfair was survived by nine children, two of whom died unmarried without having taken a vested interest in the capital of their father's estate.

A third child, Anna Mary Playfair, died on 15th February 1892, intestate and unmarried, but having attained the age of twenty-five on 26th June 1883, she was entitled to one-seventh share of the residue of her father's estate. No part of her share however having been paid or conveyed to her, the question arose whether her interest in the heritable property left by her father was heritable or had become moveable quoad her succession; and a special case was accordingly presented. Mr Playfair's trustees were the first parties, Walter Playfair, Anna Mary Playfair's immediate younger brother as her heir-at-law, was the second party, and her heirs in mobilibus, being her six surviving brothers and sisters, were the third parties.

The case set forth the foregoing facts, and further stated, that the value of Mr Playfair's moveable property at the time of his death was about £50,000, and of his heritage about £56,000, the latter consisting of the estate of Ardmillan in Ayrshire, and a house in Glasgow; that the trustees had made various payments out of the capital of the estate to certain of the beneficiaries other than Anna Mary Playfair; that the trustees had never exercised the power of selling the heritable property; and that at the date of Miss Playfair's death they still had in their hands moveable property to the value of about £30,000.

The second party, as Miss Playfair's heir-at-law, claimed the whole of her share in so far as it consisted of heritage; while the third parties maintained that the heritage had been converted and so fell to them, along with the moveable portion of their sister's share, as her heirs in mobilibus.

The questions of law were,—“(1) Are the first parties, as Mr Playfair's trustees, bound to convey or pay over the share of the trust-estate falling to the late Miss Anna Mary Playfair so far as it consists of heritable property to the second party as the heir-at-law of the said Miss Playfair? Or (2) Are the said trustees bound to pay over the whole share of the said Miss Anna Mary Playfair in the said trust-estate to the third parties, who are her heirs in mobilibus?”¹

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question which is before us is whether the share of Miss Anna Mary Playfair in so far as it consists of the heritable property passes to her heir-at-law, or whether the whole share belongs to her heirs in mobilibus—in other words, whether there has been conversion.

The general law is settled by the case of Buchanan v. Angus, 4 Macq. 374. The rule is that a direction to sell operates conversion; but that a power to sell does not, unless it is exercised or unless the exercise of it is “indispensably necessary to the due execution of the trust.” In the latter case, the power is equivalent to a direction to sell. But however clear the law may be, the cases shew that the just application of it is not an easy matter.

We have seen that the whole residue is held for the children in equal shares, and that the share of each child is to be paid at a different time.

Of course I do not attach importance to the fact that the trustees are directed to pay and not to convey. The phrase in itself is not material, as the case of Buchanan shews. But we must be satisfied that the trustees may lawfully convey a share of the heritable estate to a child in part payment of his share, and that the child is bound to receive it. These are convertible propositions. For beneficiaries are bound to submit to what the trustees may do in execution of the powers committed to them.

The second party says that the trustees might execute the trust without a sale, and in this way: When the period arrived for the payment of the first share, they could dispoise the heritage pro indiviso to themselves and the child in the proportion of six-sevenths and one-seventh. They could convey to the next child one-sixth of their own share, one-fifth of the remainder to the third child, and so on as the several periods of payment arrived, till the whole was exhausted. There is no warrant in the trust-deed for giving to each child successively a separate part of the heritable estate on a separate title, and it is plain that equality could not be obtained in that way. The only possible mode of equal division is by the creation of successive pro indiviso estates. No. 160.

Trustees v.
Playfair.

It is not likely that the trustees would act in this manner, which I think could hardly fail to be very detrimental to the beneficiaries. It is sufficient for the second party to shew that it would be lawful for them to do so. For in that case they would be acting in conformity with the powers conferred on them by the truster, and a sale would not be necessary for the execution of the trust.

We must consider the effect of the creation of the several pro indiviso estates. The child in whose favour the first conveyance is granted becomes the joint proprietor along with the trustees of the whole heritable property, and being joint owners only, the trustees would cease to have the exclusive management of the largest portion of the trust-estate. They could neither sell nor let without the consent of the other joint owner, while he on his part could when he pleased force a division or a sale. The trust management would cease and be superseded by the management of the joint owners. The evil would obviously become greater as each child received his pro indiviso share, and indeed when a second conveyance was granted the trustees would be in a minority in a council of co-owners.

I do not think that the truster contemplated the possibility of such a state of things. He could not have meant that a stranger should be introduced into the management of a large portion of his trust-estate, and I do not think that he gave any power to that effect. It may be said that the joint owner would be one of his own children; but that would be true only so long as the pro indiviso share was not sold. But whether a child or a stranger be owner the creation of the joint estate is so entirely subversive of the trust management which the truster has set up that I cannot hold it to be within the power of the trustees. No doubt there are cases in which the trustees may convey to all the beneficiaries pro indiviso. But in doing so they are denuded of the trust and their management ceases.

Again, it appears to me that a child could not be compelled to take his share as joint owner with the trustees. When he reaches the specified age he is entitled to require the trustees to pay him his share. In my opinion he is entitled to demand that his share shall be separated from the trust-estate, and put under his own absolute control. It may well be that a conveyance to all the beneficiaries satisfies a direction to pay in equal shares. The trust is brought to an end—and they are joint proprietors—not with the trustees, but with one another. Here the direction is to pay one child an equal share, leaving the rest of the estate to be held for the others. I can put no other construction on such a direction than that the share is to be separated from the trust-estate. The word “share” has here, I think, its natural meaning, and denotes something that is shorn off.

The share of each child is to be paid when he attains twenty-five, or in the case of daughters when they marry. If all the children had lived there might have been nine “payments” to make, and it is certain that there must be several—each at a different time. I do not see in what manner this direction could

No. 160. be accomplished otherwise than by paying the shares in money, or in other words, the exercise of the power of sale is indispensable to the execution of the trust.

Playfair's
Trustees v.
Playfair.

The present case seems to be substantially the same as that of the Advocate-General v. Blackburn's Trustees, 10 D. 166, in which Lord Fullerton held that the trust could not be executed without a sale, and therefore that there was conversion. I have not observed, nor have I been informed, that in any subsequent case his decision has been questioned. It was fully under the notice of the House of Lords in Buchanan v. Angus, when the decision of the Court of Session was reversed. Lord Fullerton's judgment was quoted with approval as correctly expressing the law, and it was not said that he had applied it erroneously. I think that we must follow it.

LORD KYLLACHY and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER were absent.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Reduction—Foreign—Jurisdiction.—A, the trustee in a sequestration granted in 1885, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, having realised the bankrupt's estate and distributed it among the creditors, was discharged in 1889. In 1893 B, alleging that he was trustee in a liquidation by arrangement of the debtor's estates instituted in 1881 in the English Courts, brought an action against A for reduction of the sequestration and of the act and warrant appointing the trustee thereunder, on the ground that the Court in Scotland had no jurisdiction to award sequestration in respect of the dependence of the bankruptcy proceedings in England.

The Court dismissed the action on the ground that all parties interested had not been called.

Opinion (per Lord Young and Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that an action for reduction of a sequestration on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to award sequestration by reason of the existence of a liquidation in England of the debtor's estates was incompetent.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

ON 14th May 1885 Andrew Ross Robertson, designed as residing at No. 1 Marchmont Street, Edinburgh, with concurrence of J. A. Trevelyan Sturrock, "a creditor of the said Andrew Ross Robertson to the extent required by the statute," presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber, setting forth that he was subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland, and praying for sequestration of his estates under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.* On 2d June the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Trayner) sequestered Robertson's estates, and remitted to the Sheriff of the Lothians. Thereafter D. H. Wilson, S.S.C., was elected trustee on the sequestrated estates, and his election was confirmed by act and warrant of the Sheriff of the Lothians, dated 23d June 1885. Wilson having died, C. J. Munro, C.A., was elected trustee, and his election was confirmed by act and warrant, dated 2d October 1885. Munro, as trustee, then proceeded to realise the estate and to distribute it among the creditors. On 24th September 1889 he was discharged.

Gibson v. Munro.

On 14th July 1893 David Gibson, C.A., Liverpool, designed as "trustee in the liquidation by arrangement or composition with creditors taken out in the London Bankruptcy Court on 9th July 1881 of the affairs of Andrew Ross Robertson, of No. 12 Calthorpe Street, Gray's Inn Road, Middlesex," brought an action against Munro "as an individual, and as claiming to be trustee in the pretended sequestration hereafter referred to," concluding for reduction of the above-mentioned interlocutor sequestrating Robertson's estates, and acts and warrants appointing Wilson and Munro respectively to be trustees.*

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "On the 9th day of July 1881 a petition for liquidation of the affairs of the said Andrew Ross Robertson, by arrangement or composition with his creditors, under and in terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869 . . . was presented in the London Bankruptcy Court by the said Andrew Ross Robertson, and on said date notice of a general meeting of the creditors of the said Andrew Ross Robertson was duly summoned and published on 15th July 1881 in the London Gazette. Office copies of the London Bankruptcy Court of the said petition and publication in the London Gazette are herewith produced." (Cond. 2) "At a meeting, held in answer to the above Gazette notice, on 25th July 1881, Mr Alexander Hosie, commission-agent, of 19 Cloudesley Square, London, was elected trustee, conform to certificate in his favour, dated 27th July 1881. Notice and order of said appointment of trustee was duly published in the London Gazette of 2d August 1881. Office copies of the London Bankruptcy Court of said certificate, and notice and order of appointment of trustee, are herewith produced." (Cond. 3) "On 15th April 1889 Mr Hosie was removed from office by resolution of creditors, and in his place and stead Mr Thomas Steven Lindsay, chartered accountant, of 31 Poultry, in the city of London, and 55 Castle Street, Edinburgh, was appointed trustee." (Cond. 4) "On 17th April 1891 Mr Lindsay was removed from office by resolution of creditors, and in his place and stead Mr Walter Hercules Short, incorporated accountant, of No. 31 Wool Exchange, Coleman Street, in the city of London, was appointed trustee." (Cond. 5) "On 31st October 1892 Mr Short was removed from office by resolution of creditors, and in his place and stead the pursuer, Mr David Gibson, chartered accountant, of No. 1 South John Street, Liverpool, in the county of Lancashire, was appointed trustee. An office copy of the London Bankruptcy Court of the certificate of Mr Gibson's appointment is herewith produced, dated 4th November 1892. Notice thereof and order was duly published in the London Gazette of 15th November 1892, copy of which is herewith produced."

The pursuer, after setting forth a number of the provisions of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. cap. 71), and the deeds under reduction, then averred further,—(Cond. 15) "The . . . award of sequestration, and acts and warrants before mentioned, were and are illegal, incompetent, and inept ab initio, . . . by reason of the

* The representatives of Wilson, the first trustee, were also called as defenders, but as the pursuer, in the Inner-House, consented to decree of absolvitor being pronounced in their favour, the case as regards them need not be farther noticed.

said liquidation by arrangement of the affairs of the said Andrew Ross Robertson in the London Bankruptcy Court on 9th July 1881 under and in terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, 32 and 33 Victoria, cap. 71, section 125, subsections 1 and 5, and rules made in pursuance of said Act. Said liquidation by arrangement still continues and is unclosed, and was continuing and pending on . . . 2d and 23d June and 2d October, all in the year 1885, the dates of the said pretended . . . interlocutor or decree awarding sequestration of the estates of the said Andrew Ross Robertson, and the said pretended acts and warrants. The pursuer, as trustee therein, has found it necessary to raise the present action."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect of the proceedings in the London Bankruptcy Court, the pursuer, as trustee aforesaid, is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The said Andrew Ross Robertson having been made bankrupt in the London Bankruptcy Court in 1881, and which bankruptcy is still subsisting and pending, the said pretended . . . interlocutor or decree of sequestration, and acts and warrants, were and are incompetent and illegal, and in violation of the Bankruptcy Statute 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 71, and general rules made in pursuance of said Act, and ought to be reduced.

The defender set forth the proceedings in the sequestration, and also certain proceedings in which the validity of the sequestration had been assumed, and pleaded;—(2) The action is incompetent. (4) No relevant nor sufficient grounds averred to sustain the conclusions of the summons. (8) Mora. (9) The whole proceedings complained of having been legally initiated and carried through, and this defender discharged as trustee, he ought to be assoilized, with expenses.

On 27th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second, fourth, eighth, and ninth pleas in law for the defender Charles John Munro: Assoilizes the whole defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.— . . . On examining the record I can find no distinct averment that a liquidation of Robertson's affairs was ever constituted by order of Court or resolution of creditors. No such order or resolution is produced, or indeed said to exist, although copies of certificates of appointment of the successive trustees are produced. It may be that, if I were to proceed perfectly strictly, I might throw out this action for want of any relevant averments of title. But this apparent defect in the record (which was not adverted to at the debate) may perhaps arise from mere inadvertence, or it may be that I may be under some misunderstanding on the point; and therefore for the purposes of the present judgment, I assume that there existed a real process of liquidation of Robertson's estate by arrangement or compromise in the London Bankruptcy Court, and that that Court had jurisdiction to deal with that liquidation. I also assume that the liquidation had the same effect—so far as relates to the present question—as an adjudication in bankruptcy.

"Making these assumptions in the pursuer's favour, the case which he presents is that the award of sequestration pronounced in the Bill-Chamber on 2d June 1885 must be reduced, because there was at its date a bankruptcy of Robertson's estate depending in the London Bankruptcy Court. That is the sole ground of reduction. It is not averred that the award of sequestration was obtained by any fraud practised on the Court, or on account of any misstatement made, or error under which the Court laboured. The pursuer does not state who the creditors are for whose behoof he appears, or that there are any creditors now claiming in the English bankruptcy. It is not said that the Scotch trustee holds or is accountable for any part of the bankrupt's estate, or that there exists elsewhere any part of the bankrupt's estate which the pursuer cannot recover by reason of the Scotch sequestration. There is no statement

The pursuer reclaimed.

No. 161.

At the hearing in the Inner-House counsel for the pursuer stated that that the reduction has been brought with any practical purpose at all. Further, it is not said that the pursuer or those who preceded him in his office were not aware of the proceedings in the Scotch sequestration. Presumably they knew of them, because a Scotch sequestration is a public proceeding, and, under section 48 of the Act of 1856, must be advertised in the London Gazette. In the absence of any averment of ignorance, I hold that the trustee under the English liquidation was aware of the proceedings in Scotland; and the pursuer now offers no explanation of his delay in making his challenge. The plea of the pursuer is therefore of the most general and unqualified character.

"I think the pursuer's contention cannot be supported, and that for various reasons.

"1. There is no authority or precedent for a reduction of an award of sequestration. None of the counsel have found in the books any trace of such a decree, and that appears to me a very cogent argument against the pursuer.

"2. The Bankruptcy Statutes do not authorise reduction of an award of sequestration. They provide various remedies for mistakes in sequestrations, and methods of bringing a sequestration to a close. X

"The sequestration of Robertson's estate was granted on the petition of the bankrupt, presented under section 21 of the Act of 1856. It is not now denied that the statutory formalities were complied with, and in that case, under section 29 the Lord Ordinary was bound to award sequestration if he had jurisdiction. He had no discretion. The estates were sequestrated vi statuti.

"Perhaps the most important provision for the correction of errors in awarding a sequestration is that in section 31, which authorises recall of a sequestration within forty days after it has been granted, and directs the registration of the recall in the Register of Sequestrations and on the margin of the Register of Inhibitions. Otherwise, according to the plan of the Bankruptcy Statutes, the bankruptcy must proceed after the forty days whatever the errors or misapprehensions may have been under which it was granted. There is no doubt that a petition for recall presented after the forty days would be thrown out as incompetent; and it seems strange to affirm that it is competent to bring an action of reduction when it is not competent to present a petition for recall. § 31

"The statute in sections 32, 35, 36, 38, and 40, makes careful provision for a sequestration being sisted or brought to a close after the lapse of the forty days, when a certain majority of the creditors are agreed that it should be sisted or closed; and section 40 provides that a judgment declaring a sequestration at an end shall be registered in the same manner as a judgment of recall. X

"By the second section of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 33, provision is made for the special case in which it is shown that the bankrupt estate ought to be distributed under the Bankruptcy Laws of England or Ireland. In such cases the time allowed for presenting a petition for recall is extended to three months.

"Seeing that these remedies have been provided, and that the remedy of reduction has not been provided, I think that the remedy of reduction in the ordinary Courts is not competent. It appears to me that the whole procedure in a sequestration is regulated by statute, that the scheme of the statute is that its provisions shall be carried out in disregard of mistakes or informalities not discovered within the time allowed. I am inclined to think that I have no power and no jurisdiction to pronounce any judgment in a sequestration which the Bankruptcy Statutes do not expressly authorise.

"It is true that it has been found that the Bankruptcy Statutes have failed to provide for every possible event, and that in such exceptional cases the Court has gone beyond the statutes and provided a remedy. But, in doing so, the Court has always acted in the exercise of its nobile officium, and never in the course of ordinary litigation. The case of Anderson, 13th March 1866, 4 Macph. 577 (where the Court in the exercise of its nobile officium declared a sequestration at an end nearly two years after it had been granted) furnishes a

No. 161. his purpose in bringing the action was to obtain possession of a sum of £2000, which he averred was lodged in a bank in Scotland and belonged somewhat remarkable instance of the exercise of that exceptional judicial power. No such remedy could have been granted by the Court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction.

June 5, 1894.
Gibson v.
Munro.

"In this case there is no conclusion that the decree of reduction should be recorded in the Register of Sequestrations and Inhibitions, and as the statute does not authorise any such entry the result would be that the award of sequestration would appear in these registers, but not the decree of reduction if it were pronounced. If the statute had contemplated a reduction it would, no doubt, have provided for the registration of the decree.

"I hesitate to say, and it is unnecessary to do so, that these reasons would cover all cases which might be imagined. It is perhaps possible that a sequestration might be granted in such circumstances as to take it out of the Act altogether. For example, if an award were obtained through false personation, there might be room for an action of declarator that there had been no real sequestration. Possibly also some remedy might be devised in a case where it appeared that a sequestration had been obtained by fraud. It is not necessary to determine that.

"3. There is no adequate ground for reduction stated supposing reduction had been competent. It was argued that an award of sequestration is utterly incompetent, and a total nullity when another bankruptcy is pending elsewhere,—a proposition which was sought to be supported by reference to Young v. Buckle, 17th May 1864, 2 Macph. 1077; Goetze v. Aders, 27th November 1874, 2 R. 150; Phosphate Sewage Company v. Dawson, 20th July 1878, 5 R. 1125; Okel v. Foden, 11th June 1884, 11 R. 907, and earlier cases there referred to. The language employed in some of these cases was certainly very general. But I doubt whether the pursuer's proposition can be affirmed in absolute and unqualified terms. It is true that the existence of a bankruptcy elsewhere would be, if not always, yet generally, a sufficient reason for refusing a petition for sequestration or for recalling a sequestration. The defender argued that this resulted from rules of international comity, and not because the second sequestration would be incompetent. There are, however, opinions of very great authority which seem to go further than that, and I doubt whether our rule or practice can be referred to comity alone. But still it does not follow that an award of sequestration granted in such circumstances would be a nullity incapable of producing any consequence. It may also be true that a trustee in a bankruptcy has a universal title covering the whole estate, that there cannot be a partial bankruptcy, and that a second sequestration would be ineffectual to carry any part of the estates. If that be so it would appear that the Scotch sequestration can do the pursuer no harm. Still a sequestration has other consequences than the transference of the bankruptcy estate, and I think it has not been our practice to regard a second sequestration as wholly a nullity. It is of common occurrence that two petitions for sequestration of the same estate may be presented and granted, the earlier by a creditor, and the later by the bankrupt, and the more recent practice has apparently been to allow both awards of sequestration to subsist when that course appeared convenient—Tennent v. Martin & Dunlop, 6th March 1879, 6 R. 786; Fletcher v. Anderson, 30th March 1883, 10 R. 835. I do not think it has been decided that an award of sequestration or adjudication in bankruptcy deprives a Judge before whom a second petition is presented of jurisdiction; and I think that when the bankrupt—being undoubtedly a Scotsman—presented his petition in the Bill-Chamber, the Lord Ordinary had jurisdiction to entertain it, and having such jurisdiction, could (if not made aware of the English bankruptcy) do nothing but grant it. He may have acted under ignorance of the English bankruptcy, and therefore in error, but I see no ground on which that error can be corrected at this date.

"4. As I have said, I think I am entitled to assume that the English trustee knew of the proceedings in Scotland. Since the decree of sequestration many interests may have been affected by it, of which I have no information, and to the bankrupt, and that he did not propose that the proceedings in the sequestration should be set aside except in so far as they might be a bar to the recovery of this sum. In answer to the Court, counsel for the pursuer further stated that he did not desire to call any other defenders, but asked for decree on the record as it stood. No. 161.

Gibson v. Munro.

Argued for the pursuer;—The sequestration ought to be reduced on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to award it, there having been at the date of the award an existing liquidation in England of the estates of the bankrupt. A sequestration in Scotland was funditus null if at the date when it was awarded there was a pending liquidation of the debtor's estates in the Courts of another civilised country;¹ at all events a sequestration in Scotland was null if there was a pending English liquidation, since that was regulated by an Act of the British Parliament which the Scots Courts were bound to recognise.

Argued for the defender;—Reduction of the sequestration of a bankrupt's estates was incompetent, the Bankruptcy Acts having made no provision for such a proceeding. Assuming that reduction of a sequestration was competent in certain cases, the present action was not of that class. The sole ground of reduction was that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills who awarded sequestration had no jurisdiction to do so, by reason of a liquidation in England of the debtor's estates, which the pursuer said was then in dependence. But the dependence of a liquidation in England, or in any other country, did not affect the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts to grant sequestration, if that jurisdiction was otherwise well founded. The true plea was forum non conveniens, not no jurisdiction, and that plea must be stated within the period allowed by the statute for the recall of a sequestration, and as a ground for not granting sequestration or for recalling it. It was not a relevant ground for reduction of the sequestration. It was not a question of jurisdiction; it was a question for the discretion of the Court whether the existence of bankruptcy proceedings in another country was a ground for refusing, or terminating, a sequestration in this country.² In any case, the trustee was not the only defender necessary to be called in an action like the present. The pursuer now said that he did not propose to interfere with the proceedings that had already taken place in the sequestration.

there may be various rights dependent on the sequestration. Various legal proceedings have taken place (all of them were probably, and some of them certainly known to the English trustee), in which the validity of the sequestration was assumed or decided. I consider that in these circumstances this action is met by the pleas of personal bar and mora.

"5. The pursuer has stated no interest to reduce the decree of sequestration. If he has none it would, in my opinion, be out of the question to grant a decree of reduction, of the consequences of which one cannot be assured. In the argument for the pursuer it was said that he contemplated proceedings against the Scotch trustees. Had these been indicated on the record, the relevancy of the pursuer's claims would have been discussed, and if they were found irrelevant the result would have been absolutor from the whole conclusions. It seems to me that this case must be taken on the footing that he has no such claims. X

"I, therefore, am of opinion that I am in a position to repel the whole pleas of the pursuer, and to sustain the second, fourth, eighth, and ninth pleas for the defender, C. J. Munro, so far as these refer to the decree of sequestration."

Assuming that the effect of decree of reduction could be so limited, the trustee had no interest to defend, his only interest being that he should not be treated as a vitious intromitter. But the pursuer asked for decree on record as it stood, and if such a decree were pronounced, other persons,—creditors of the bankrupt for example,—might take advantage of it. The defender, on the assumption of the sequestration being reduced, would not represent the creditors. All parties therefore had not been called.

LORD YOUNG.—This case, as the Lord Ordinary says, is unprecedented in this respect, that it is the first instance that has occurred in which a pursuer seeks to reduce an award of sequestration and all the proceedings that have followed on that award, and I hope it will be the last.

The statute under which all awards of sequestration in bankruptcy in this country are granted is the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. By the 13th section of that statute it is enacted that “sequestration may be awarded of the estate of any person in the following cases :—1st, In the case of a living debtor subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland (a) on his own petition with the concurrence of a creditor or creditors qualified as hereinafter mentioned”; and then follow other cases to which I need not now refer. In the case before us sequestration was granted of the estate of a man named Robertson, who was subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland, on his own petition, and with the concurrence of a creditor named. Therefore, prima facie, there is no doubt of the competency of the application for sequestration, or of the jurisdiction of the Court to grant it, and it was granted accordingly in 1885. It is no part of the pursuer’s case in this action that in the granting or carrying on of this sequestration anything was done which was not in all respects regular and according to the requirements of the statute. The proper advertisements were made, a trustee was appointed, the estate was ingathered and distributed among the debtor’s creditors, and the trustee was discharged; but now in 1893 this reduction of the award of sequestration, and of all the proceedings that have followed on it, is brought without any previous notice, and that on the ground that the estate of the bankrupt had been put into liquidation in England in 1881, so that eight years after the granting of the Scots sequestration it is for the first time challenged on the ground of an ex parte proceeding in England thirteen years before, and the ground of the challenge is that by the common law of Scotland it was incompetent for the Courts in Scotland to apply the provisions of the Scots Bankruptcy Act in the case of a debtor domiciled in Scotland, and to grant sequestration of his estates, when proceedings in liquidation were pending against him in any other country.

The Lord Ordinary expresses some doubt as to whether a real process of liquidation in England existed with reference to this debtor’s estate, but he assumes, and I will also assume, that if this case went to proof the pursuer could establish that such a liquidation was technically in subsistence in 1885 when the sequestration was awarded. Now, on that assumption, the question is, whether we are to entertain an action for the reduction of an award of sequestration on the mere statement of the existence of these liquidation proceedings at the time the sequestration was granted without any averment that any assets had been recovered under the liquidation, or that anything had ever been done in it except the appointment of four trustees in succession. There is no averment that they were ignorant of the proceedings in this country, and there is no explanation of the delay in bringing this action until after the estate of the bankrupt has been ingathered and distributed, and the trustee discharged. No. 161.

 For my own part, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that such an action cannot be entertained.

 Gibson v.
 Munro.

I quite understand the view,—indeed I hold the law to be quite settled,—that the Court, in carrying out the Act of 1856, will not, as a matter of course, award sequestration, if, in answer to the advertisements in the Gazette for which the Act makes careful provision, or from any other source, it is brought under the notice of the Court that prior to the application in Scotland proceedings have been begun in England under which the estate of the bankrupt may be ingathered and distributed. Again, if sequestration has been granted and notice of the previous application in England is given to the Court within the period allowed by the statute for stating objections, I do not doubt that the Court, if it sees fit, may recall the sequestration. But that is a totally different thing from reducing the whole proceedings as null and incompetent from the beginning on the ground of want of jurisdiction to grant the sequestration, and that although the case may be represented as an instance of one in which the Court ought not to have granted, or ought to have recalled, the sequestration, if an application for either of these purposes had been made timeously. In short, the pursuer of an action such as we have here stands necessarily upon a rule of the common law, or of international law, and the rules of international law, and the considerations of comity and courtesy upon which they are based are part of the common law of the civilised world.

Now, the rule of international law on this matter is, I have no doubt, that which was expressed by the learned Judges in England in one of the cases cited to us,—Ex parte Robinson, L. R., 22 Ch. Div. 816,—to the effect that the Courts of each country have jurisdiction to liquidate the affairs of debtors within their jurisdiction, notwithstanding the existence of a liquidation process in another country, although in their discretion they may decline to exercise that jurisdiction on account of the existence of the proceeding in the other country directed to the same end. I think it is the same with us. I have no doubt that this Court has jurisdiction to award sequestration for all the purposes it may effect, notwithstanding the fact that a liquidation process has been begun in another country with respect to the same debtor's estates, if the Court sees fit to use its discretion by granting sequestration, or the Court may, if it sees fit, refuse to award sequestration. But to ask the Court to refuse to award sequestration is a very different thing from the creditors waiting until after the sequestration has been granted, and the estates of the debtor ingathered and distributed, and then coming forward and asking that the whole proceedings should be set aside as null on account of want of jurisdiction, and that without giving explanation of the delay or suggesting any reason for ignorance of the Scots proceedings. I have no doubt that we have jurisdiction, and when Lord Trayner, as Lord Ordinary on the Bills, granted this sequestration, I have no doubt that he had jurisdiction, and if the circumstances which have now been mentioned to us had been brought under his notice he would have considered them, and his judgment might have been brought under the review of the Inner-House on the merits. But in all this the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House would have been exercising their jurisdiction, although it may be that had the circumstances which have now been mentioned been brought under the notice of the Court upon the application for sequestration that jurisdiction would have been exercised differently, and sequestration refused, or, it may be,

No. 161. recalled if it had been granted, and a petition for recall had been timeously presented.

Gibson v.
Munro.

In this case, however, apart from that view, and without going the whole length of the opinion which I have just expressed, I think that the action may be decided upon the consideration that it is an action against the trustee in bankruptcy, an officer of this Court, brought when he has done all that he was empowered to do, and is discharged of his office by the Court, and brought upon the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to appoint him originally. I think that such an action is altogether out of the question. I do not mean to say that I cannot figure an action which might competently be brought against an officer of Court. I can imagine the case of a pursuer coming forward and saying that he wanted to have the whole proceedings in a sequestration reduced on the ground of something which the officer himself had done, and which had the effect of making the whole proceedings null, and the officer himself a vitious intromitter with the estate. But there is no suggestion here that this trustee acted otherwise than regularly and within the scope of his duties, and he has been discharged. There is no suggestion that he is liable to give any other account of his intromissions than that which he has given, and from which he has been discharged. The proposition, however, is that he can competently be made the defender of this action of reduction, the purpose of which is to set aside the whole proceedings as null ab initio, on the ground of want of jurisdiction. I think that that is altogether out of the question.

It may be quite competent for the pursuer here, or for anyone else who is pursuing a remedy to which a discharged sequestration may be set up as a defence, to bring a reduction of the award of sequestration, but then such a reduction must be brought upon relevant grounds. It was stated at the bar that there was a sum of money in a bank which the trustee in the English sequestration wished to get hold of, and it was said that if the bank were asked to hand over the money they would put forward the Scots sequestration as a bar to doing so. But it has not been ascertained that the bank has in fact taken up this position. The proper course would have been to make a judicial claim on the bank, and if the bank in defence pleaded the sequestration then it might be stated as an answer to this defence that the sequestration ought not to have the effect contended for because of the existence of the prior English liquidation. But the bank is not here, and I confess that I am not a little surprised that this discharged trustee took any notice of the action at all. I think that he might have wrapped himself in his cloak of office and said,—“I was appointed by the Court, I have been discharged by the Court, and it is not said that I did anything wrong in the conduct of the business entrusted to me. All that is said is that the Court which appointed me had no jurisdiction to do so. But I am not the guardian of the jurisdiction of the Court. I assumed that they had jurisdiction when they appointed me.” I am, therefore, for repelling generally the reasons of reduction here stated against this trustee.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This is an action of reduction of an award of sequestration and all that followed on it. The defender is the last trustee appointed under the sequestration, and before this action was raised he was discharged. On a question being put by the Court, the pursuer's counsel stated that he desired judgment upon the record as it stands and without calling any other defender.

I think we must dismiss the action. I doubt if a discharged trustee is the proper defender. I am clear that he is not the only person that should be called.

LORD TRAYNER.—The Lord Ordinary has expressed his opinion on several points in this case, regarding which I shall merely say that I am not to be held as concurring in them. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary in this, that the pursuer has not stated in his record any interest to prosecute this reduction. The only interest stated at the bar which the pursuer had to reduce the sequestration, assuming that interest to exist, is one with which the defender Mr Munro has no concern. The only interest therefore which is pretended is one in reference to which the pursuer has not called the proper contradictors. On this point I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with Lord Trayner.

No. 162.

Trust—Sale of heritage by trustee without authority of the Court—Confirmation of sale—Nobile Officium—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 3.—A trustee acting under a trust-disposition and settlement which contained no power to sell heritage sold a part of the trust-estate without having first obtained the authority of the Court. The purchaser having objected to the title offered by the trustee, the latter presented a petition craving the Court "to approve, ratify, and confirm" the sale. The Court refused the petition.

THIS was a petition presented by James Clyne, the sole acting trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of George Sinclair Waters, in which he craved the Court to "approve, ratify, and confirm" the sale of a property called Thuspister, forming part of the trust-estate, which he had sold by public roup to Alexander Clyne.

The petitioner stated that the purchaser had taken exception to the title offered to him, on the ground that the petitioner had no power to sell heritage. The petitioner admitted that the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr Waters contained no power of sale, and explained that he had omitted per incuriam, and in ignorance of the necessity for it, to obtain the authority of the Court before exposing the subjects. He further explained that he was unable to obtain the consent of all the beneficiaries interested in the trust-estate, as some of these were in minority, but that all those who were major approved of the sale, and were consenters to the petition.

He further stated that the sale of the property in question was expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof.

The petitioner, in these circumstances, submitted that as the Court would have empowered him to sell had he duly presented a petition for authority to do so,* and as the sale was otherwise unexceptionable, he Clyne.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is impossible for us to grant the prayer of this petition, for the reasons which have been indicated in the course of the argument. But while I think that we should refuse the petition, it may be open to the parties, if they can free themselves of the existing contract, to come back to the Court with an application for authority to sell.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that we must refuse the prayer of this petition for the reason that, ex facie of the decree which we are asked to grant, all objections to the sale founded on grounds distinct from the question of power to sell would be excluded. That being so, it appears to me that the confirmation which we are asked to grant would itself be reducible at the instance of a beneficiary who might wish to challenge the sale on extrinsic grounds. I agree with the suggestion made by your Lordship, that the only way of working out the remedy desired is probably for the parties to make an application for authority to sell, when it might possibly be given in such terms as would enable the trustee to give a valid and otherwise sufficient title.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. The Court may enlarge the powers of trustees by authorising them to sell, and this appears to be a case in which we should have had little difficulty in giving that authority. But the validity of any sale which they may have carried through in the exercise of their powers may depend upon other considerations. We cannot, in this form, determine that a sale which trustees have already carried into effect is good or bad.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

Issue—Counter Issue—Reparation—Slander—Veritas.—In an action of damages for slander brought by an elder against a parish minister, the pursuer obtained an issue whether certain statements made by the defender on 16th July 1893 falsely and calumniously represented "that the pursuer was addicted to taking strong drink to excess, and that this was notorious to the parishioners. . . ." The defender who pleaded veritas, and set forth on record a number of occasions, giving dates and places, from 1887 onwards, on which he alleged that the pursuer had been intoxicated, proposed a counter issue in general terms. The Court, having regard to the specific averments on record to which the proof would be limited, allowed the counter issue.

1ST DIVISION. In March 1894 John Hunter, carrier and carting contractor, Carsphairn, raised an action of damages for slander against the Reverend George F. A. MacNaughton, assistant minister of the parish of Carsphairn. The tees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust and not inconsistent with the intention thereof. . . .

"1. To sell the trust-estate or any part thereof."

pursuer stated that he was, and had been for upwards of five years, an elder of the parish church, and that the defender had on Sunday, the 16th July 1893, in the parish church, and in the presence and hearing of the congregation—several of whom he specified—made the following intimation with reference to the absence of the pursuer from the Communion service on that day:—"All present know the sad cause of the absence of one of my elders from his place this day, but I trust every member of the church will consider it to be his duty now, both by example and in every other possible way, to strengthen and encourage him to fight against his enemy."

Hunter v.
MacNaughton.

He further averred;—"The said statements . . . falsely and calumniously . . . represent that the absence of the pursuer from the Communion service on Sunday, 16th July 1893, was due to intoxication, and that he was in such a state of intoxication on that day that he was unable to attend church. Further, the said statements . . . represent that the pursuer was guilty of conduct unbecoming his position of an elder in the church and of his character of a christian man; that the pursuer was accustomed to drink intoxicating liquors to excess; that he was an habitual drunkard; and that his character as a drunkard was notorious and was known to all the members of the congregation and inhabitants of the parish. The whole of said charges against the pursuer are false and unfounded."

The defender admitted that he had made the statements complained of, and that they were of and concerning the pursuer, and represented "that he had on recent occasions been taking intoxicating liquor to excess, and that this failing was known to the congregation and inhabitants of the parish of Carsphairn." He further averred that the statements were true, and specified thirteen different occasions from November 1887 onwards, giving the dates and places, on which he alleged that the pursuer "was seen either quite intoxicated or at all events affected with drink to a degree most unbecoming in an office-bearer of the Church."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defences being irrelevant . . . should be repelled.

The defender pleaded;—(2) Veritas.

The pursuer proposed the following issues:—" (1) Whether on Sunday, 16th July 1893, in the course of the Communion service in the parish church of Carsphairn, and in the presence and hearing of the congregation then and there assembled, including William Buck and Mrs Isabella Hunter or Buck, both residing at Brockloch Cottage, Carsphairn; James Hunter, Legget, Carsphairn, and others, the defender did say,—'All present know the sad cause of the absence of one of my elders from his place this day, but I trust every member of the church will consider it to be his duty now, both by example and in every other possible way, to strengthen and encourage him to fight against his enemy,' or did use other or similar words of like import and effect? Whether the said statements are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer's absence from the Communion service on said Sunday was due to intoxication, and that the pursuer was in such a state of intoxication on said Sunday that he was unable to attend church, or make similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? (2) Whether the said statements are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer was addicted to taking strong drink to excess, and that this was notorious to the parishioners of the said parish of Carsphairn, or make similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

Hunter v.
MacNaughton.

The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"Whether the pursuer, from November 1887 downwards, was addicted to taking strong drink to excess, and whether this was notorious among the parishioners and congregation of Carsphairn?"

On 22d May 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) approved of the issues for the pursuer, and disallowed the counter issue proposed by the defender.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The counter issue if taken along with the record exactly met the pursuer's issues. To adopt the course of specifying in the counter issue itself, or in a series of counter issues, all the particular occasions of intoxication which were already mentioned on record would be cumbrous and inconvenient. It was conceded that the defender was restricted to proving the instances specified by him on record. A counter issue, therefore, in general terms was sufficient,¹ especially as the defender had put in issue both the "addiction to drink" and "notoriety." The instances specified were relevant to raise the question of habit.

Argued for the pursuer;—The counter issue was too vague and indefinite.² It should state times and places, otherwise the pursuer had no notice of what particular incidents affecting his character he was called upon to explain. Further, there was no foundation on record for a general counter issue of "addiction." The several specific and isolated occasions on which during several years it was alleged the pursuer had been intoxicated could not instruct a habit. Aird's case was quite different, for there habitual and constant intoxication for some months was put in issue.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If we were to regard the counter issue apart from the record I should be of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, because there are no occasions specified in the issue, and of course it would be out of the question to send a person to trial on a question of character without giving him notice of the occasions upon which the accusation is based.

But the record gives notice of a number of specific occasions; and, that being so, the question seems to be one merely of practice or procedure,—whether notice having been given on record of the specific instances which are founded on to prove habitual drunkenness it is necessary to repeat these in asking the jury whether there existed that habit. It would seem more consistent with our modern general practice to allow the issue to stand in general terms, the specific occasions legitimately falling within the inquiry being those of which notice has been given on record.

The only other question appears to be whether the record contains a relevant averment of "addiction." Now it is hardly fair, I think, to represent that question as being the same as this, whether given nine or ten instances of intoxication, that is enough of itself to instruct the habit. The jury would be entitled to consider the circumstances of each occasion, and to draw their own inferences as to whether they were specimens of the habit, or whether the cases which turn out to be proved were isolated and pardonable instances of this gentleman being overtaken. Therefore, I think, the question being a proper jury question, and the record containing a sufficient amount of specific notice to support the general averment, and the jury being entitled to draw their own inferences as to the representative character of the specific occasions, that the record is quite sufficient for its purpose.

* "OPINION.—The Lord Ordinary has disallowed the counter issue proposed by the defender in respect that it does not specify the occasions on which the pursuer is alleged to have taken strong drink to excess."

I therefore think that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it disallows this counter issue, and approve of the issues and counter issue as the issues for the trial of the cause. Much has been said as to what will take place at the trial in consequence of the pursuer involving himself in the question of notoriety; but these are matters which will extricate themselves, or be extricated by the Judge at the trial, and do not affect the question which we have now to determine.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary so far as it disallowed the counter issue proposed by the defender, and allowed the counter issue, &c.

Scott v. Scott.

Husband and Wife—Aliment—Voluntary separation—Parent and Child.—Under a voluntary deed of separation and aliment, dated in August 1891, a wife was entitled to the income of £1000 vested by the husband in trustees. In October 1891 the wife gave birth to a daughter, and in May 1893 an action was raised in name of the daughter, with her mother's concurrence, against the father for aliment. In this action the pursuer alleged that no provision had been made for her aliment, and that her father was possessed of between £2000 and £3000.

Held (1) that the action was to be regarded as an application by the mother for additional aliment; (2) that the agreement made in August 1891 must be held to have been made in contemplation of the birth of the child; and (3) that no relevant ground had been stated for giving additional aliment.

Observations on the proportion of a husband's income which the Court will allow to a wife living separate from him.

IN June 1891 Mrs Rachel Scott raised an action of separation and aliment against her husband, Thomas Scott, but in August an arrangement was come to by the parties to the following effect:—By a minute of agreement, dated 4th and 6th August 1891, First, Mrs Scott, in respect of the provisions in her favour contained in a separate trust-disposition after mentioned, agreed to abandon the action of separation and aliment: Second, Mr Scott having undertaken to conduct himself as a husband should, Mrs Scott agreed to resume cohabitation with him, "but specially declaring that it shall be left to" her option "to choose her own residence, in respect she declines to reside in Jedburgh with the family of the second party by a previous marriage": Third, In the event of the second party failing so to conduct himself, which shall again necessitate the first party separating from her husband, she shall be entitled to apply to the Court for a decree of judicial separation and of aliment, and the Court in awarding aliment shall be entitled to

June 6, 1894.
Scott v. Scott.

By the trust-disposition dated 4th August 1891, Mr Scott conveyed to trustees the sum of £1100, for, inter alia, the following purposes:—First, that the trustees should pay the annual income of the fund to Mrs Scott so long as she should live with the truster. "Said annual income to be applied by her pro tanto towards the upkeep of the household, including her wearing apparel and the maintenance of her paraphernalia": Second, that the trustees should have power to purchase furniture to the extent of £100 out of the funds vested in them to furnish any residence which Mrs Scott should choose: Third, Said trustees shall pay over the remainder of the annual income or produce of the remaining £1000 during all the days of her life for her liferent use alienably." The fourth purpose provided for the trust coming to an end on the death of the wife.

It appeared that shortly after the foregoing arrangement was come to Mrs Scott took up a separate residence from her husband.

On 17th October 1891 Mrs Scott gave birth to a daughter, who lived with and was brought up by her.

In May 1893 an action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh at the instance of the child, with the consent and concurrence of her mother Mrs Scott, against Mr Scott, concluding, inter alia, for aliment at the rate of £1, 5s. a-month.

The pursuer averred that from the date of her birth the defender had made no provision whatever for her upbringing and keep, and that he was possessed of between £2000 and £3000.

The defender denied these averments, referred to the above-mentioned deeds as containing ample provision for the pursuer, and offered "to receive the child in family, and to support and maintain her."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender being the father of pursuer, and she being in pupillarity, is bound to contribute towards her aliment and upbringing.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The action is irrelevant. (4) The defender being entitled and willing to support and maintain the pursuer in family, should be assoilzied. (5) The defender and the pursuer's mother having entered into an arrangement for the support of the household, and the defender having implemented his part thereof, and being willing to implement it, should be assoilzied.

After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Spiers), on 19th October 1893, sustained the fourth plea in law of the defender, and assoilzied him. In the course of the proof the Sheriff-substitute disallowed certain questions put with the view of ascertaining the amount of the defender's estate prior to the raising of the action. The defender deponed, inter alia, that he had no estate, and was being kept by his family by his first wife.

The pursuer appealed, and on 24th January 1894 the Sheriff sustained the appeal, and, inter alia, decerned against the defender for the sum of £1 per month.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The offer made by the defender to take the child into family was a conclusive answer to the pursuer's demand. The age of the child made no difference,¹ and it was not suggested on record that its interests would be prejudiced. Poverty did not deprive a father of his legal right.² But further, the provision in the trust-deed was intended for both mother and child, the birth of the latter having been contemplated by the parties, and it was amply sufficient. There had been no change of circumstances which would warrant the Court altering the deliberate arrangement of the parties. No. 164.

June 6, 1894.
Scott v. Scott.

Argued for the pursuer;—The question of the custody of a child was always one of circumstances. An offer to receive into family, if not made in bona fide, must be disregarded.¹ The defender's offer was manifestly not in bona fide, for he was unable to implement it, having, according to his own statement, neither home nor money. The mother, moreover, was the appropriate custodian of an infant child. As regarded the provision in the trust-deed, the birth of a child was not contemplated at the time it was made. It was intended for the wife alone, one-third being the usual proportion of a husband's income allowed to a wife justified in living separate from him. The birth of the child entitled her to an additional aliment for it.² The pursuer should be allowed to prove that the defender had between £2000 and £3000, for questions directly bearing on that had been improperly disallowed by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The spouses here entered into an agreement making arrangements for their living apart. The agreement, so far as money was concerned, was that the husband should assign to trustees the sum of £1100, and the purpose of the trust, which applies to the existing state of matters,—that, namely, of the spouses living apart,—is that the trustees should have power to purchase furniture to the extent of £100 out of the funds vested in them for any residence which the wife should choose, and the income of the remaining £1000 was to be applied to the life rent use of the wife. Now, it is important to observe that the agreement was come to on the 4th August 1891, and that the child was born on the 17th October following, or little more than two months afterwards. In these circumstances it must, I think, be taken, that when the parties separated they knew that a child was shortly to be born, and made their arrangements with that contingency in prospect. The child now comes forward in form to claim aliment. It is manifest, however, that the application is really that of the wife, and she raises the question whether she is entitled, now that the child is born, to get more than the income of the fund vested in trustees for her behoof. She says that her husband has, over and above that fund, from £2000 to £3000, and for the purposes of the present case I assume that he has that amount. The question is whether, assuming that the mother is right in her estimate of her husband's means we are to grant her additional aliment in consequence of the birth of the child, the nominal pursuer of the action. Now, even supposing that this was a matter not provided for in the agreement, it is manifest that a small increment only is all that could reasonably be suggested by the wife. But when the facts shew clearly that the parties at the date of the agreement not only contemplated living apart, but also the birth and existence of a child, I am not inclined to give even that small increase unless the amount already provided is palpably and grossly insufficient and disproportionate to the whole income of the husband. Now, on the wife's own statement of them the figures do not shew any such disproportion, and there is no case of necessity on the part of the child or the mother. I am therefore for recalling the Sheriff's interlocutor.

Scott v. Scott.

It will be observed that I do not at all proceed on the evidence of the state of the husband's means. If it were necessary to go into the facts there would be much to be said as to the right of the pursuer to obtain the evidence excluded by the Sheriff-substitute. But in what I have said I go, not on the evidence, but, on the pursuer's own averments.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action raised in name of an infant child, with the consent of its mother, to recover certain sums from the father, who is living apart from the mother. Although the action is in the name of the child it is undoubtedly raised in the interests of the mother. The spouses are living separate under a deed of arrangement. At the date of the agreement the birth of a child was imminent; the deed was executed in August, and the child was born in October, and no one can doubt that its birth was expected, and that the parties contemplated that if the mother were to live apart from the husband the child was to live with its mother, and not with its father. Accordingly, the sum of £1100 was set aside and vested in trustees to meet that contingency. That being so, and the sum set aside for the support of the mother and child being not less than one-third of the whole estate of the husband, we are now asked when the child is still an infant to open up the agreement of the parties and award a larger sum. I am not prepared to follow that course. There is no fixed proportion of the husband's income which the Court will allow, but only such as appears to it to be fitting in the whole circumstances of the case. Considering the position in life of the parties here the sum of £40 may be sufficient. In the case of other parties, or in different circumstances, it might not. There is the case of Hay, in which, in an action of separation and aliment, the wife obtained decree for £40 out of an income of £115. That seems to me a very liberal award, but there were special circumstances no doubt which led to its being given. But what followed there was this: A child was born after the decree was pronounced, and the Sheriff awarded a sum as aliment of the child. The Court sustained that award, although they fixed a somewhat smaller sum. But I observe that the Lord President, in giving the leading judgment, said,—“Very soon after this decree was pronounced,”—that is the decree for £40,—“the respondent, Mrs Hay, gave birth to a child, and that was a fact not before the Lord Ordinary, and the maintenance of the child could not be under his consideration in fixing the amount of aliment. The respondent in this appeal maintains that she is entitled to a sum for aliment of the child.” The difference between that case therefore and this is, that here we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the birth of the child was contemplated by the parties when they entered into the agreement. It is fair and reasonable therefore to consider that the matter of the child's aliment was then settled between them.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the summons itself were to be considered, I doubt whether the action could be maintained at all, because the summons is at the instance of the child, and it is proved that the child is being maintained by the mother—a person who is under a natural obligation to maintain it—so that there is no case of necessity calling for our interference in the interests of the child. But considered as an action by the mother against the father to have the latter ordained to contribute to the child's maintenance, I think that when the spouses entered into the contract of separation they had in view that a sum was to be allowed by the husband for the maintenance of the mother and also of the child during the time it should be properly under the mother's care. No. 164.

 But I also agree that, if that were doubtful, and the case were to be considered on its merits, we could not award a further sum without opening up the terms of the contract of separation, and considering whether the wife has not already received an allowance sufficient for the maintenance of herself and her child. June 6, 1894.
 So far as my own experience bears on that question, I am not aware of any case in which the Court has allowed the wife more than one-third of the income of the husband's estate in cases of judicial separation. One case was cited in which a small additional amount was allowed in case of the birth of a child after the date of the separation. If there is no legal limit to the amount of the allowance which may be made to the wife, there has been a practical limit to the income of such a share of the estate as the wife would take on the death of the husband. There are, however, many cases in which a smaller annuity would be suitable to the wife's position in life, and the wife is only entitled to such an amount as suits her position in life, and not to any certain proportion of the husband's estate. Here the husband, who is a retired tradesman, has made a provision as large, if not larger, than the law would give to his widow, and I do not think we should increase it. Scott v. Scott.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the action is in substance an action by the mother, because the mother is the proper claimant and proper creditor for the aliment of a child of two years.

Now, if we know that the parties had agreed that the aliment of the wife alone should be £40 a-year, and that in making this arrangement they had not contemplated the possibility of a child being born, then I should be disposed to consider whether, on the occurrence of this unexpected event, an additional allowance should be made to the mother for the child's support. But I agree that, when we look at the agreement with reference to its date and the circumstances in which it was concluded, it is impossible to doubt that the parties had the birth of the child in contemplation when they entered into it, and I think that, the parties having settled the matter for themselves, no sufficient ground has been stated for interfering with the arrangement they have made.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff dated 24th January 1894 and of the Sheriff-substitute dated 19th October 1893: Find that within three months prior to the birth of the pursuer, her mother and the defender entered into the agreement No 9 of process, and that the defender conveyed to trustees the sum of £1100 for the purposes set forth in the trust-disposition, No. 8 of process, referred to in the said agreement: Find that the pursuer's mother, with whom she lives, is in the enjoyment of the income provided under the said agreement for the event of her living (as she has done) separate from the defender: Find that the pursuer is at present being alimented by her mother: Find in law that the pursuer's averments as to the amount of the defender's means are not in the present circumstances found as matter of fact relevant to entitle her to a decree against him for aliment: Dismiss the petition, and decern."

MRS JESSIE B. A. ELLIOTT OR WOOD AND OTHERS (Elliott's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—*D. Dundas—Howden.*June 7, 1894.
Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.SIR WILLIAM F. A. ELLIOTT, BART., Defender (Respondent).—Watt—A. M. Anderson.

Lease—Invalid lease—Liability of tenant to implement obligations.—The lease of a mansion-house and shootings granted by trustees, after being acted on for fourteen years, was reduced on the ground that it had been ultra vires of the trustees to grant it. In an action of damages at their instance against the tenant, held that the tenant, who had had no other title of possession to the subjects, was bound by its terms during the period of his occupancy.

Lease—Game—Excessive stock of game—Claim for damages by landlord—Relevancy.—A lease of shootings gave the tenant the exclusive right to the game, including hares and rabbits, and bound the tenant to relieve the landlord of all claims which might be made by any of the agricultural tenants on account of damage sustained from the game, including hares and rabbits.

In an action by the landlord against the shooting tenant for damage alleged to have been caused to the estate by the tenant permitting an excessive and unreasonable stock of rabbits to remain upon it, the pursuer did not allege that any claims had been made against him by the agricultural tenants.

Held that the action was not relevant.

Kidd v. Byrne, Dec. 16, 1875, 3 R. 255, commented on.

Lease—Landlord's claim for damages—Mora.—Where, in the course of a lease for a term of years, a landlord considers that he is entitled to damages from his tenant, and where the tenant might be prejudiced in his defence through the loss of evidence, the landlord is bound, without delay, to give notice to his tenant of his claim, and of his intention to enforce it, otherwise he will be barred from doing so.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

SIR W. F. ELLIOTT of Stobs and Wells, by his settlement disposed the estate of Wells to trustees empowering them to let from year to year the mansion-house, policies, &c., and provided that during the subsistence of the trust it should be in their power to permit the institute in an entail executed by him to possess the mansion-house and policies, &c., "and that rent free, but only for such space as the said trustees should think proper."

In September 1879 the trustees entered into a lease with Sir William Francis Augustus Elliott, the institute, whereby they let to him the mansion-house of Wells, and "also the exclusive right to the game of every kind, including hares and rabbits, and of shooting and killing the same" on the estate "for the space of one year" from Whitsunday 1879, but renewable from year to year as after mentioned. It was further provided that unless the tenant gave six months' notice of his intention to remove, the lease should be held to be renewed for another year. No power was given to the trustees to bring the lease to an end. The lease contained the following clause:—"Further the said Sir William Francis Augustus Elliott, Baronet, binds and obliges himself and his foresaids during his occupation of the subjects hereby let to free and relieve the said trustees and their foresaids of all claims which may be made by any of the agricultural tenants upon the said estate of Wells and Easter Fodderlie against them for or on account of damage sustained by such tenants from the game, including hares and rabbits, upon the said estates, and to make good to the said trustees any loss which may arise to them in such claims."

In October 1892 the trustees raised an action for reduction of the lease against Sir William, and on 31st October 1893 the Court reduced the deed, on the ground that it was ultra vires of the trustees to grant it.

On 14th June 1892 the trustees raised the present action against Sir William, concluding for £600 in name of damages. No. 165.

They averred, inter alia ;—“ During his whole tenancy of Wells, and particularly since the year 1888, the defender has permitted an excessive and unreasonable stock of rabbits to remain upon the estate, whereby great injury and damage has been done to the estate. . . . The said excessive stock maintained on the estate has also had the effect of materially reducing the value for grazing purposes of certain grass parks which are annually let by the pursuers, and the rents obtained for them have in consequence fallen. The pursuers have repeatedly remonstrated with the defender, and have made application to him to remedy the present state of affairs and to reduce the number of rabbits upon the estate, but without avail.” June 7, 1894.
Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The defender having wrongfully, and in breach of the obligations incumbent on him as tenant of the shootings on the estates, kept upon the said estates an excessive and unreasonable stock of rabbits, and the same having been to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers, the defender is bound to make reparation to the pursuers in the premises.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The action is irrelevant.

On 1st December 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.*

* “ OPINION.— . . . The pursuers are the trustees on the estate of Wells, and it appears that so far back as 1879 they professed to let to the defender—on what was in substance a lifeferent lease, with a yearly break in the defender's favour—the mansion-house and shootings of the estate. The defender possessed under this lease until the other day, when, in an action at the pursuers' instance, the Court found that the lease in question was beyond the pursuers' powers, and therefore reduced it, and decerned the defender to remove. The pursuers now seek in the present action to recover damages from the defender to the extent of £600, in respect that since the date of the lease, and in particular since 1888, he permitted the stock of rabbits on the estate to increase beyond a reasonable stock, and also beyond the stock at the date of his entry.

“ I am unable to discover any legal ground on which the pursuers can base this claim. It has long been settled that in an agricultural lease, where the landlord reserves the game, and the tenant—being bound for a term longer or shorter—has no means of protecting himself against damage to his crops, the landlord is held bound as under an implied condition of the lease to prevent an increase of game beyond a reasonable stock, or at all events beyond the stock at the date of the lease—Wemyss v. Wilson, 10 D. 194. It is probably also settled that it is an implied condition of a lease of game to a game tenant that the latter shall not allow the stock of game to be increased to an extravagant extent—Kidd v. Byrne, 3 R. 255. But the obligation in question always rests, not upon delict, but upon contract ; and where there is no contract between the parties, it is not easy to see how such an obligation can be implied. In the present case the result of the recent judgment is that the defender is and has all along been a precarious possessor, occupying the house and shootings by tolerance, and liable to be dispossessed at the pursuers' pleasure. It does not appear to me that there is room under such a tenure—if tenure it can be called—for implying any undertaking by the defender with respect to the rabbits on the estate. If the defender failed to keep them down, the pursuers had the remedy in their own hands. They might at any time have protected themselves, or, if necessary, have given the defender notice to quit.

“ It may be suggested that the lease, although bad as a lease for a term of years, may be read as constituting a good yearly tenancy. I doubt whether this could be so without making in effect a new contract between the parties—a contract to which neither of them in fact consented. But even apart from that difficulty I do not, I confess, see how such a tenancy would help the

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—The defender had been for fourteen years tenant under a contract which both parties believed to be a valid lease, and was necessarily bound by its terms, for he had had no other title of possession. The defender therefore, as a game tenant, was not entitled to keep up more than a fair sporting stock of rabbits. That was an implied term of every game lease.¹ It was enough for the landlord to shew that he had suffered from the excessive stock.² There was a sufficient statement on record of an intimation of the claim of damages by the landlord to entitle the pursuers to a proof at least on that point.

Argued for the defender ;—The so-called lease having been ultra vires of the landlord was of no legal effect, and the defender therefore could not be bound by its terms, express or implied. The pursuers had acted illegally in granting it, and were not entitled to claim damages arising from their own illegal act. Assuming, however, that the defender was in the position of tenant under the lease, it contained no express stipulation about keeping down game. *Kidd v. Byrne*¹ was very special, and ought not to be followed. But further, no implied term of liability for game damage should be read into this lease, the extent of the defender's liability having been made matter of express contract between the parties, viz., to relieve the landlord of claims made by agricultural tenants. In these circumstances, therefore, as it was not averred that any claims had been made by the agricultural tenants, the action was irrelevant. In any view, the pursuers were barred by mora, for the most they had done, according to their own statement, was to grumble. That was not enough to warrant an action many years after the alleged injury had been done.³

LORD ADAM.—This is an action at the instance of the trustees of the estate of Wells, and it is brought under somewhat peculiar circumstances. The defender has been in possession of the mansion-house and shootings on that estate for the last fourteen years. His title to possession was a certain document, as it is now called in the third article of the condescendence, in the form of a lease, dated in September 1879, by which the pursuers the trustees let to him "All and Whole the mansion-house of Wells, with the garden, office-houses, orchards, and policy thereto belonging," and "also the exclusive right of fishing in the River Rule and its tributaries," and "also the exclusive right to the game of every kind, including hares and rabbits, and of shooting and killing the same on the said estates." Then the record goes on to say that it was provided by the lease that "the said Sir William Francis Augustus Elliott, Bart., binds and obliges himself and his foresaids during his occupation of the subjects hereby let to free and relieve the said trustees and their foresaids of all claims which may be made by any of the agricultural tenants upon the said estate of Wells and Easter Fodderlie against them for or on account of damage sustained by such tenants from the game, including hares and rabbits upon the pursuers' case. The pursuers had the opportunity at the end of each year of terminating the tenancy. Each year's increase must therefore have founded a separate claim of damage. That being so, and no such claim having been either enforced or reserved during the whole period of fourteen years, I do not, I confess, see how it can now be maintained.

"I therefore propose to pronounce an interlocutor sustaining the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissing the action."

said estates, and to make good to the said trustees any loss which may arise to them in such claims." No. 165.

That was the condition on which Sir William Elliott was in possession of this shooting. He paid no rent. He was the heir of entail under the trust, and the trustees were not entitled to give him possession of the shootings rent free. However, the trustees did let to him the shootings on the estate without exacting any rent in return. An action was raised in this Court in which that lease, under which Sir William Elliott was in possession of this estate, has been reduced, and he has been obliged, as I understand, to leave the mansion-house and shootings. It was during the dependence of that action that the present action was brought by the trustees. The ground of this action is that during his tenancy of the shootings the defender allowed the rabbits on the estate, which at the time of his entry were a reasonable stock, to increase to an excessive and unreasonable extent, whereby great injury and damage has been done to the estate. Then the pursuers go on to say, "In particular the rabbits have destroyed a great number of trees upon the estate," and add that the grazing parks which are let annually have been reduced in value. It will be observed that it is not said anywhere on this record that any of the agricultural tenants have made claims for injury to them by this alleged excessive amount of game and rabbits, of which claims Sir William was bound to relieve them. The amount of damages asked for is the sum of £600, and I beg further to call your Lordships' notice to the fact that this claim goes back to 1886, and that the damage is said to have occurred and accumulated from that year down to the present date. It is not said that any express intimation was made to Sir William that the trustees would hold him liable for any damage that might be done, or anything of that sort. All that is said upon that matter is,—“The pursuers have repeatedly remonstrated with the defender and have made application to him to remedy the present state of affairs, and to reduce the number of rabbits upon the estate, but without avail,” and as we have previously held, such a statement as that amounts to nothing more than a mere grumble. We have in cases of a tenant's claim against a landlord held that the tenant must make a distinct intimation and claim upon the landlord, and that he is not to allow such claims to run up and then insist upon damages. If that be so in the case of a claim by a tenant upon a landlord, it appears to me that the same principle applies in the case of a claim by a landlord against his tenant.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender, and apparently he has gone upon this ground, that the Court having reduced the document or lease under which Sir William possessed, the effect of that decision was to put Sir William into the position of having been a precarious possessor, that he was not bound by any of the conditions in the document under which he possessed, and that he is to be treated as being under no obligations or conditions at all. Now, I cannot altogether agree with the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of the case in that respect. There is no doubt at all that Sir William's title to the possession of the mansion-house and shootings was this document, and he beyond doubt did possess under it, and I do not think a tenant is entitled to dispute the document which is his only title to possession. I think myself that although this document was ultimately reduced as ultra vires of the trustees, it was upon the terms and conditions contained in it that Sir William was in possession of the estate and shootings, and that this case must be considered in that light.

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

No. 165.

June 7, 1894.
Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

But considering it in that light, I am still of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, and upon this ground: It will be observed that the right given to the defender is the exclusive right to game of every kind, including hares and rabbits, and of shooting and killing the same on the estates. Now, everybody knows that it is the interest of a shooting tenant to have as large a stock of game and rabbits as he can have upon the estate. The larger the stock the more sport he has. Accordingly, if landlords and tenants act in this view, we must consider Sir William in the position of a tenant and the trustees as his landlord. Landlords and tenants usually stipulate for mutual protection in that matter. A common course on the part of the landlord, if he is afraid that the tenant will injure his property by encouraging too many rabbits or hares, is to take the tenant bound to keep them down. That is a very common clause in sporting leases, with this further condition, that if the tenant does not keep them down the landlord will be entitled to enter upon the estate and protect himself. Another very common provision is—and we find it in this lease—that the shooting tenant will relieve the landlord of all claims of damages by the agricultural tenants. These are the ways in which landlords and tenants of shooting leases protect themselves, and the point I am coming to is this, that the parties to this lease or to this document, as the pursuers call it, have contracted with each other as to the protection which the landlord was to have in regard to game, because there is a special clause dealing with that very matter to the effect that the tenant shall relieve the landlord of claims of damages by the agricultural tenants. If they have dealt with this matter in that lease, and have provided a certain protection to the landlord, are we to imply—for it comes to implication—that the landlord is entitled to have additional protection beyond that which the parties have made a matter of contract? That is actually the pursuers' case. They say, no doubt, we have that stipulation for our protection, but we want another and implied condition. I do not know what is meant—that the tenant shall keep only a fair and reasonable stock of game upon the estate. They want us to read into the lease a clause of that sort. In my opinion the parties have dealt with this matter, and having dealt with it specially, we are not entitled to imply further conditions.

That differentiates this case from the case we were referred to by the Lord Ordinary of Kidd v. Byrne, 3 R. 255. I cannot altogether appreciate that case, because I do not quite understand what in the eyes of a shooting tenant is a fair and reasonable amount of game, but nevertheless it was decided in that case, there being no stipulation whatever, and the matter of game not being dealt with at all in the lease, that it was to be implied that the shooting tenant was not entitled to keep more than a fair amount of game, whatever that may be. But that case is different from this in the way I have pointed out, namely, that the amount of protection to be given to the landlord is dealt with in this case. Therefore I do not think that it is an authority to regulate this case.

Then the Lord Ordinary says,—“But even apart from that difficulty I do not, I confess, see how such a tenancy would help the pursuers' case. The pursuers had the opportunity at the end of each year of terminating the tenancy. Each year's increase must therefore have founded a separate claim of damage. That being so, and no such claim having been either enforced or reserved during the whole period of fourteen years, I do not, I confess, see how it can now be maintained.” I do not see either how after this long delay the pursuers' claim can now be insisted in. How can a tenant defend himself against a claim brought for the first time now as to the state of the trees in these woods seven or eight years ago? I suppose nobody living could say what the state of the trees was seven or eight years ago. Yet that is what the pursuers propose the tenant should be bound to do. I agree with the Lord Ordinary on that point also, that this claim,—if it was a good claim,—is barred by mora.

Elliott's Trustees v. Elliott.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is one of the rare cases where it is possible to do justice so as to give perfect satisfaction to all the parties concerned, because I presume it is not the intention of these trustees to act the part of the cruel stepmother to the gentleman whose interests are under their charge, but they are really trustees for creditors, and as such feel under obligation to collect every asset that might possibly fall into their trust. I have no doubt it was very much against their own inclinations that this claim was put forward.

The claim of damages arises out of a lease of the mansion-house and shootings which was granted by the trustees of Sir William Elliott's father to him in the supposed exercise of powers conferred by his settlement. The lease has been reduced, and the Lord Ordinary has disposed of the case upon the principle that there never was any contractual relation between the trustees as proprietors and Sir William Elliott as tenant. That is no doubt quite true, but it hardly appears to me to exhaust the considerations that go to the solution of this case, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, although the actual relation of landlord and tenant did not exist, yet, as Sir William Elliott was allowed to be in possession under the lease for a term of years, and has received all the benefits which the lease conferred upon the tenant, he cannot claim the privileges of a bona fide tenant without submitting to the obligations which would have rested upon him if the lease had been a valid one. There is an old principle that he who invokes equity must be prepared to do equity, and I can hardly see how any bona fide possessor could claim to have all the rights of possession and also to be relieved from these obligations which as a tenant under a real lease he would have been bound to recognise.

But it is necessary to distinguish precisely what Sir William's position was in regard to the shootings, because although we speak popularly of a lease of shootings, yet if the privilege be nothing more than the right to kill game, it is so far different from an ordinary lease that there is really no subject of lease,—nothing but a right for a certain term of years to the exercise of a personal privilege. In such a case it is difficult to affirm that the obligations which the law would imply from the relation of landlord and tenant in a heritable subject are necessarily binding as between the granter and the grantee of a purely personal privilege. In the case of Kidd v. Byrne Lord Moncreiff said, referring to the obligations contained in the game tenant's lease to keep up the game,—“I do not think that the obligation upon the game tenant to maintain a fair stock of game and rabbits implies the obligation to keep down their number to a fair stock. The object of the clause is to maintain the stock, and not to diminish it.” That I should conceive to be a sound principle, but I am not so clear that the principle was well applied in the case of Kidd v. Byrne, because the Court proceeded upon a certain view of an implied obligation resulting independently of contract, and held that the game tenant was liable. If it were necessary to consider that question again the inclination of my opinion would be that there can be no such liability unless it is either contained in the written contract or is to be plainly inferred from it.

But then there is another ground which I think is sufficient for the disposal of the present claim. I mean the one last referred to by your Lordship, founded upon the rule which has been very generally recognised in questions between landlord and tenant, that where a claim of damage is founded upon a misuse of a subject or privilege let, there is a duty to give notice of the intention to make such a claim—notice that the one party considers that the other has failed in his obligation, and notice of the intention to claim indemnification against that breach of contract. There is no allegation that any claim of damage of this nature was notified to Sir William Elliott during the currency of his possession, so as to reserve the present question, and, in the absence of such a claim and notice, I think we are justified in dealing with this case on the principles that have been very widely applied in reference to agricultural leases.

There is also a third ground. It may perhaps be classed with the one which I first considered. That is, that there is here an obligation to relieve the trustees and their foresaids of all claims made by the agricultural tenants for damage sustained from the game, including hares and rabbits. Now, as far as this question depends upon contract that clause appears to me to contemplate that the game tenant is to be entitled to use his own discretion as to the preservation of the game on relieving the proprietors of all claims that may be made against them—that is, against the trustees. The clause seems to me to be inconsistent with the notion that the tenant was bound to keep down the game, because it contemplates that he is to be responsible as for an excess of game, the trustees protecting themselves against all liability in consequence of such excess. But it is not said that any claim has been made by the agricultural tenants. The only damage alleged is damage to fields let from year to year, and to property in the possession of the trustees, and which they hold in the meantime for the benefit of Sir William Elliott himself. I am therefore of opinion that the case for the trustees has failed, and that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that Sir William Elliott has been relieved of all the obligations he may have undertaken in the contract of lease between him and the trustees, merely by reason of its having now been found that the contract was ultra vires of the trustees, and therefore that he was in fact possessing precariously during the fourteen years that elapsed after the date of the contract. The judgment of the Court that the contract was ultra vires does not establish that there was no contract between the parties in point of fact. If indeed both parties had known from the first that they had no power to contract in these terms, and if they had entered into a formal contract of lease which they knew to be perfectly futile, from some indirect motive, then I could have understood its being held that there never had been any real agreement between them. But I do not understand it to be disputed that both the one party and the other were acting in perfect good faith, and I do not understand the view upon which it is held that because it is found after fourteen years that the contract is invalid in law, as being beyond the power of the contracting parties, there was therefore, in fact, no agreement on which the parties can be said to have acted during the period of fourteen years. I see no reason to doubt that from 1879 down to 1893 Sir William Elliott was in possession of the mansion-house of Wells, and of the privilege of shooting over the estate under a contract of lease between him and the trustees, although it has turned out that the contract cannot be enforced, so as to entitle him to further possession. That being so, I am unable further to hold that he is not responsible for the due performance of any of the stipulations of that contract by which his possession was regulated during the period that it lasted, and therefore it appears to me that the only question we have to consider is whether there is any relevant averment of breach of contract on the part of the defender?

Now, I think there is none. The lease gives Sir William Elliott the occupation and possession of the mansion-house, and it gives him the exclusive right of shooting game, including hares and rabbits, over the estate, and also the exclusive right of fishing in the Water of Rule. The parties chose to stipulate for the protection of the landlords' property against the excessive use of this right of shooting, and they did so by a perfectly clear stipulation that if the result of Sir William Elliott's exercise of his right should be to give rise to claims of damages against the landlords, the trustees, at the instance of agricultural tenants upon the estate, then he should be bound to relieve them of these claims of damages. That is a perfectly intelligible and eminently reasonable stipulation. It appears to me that that exhausts the rights for which the proprietors chose to stipulate, and when one bears that in view, it appears to me that there is no relevant allegation of breach of contract on the part of Sir William Elliott at all. The pursuers do not say that any damage has been done to the agricultural part of the estate, and they do not say that any claim of damage has been brought against them by agricultural tenants. What they do say is, that a number of trees have been destroyed by rabbits, and also that the number of rabbits at present on the estate is so great that it is useless to plant young trees, although a considerable amount of planting is necessary for the proper management of the estate. The only additional averment of damage is that the stock of rabbits maintained upon the estate has reduced the value for grazing purposes of certain grass parks which are annually let by the pursuers. It is impossible to infer from any of these statements the existence of any claim of damage at the instance of the agricultural tenants. But, then, it is said that in addition to the express stipulation in the contract there is an implied stipulation not to keep more than a reasonable stock of game upon the estate. I can quite understand that even although the remedies to which a proprietor should be entitled in the event of any excessive use of his privileges by a shooting tenant are expressly stipulated for in the lease, there might nevertheless be a claim against the tenant if it could be charged against him that he had done anything equivalent to dilapidation of the estate—that is to say, that he had brought great quantities of game upon the estate, and so increased the stock to an extravagant extent, causing an amount of injury which never could have been in the contemplation of the parties when the shooting lease was granted. It might very well be that such an excessive use of his privileges as that would be beyond the powers which the contract of lease contemplated, and therefore would be a wrong done to his landlord. But there is no suggestion of anything of that kind upon record, because all that is said is not that he did anything to increase the stock of game, but simply that he has not kept it down, and has permitted the rabbits to increase on the estate. Therefore the pursuers' case is, that there was an obligation on this gentleman to exercise the right of shooting rabbits while living in the mansion-house, and not only so, but to exercise it so effectually as to prevent injury to trees and plantations, and injury to grass parks. I agree with your Lordships that it is impossible to read into this contract any stipulation of the kind.

I agree also that if there were any contractual obligation which the defender had broken, it is too late for the pursuers now to bring an action at this date, reverting back to damage which has continued for so long a period of time. I think that the principle upon which it is held that if a tenant is to claim damages from his landlord he must give notice of the fact of such damage existing and of his claim at a reasonable time, is still more directly applicable to the case of a proprietor claiming damages from his shooting tenant, because the landlord is left in the uncontrolled administration of his estate for all purposes except those of sporting, and therefore he is upon the spot and must see that the damage is arising. It appears to me, therefore, that there is a very clear duty lying upon him if he means to maintain a claim of damage for what he thinks an excessive use of his tenant's privileges to give notice at once, so that the tenant may have an opportunity of exercising his right to kill game on the one hand, or, on the other hand, of preserving evidence that the amount of game is not excessive. On these grounds I agree with your Lordships.

JAMES ANDREW ALLAN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Ure—Salvesen.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Foreign.—In an action raised by an English firm in the Sheriff Court the pursuers obtained a final judgment on the merits, with a finding of expenses. While the pursuers' account of expenses was before the Auditor the defender brought an action relating to the same subject-matter against the pursuers as subject to the jurisdiction of the Court ex reconventione. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that notwithstanding the judgment on the merits the action of reconvention was competent.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Foreign—Partnership.—An English firm raised an action in Scotland against a Scotsman, but before final judgment the firm was dissolved, one of the partners continuing the business under the original firm name. No notice of the dissolution was given to the defender of the action, and, ex facie of the proceedings, the firm continued to litigate to the end. The defender thereafter raised an action in Scotland against the firm by its firm name pleading that jurisdiction existed ex reconventione. Held that jurisdiction ex reconventione existed notwithstanding the dissolution of the firm.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

In August 1893 James Andrew Allan, lithographic printer, 126 Renfield Street, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Wormser Harris & Company, stockbrokers, 61 Old Broad Street, London, "and subject to the jurisdiction of this Court ex reconventione," for payment of £100, or such other sum as might appear to be the true balance due to the pursuer by the defenders under an agreement produced.

The pursuer averred that the defenders were subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire ex reconventione, in respect that at the date when the action was raised another action, arising out of the same agreement, at their instance against him, was pending in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.

In defence Wormser Harris & Company pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No jurisdiction.

Both actions arose out of an agreement embodied in the following letter No. 166. (dated 1st June 1891) by Allan to Wormser Harris & Company:—

"Gentlemen,—In course of your acting for me as my brokers on the London Stock Exchange, and allowing me half of the commissions charged, as was arranged verbally, I agree to be responsible for half the losses that may arise through default of the person or persons for whom you act through me."

June 8, 1894.
Allan v.
Wormser
Harris & Co.

The first action, that at the instance of Wormser Harris & Company, was for payment of £630, 10s. 6d., being the alleged amount of half the losses incurred by Wormser Harris & Company through the default of persons introduced by Allan, after giving Allan credit for £67, 18s. 9½d., as being half of the commissions earned by Wormser Harris & Company upon Stock Exchange transactions carried through by them under the agreement.

In the first action the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 2d November 1892, gave decree for the sum sued for (as restricted by minute), found the pursuers entitled to expenses, and remitted to the Auditor to tax and to report.

On 31st July 1893 the Sheriff (Berry), on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adheres to the interlocutor appealed against . . . Finds the appellant liable in the expenses of the appeal, and decerns: Directs the Auditor to allow a £5 debate fee for the debate under the appeal."

The second action, that at the instance of Allan, was for payment of a further sum in name of commissions.

On 11th August 1893 warrant was granted to cite Wormser Harris & Company as defenders in the second action by service on Frame & Macdonald, writers, Glasgow, the agents for Wormser Harris & Company in the first action, and on 14th August Frame & Macdonald accepted service.

On 16th September the decree of 31st July (in the first action) was extracted.

Defences in the second action were lodged on 22d September. In support of the plea of no jurisdiction the defenders averred (1) that the first action had been decided before the second action was raised, and (2) that the firm of Wormser Harris & Company had been dissolved on 15th April 1893.

On 27th September, in the first action, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor approving of the Auditor's report, and decerning for payment of the expenses as taxed.

On 29th September Allan on being charged implemented the decrees on the merits and for expenses by paying the sums decerned for.

On 5th October the record in the second action was closed, and on 25th November a proof was allowed of Wormser Harris & Company's allegations bearing on their first plea in law in that action.

The evidence led at the proof was directed entirely to the question of the dissolution of the firm of Wormser Harris & Company. The evidence shewed that, according to the law of England, the firm which raised the first action was dissolved on 13th April 1893. The only intimation of the dissolution was by the following notice sent to the secretary of the London Stock Exchange, and posted in the Exchange,—“Kindly inform the members of the Stock Exchange that the partnership hitherto existing between us has been dissolved this day by mutual consent. All outstanding bargains will be settled by Mr Percy Wormser Harris at the above address under the same style as heretofore.” No alteration was made in the instance of the first action after the dissolution of the firm, and ex facie of the proceedings in that action the old firm continued to litigate to the end. No notice of the dissolution was made to Allan, the pursuer.

No. 166.

On 8th February 1894 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.*

Allan v.
Wormser
Harris & Co.

* "NOTE.—Reconvention founds jurisdiction when the action in which it is pleaded is between the same parties as those in the action on which it is based. Here the firm of Wormser Harris & Company of London, being pursuers in an action in this Court, was dissolved in April 1893, while that action was still pending. It was not taken out of Court till 16th September, when a decree against the present pursuer in their favour was extracted. This action by Mr Allan against them was brought into Court in August, having been served on the defenders' agents, who were agents for the pursuers in the other action. No objection to the service has been stated, and the defenders have appeared and defended.

"From the evidence which has been taken, I am prepared to hold that the former firm was dissolved at the date mentioned. Possibly the new firm, which bears the same name, has taken up the assets and liabilities of the former, and got and holds the decree in the former action, but there is no evidence of this. It only appears that the new firm intimated that it would settle the claims against the old by members of the London Stock Exchange, and, so far as the late action in this Court is concerned, the person who really carried it on may be the partner who retired, or some third party, liquidator. There is therefore considerable difficulty, as the case has been argued on the proof, in sustaining the jurisdiction, for it is not clear that the Wormser Harris & Company who are called, and on whom the action was served, are the same Wormser Harris & Company, or have any interest in the former action.

"Reconvention, however, is an equitable plea, analogous to or rather an extension of the principle of compensation. This is clearly laid down as the origin and ground of the rule in the leading case of Thomson v. Whitehead, 24 D. 331, and where, as here, the actio conventionis is finished and extracted before the plea is stated at the bar, when consequently the questions between the parties cannot be tried contemporaneously, or so that the decision on the actio reconventionis can have any effect on the decision on the other, the reason of the rule, and therefore the rule itself, ceases to exist. The judgment of Lord Rutherford in Baillie v. Hume, 15 D. 267, appears to be inconsistent with this view. That judgment, however, is reported without any note by that very eminent Judge, and the circumstances on which it was based are imperfectly known from the report. It is, moreover, anterior to the judgments in Thomson v. Whitehead and Longworth v. Yelverton, 7 Macph. 70, and I think is inconsistent with the principles fully explained there. I do not think that the equitable principles on which reconvention is founded were extended by Morrison & Milne v. Massa, 5 Macph. 130, although that case supplies us with a novel application of the rule. A dictum of Lord Deas in that case, quoted by Mr Mackay, Manual, p. 62, appears at first sight to extend the principle beyond what is warranted by the judgments in the cases cited, and, when read without regard to the facts with reference to which it was spoken, beyond the meaning of the Court which was giving judgment. His Lordship says that the principle of reconvention is 'that a person is not entitled to take the benefit of the jurisdiction of our Courts and at the same time refuse the jurisdiction of the Court in relative matters.' This is quite true, but it was not the intention of the Judges, all of whom had taken part in deciding Thomson v. Whitehead, to ignore the definition of the rule by that case, or to make the principle of reconvention operate as a personal bar to a challenge of the jurisdiction of our Courts by any man who had ever applied to them for relief. On the contrary, there was the most obvious justice in applying the rule in the case of Milne v. Massa, and so little question of convenience or of the possibility of a contemporaneous trial, that it was wholly unnecessary to refer to that point. Here that is the thing mainly to be considered. For a few weeks or days there was a technical concurrence of two actions between parties who, for this purpose, may be assumed to be the same parties litigating about relative matters. But before the question of jurisdiction could be stated at the bar, that concurrence

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—There was jurisdiction here ex reconventione. The actio conventionis was still pending when this action was brought. A judgment had indeed been pronounced in the original action which afterwards became final, but when the second action was raised the judgment in the original action was still appealable, and the decree had not been extracted. The basis of jurisdiction ex reconventione was the equitable principle that he who appealed to a Court was not entitled to decline its jurisdiction in regard to questions relative to the subject-matter of the original action, when both actions were susceptible of being tried or decided together or nearly together. Here, as much as in Baillie v. Hume,¹ there was a depending process. That was, it is true, only a decision in the Outer-House, but it was before the Court in Whitehead v. Thomson,² and nothing was there said against its authority. In the present case, the Sheriff was not functus officio when the second action was raised. He could still have superseded extract until the present action should be tried.³ The change in the firm was of no moment. The old firm, which was the pursuer in the original action, still existed for all purposes connected with the ingathering of its effects and the payment of its debts, and having taken advantage of the decree in the original action, it could not escape liability under the actio reconventionis.

No. 166.

Allan v.
Wormser
Harris & Co.

Argued for the defenders;—Here the first action was no longer a pending process. It was true that so long as a foreigner was in petitorio he could not decline the jurisdiction of the Court which he had himself invoked. But when, as here, he had got all that he asked for, the process was no longer depending for judgment, and reconvention was no longer possible. By paying under the decree, and thus implementing the Sheriff's decree, the pursuer had waived any objection that he might have otherwise been able to state. The fact that the interlocutor in the original action was appealable when this action was brought was of no importance. The Sheriff was functus officio, and if the defenders were subject to any jurisdiction, it was to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, to which an appeal ex hypothesi lay. The fact that the decree had not been extracted was of no moment. Extract merely enabled the holder of a judgment to make use of it. So soon as judgment was pronounced a pursuer ceased to be in petitorio. Further, the dissolution of the old firm was a material fact. Having been dissolved, it could be summoned only through its individual partners,⁴ and this had not been done.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the question is whether the defenders being outwith the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts, there is jurisdiction ex reconventione in respect of an action raised by them against the present pursuer within Scotland.

defenders before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for £630, 10s. 6d., as being the proportion of loss falling upon him under an agreement with them by which he was to receive a share of the commission on Stock Exchange transactions done by them for clients introduced by him, and in respect of which share of commission he undertook to be liable for one-half of any losses caused by default of such clients. In that case the Sheriff-substitute decerned, and his judgment was affirmed by the Sheriff on 31st July 1893. The pursuer within a few days of this judgment, and a month before extract, served the present defenders with the present summons, and the sum sued for in it is a balance said to be due to him of commissions on the same transactions, service of this summons being accepted on 14th August, a month and two days before extract of the judgment in the first case.

The question which thus arises is one of no little difficulty. It is one on which I do not think that we have any sure or certain guidance from past decision. There certainly is no case which can be held conclusively to rule the present, for however instructive the very full exposition of the law may have been in the case of Whitehead, 24 D. 331, its decision did not depend upon any principle applicable to this case, for it was decided upon the nature of the case itself, it being held that it did not give ground for the application of the rule. It did not turn upon the time when the action was raised. On the other hand, although the case of Baillie v. Hume, 15 D. 267, was almost if not altogether the counterpart of the present, it was not a decision in the Inner-House, but only by a Lord Ordinary, the parties having acquiesced.

Certain of the elements necessary to found jurisdiction ex reconventionem exist in the most complete form in the present case. First, there is the element of association between the subject-matter of the two actions. For here the matters in dispute in both causes actually take their origin out of the same transactions. They are claim and counter claim in regard to the business following upon the same agreement. Further, as I think, the action of reconvention was brought into Court while the actio conventionis was still a depending process before the same Court. But it is as regards the requirement expressed by the late Lord President Inglis in Whitehead's case that the two actions must be capable of being terminated by a single sentence, or by two sentences contemporaneous, or nearly contemporaneous, that the question arises. It is the latter alternative of that statement of conditions which alone is in question. Now, I make this remark upon these words—"nearly contemporaneous"—that they are words which are by no means of the character of words of definition, and the Lord President, who used them, did not give—as in the case he was dealing with it was unnecessary to give—any definite statement of what they were intended to cover. It is plain that they must involve some degree of uncertainty, and I cannot but think that the absence of definiteness must have been intentional, for the late Lord President, where he saw his way to state a matter of law on distinct lines, did so, as for example, where he thought that a line of demarcation as between competent and incompetent or the like could be laid down. But he adopts the somewhat vague phrase of Bartolus as all that can be safely laid down on this point. The word "nearly" as applied to the contemporaneous progress or decision of cases before a Court seems to admit of a very considerable margin, just as the word "summarily" may not suggest the same speed in one Court as it does in another. Such a word may reasonably be read as referring to different periods of time. "Nearly contemporaneous" may mean days in one state of circumstances, and weeks or months in another. The speed or slowness with which the business of the same Court is conducted at different periods may make a narrower or wider reading reasonable. It must be a question of circumstances. An excellent illustration of the impossibility of justly drawing any line approaching hardness and fastness is afforded in this present case. It so happened that the time of the raising of this action was almost simultaneous with the commencement of a long vacation of Court, and thus a case which might possibly have come to final judgment in a few weeks was not taken up by the Judge for about three months. And again a delay of three months was caused by the allowing of an incidental proof, which practically added nothing to the materials for disposing of the case.

No. 166.
June 8, 1894.
Allan v.
Wormser
Harris & Co.

All this seems to me to make it clear how inequitable it would be to settle the question what is covered by "nearly" contemporaneous, upon what may happen in a particular case in the way of innocent delay or of procedure occupying time. The true reading of the rule seems to me to be that the case which is raised against the foreigner in the Court in which he has sued another must be such that there is nothing in it which makes a nearly contemporaneous decision impracticable, and if that be so, then further, that an action such as this, relating to the very same transactions and between the same parties, is one which fulfils this as well as the other conditions, being raised before the first case was out of Court.

What must be looked to, in considering the question, is the state of matters at the time when the actio reconventionis is raised, and doing so here, I hold that the pursuer was then in a position to maintain that his case fulfilled all the named conditions formulated by the late Lord President as tests of the right of a pursuer in an actio reconventionis.

I said before that the case resembling this one which was to be found in the books could not be considered a binding authority. But I may be permitted to say that having formed the opinion I have done, with much diffidence, and feeling that confidence would be presumptuous, I cannot but have some satisfaction in knowing that the view I have come to is the same as that held by one so eminent as the late Lord Rutherford.

There is another question in the case which does not appear to me to be attended with anything like the same difficulty. It is maintained by the defenders that as their firm was dissolved in 1893, the pursuer, in calling into Court the same firm as were pursuers in the first action, has for this reason failed to bring into Court the same parties as were pursuers of that action. I do not think that this contention can receive effect. The pursuers in the first action remained the pursuers down to and past the time when they were summoned in the actio reconventionis. No alteration was made in the instance on the face of the proceeding. They continued to maintain their action without any notice to Mr Allan. It was these pursuers who were called in the new action. And as the firm, though dissolved, would still continue for settlement of existing liabilities, of which the claim in this case, if well founded, is one, I see no good ground for holding that if the action is well laid otherwise, it can be thrown out on that ground.

LORD YOUNG.—I am also of opinion that the Sheriff has jurisdiction against these English defenders, and that on the doctrine of reconvention, which is a doctrine of the common law. It is not established by any statute, it is nothing but a rule of the common law resting on considerations of good sense and expediency as to what is best for the convenience of both parties.

Allan v.

Wormser

Harris & Co.

The rule itself is an exception to the general rule actor sequitur forum rei. That also is a rule of the common law founded upon the same considerations of good sense and expediency as the exception to it, and simply means that if a person wishes to sue another he must sue him in his own country and under the laws of that country. There are exceptions to that rule, and this doctrine of reconvention, as I have said, is one of them. As I understand that doctrine, it is simply this,—If a foreigner is suing in this country a person who is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts, on some matter in dispute between them, then the other, the Scotsman, may sue the foreigner in the same Court upon any dispute arising out of the same matter as that in dispute in the original action. He is not obliged to follow the reus into another country, he is allowed to arraign him in the same Court as that in which the reus is suing him.

Now, where the considerations of good sense and expediency upon which the doctrine of reconvention is founded apply, I know of no other rule which would prevent the doctrine from being held good. The question before us therefore is, Do these considerations of good sense and expediency exist in this case? I am of opinion that they do. One reason that was urged against the application of the doctrine of reconvention was that there was a technical objection of this nature. It was said that where the original action had been heard out, a judgment given, and the case decided, there was an end of the matter, and that the rule actor sequitur forum rei must apply. Now, if these considerations of good sense and expediency, of which I have spoken, cease to exist when the interlocutor giving judgment in the case is pronounced, it goes without saying that the rule actor sequitur forum rei must apply, but if these considerations do not necessarily cease to exist at that time, then I do not think that the doctrine of reconvention is inapplicable to give the relief which it would admittedly have been able to give if the interlocutor had not been pronounced. I am of opinion that these considerations of good sense and expediency do not necessarily cease when the Judge has pronounced his judgment in the original action. The case was argued to us by the respondents on the footing that these considerations did not cease to exist during all the time that the proof was being taken, when the case was being argued, and when it was at avizandum, but that they did cease to exist when the Sheriff put his name to the interlocutor. I cannot appreciate the force of this reasoning. I accordingly look at the case before us to see whether these reasons did, as a matter of fact, cease to exist.

The original action was brought by Wormser Harris & Company against James Allan, the appellant in this action, upon a written contract between the parties in which each had certain rights and was under certain obligations therein set forth. They sued Allan on the ground that in their view there was a certain sum due by him to them under the contract. They brought their action some time before 11th December 1891, and it had a somewhat slow course, because it was not disposed of until 31st July 1893. I suppose that the action of reconvention could have been brought, and all the considerations of good sense and expediency upon which both the rule and the exception are founded would have been in existence, up to the date when the Sheriff signed his interlocutor upon 31st July 1893, but the respondents' view is that they ceased to exist and that an action ex reconventione became impossible whenever he did sign it. Now, I must say that these views do not seem to me to be so weighty, or to be so sensible of being practically worked out, as to be proper for the foundation of our decision in such a practical question as that which we have here, viz., whether it is expedient, in view of the considerations of good sense and expediency upon which this rule of the common law is founded, that this action of reconvention should be allowed to proceed or not.

Allan v.

Wormser

Harris & Co.

I pointed out during the course of the discussion that the defender's observation as to what might be the leaning of the Sheriff's mind in the original action might very well be the ground for his bringing the second action to vindicate what seemed to him to be his rights under the contract. The defender might well say to himself,—“ Well, this pursuer has brought his action against me in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow ; I have heard him explain what was his view of our obligations under the contract towards each other, and I have seen the inclination of the Sheriff's mind as to our respective positions : I will accordingly convene him in the same Court to recover what is due to me under the contract, and will urge against him the same arguments that he has urged against me.” This of course implies that very considerable progress has been made with the original action. But I think that it is right and expedient in the interest of both parties that all questions between the same parties arising out of the same subject-matter should be tried before the same Court, and I cannot agree to the view that the considerations of good sense and expediency which lead me to think that it is right these actions should be tried in the same Court cease to exist whenever the Sheriff signs the interlocutor in which he gives judgment in the original cause. No doubt considerations of time may arise,—even when the original case has not been decided there may be considerations of time. Lapse of time may make these considerations of good sense and expediency inapplicable to any given case, and then I should not act upon them. That would be a matter within the discretion and intelligence of the Court in each particular case, but it does not appear to me that it would be expedient to lay down any stern or fixed rule which would make the doctrine applicable down to one point of time, and not afterwards. If we were going to do that, I think that a safer rule would be to hold that the doctrine applies until the original action is clearly out of Court, but not after that, so that we could say that the one party is not convening the other in the Court in which the other is suing him.

With regard to the question of extract, I believe that this matter has been affected by recent legislation. Formerly no extract of a decree could be given until the question of expenses had been disposed of. Now, by statute there may be extract of decree after the merits have been disposed of, although the question of expenses has not been decided, and the parties still remain convened before the Court. There might for instance be an appeal to the Court of Session, and the cause might be remitted back to the Sheriff Court, and even in a discussion upon the question of expenses there is that convention upon which the reason and expediency of the rule is founded. Therefore, in my opinion, extract has not the importance in this case which we were asked to attribute to it.

On these grounds I am of opinion that this case is one for the application of the rule that when a foreigner has sued a Scotsman subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Court he is liable to be sued in the Scottish Courts upon any question arising out of the same subject-matter as that upon which the original action is founded, and that there are in existence here all the considerations of reason and expediency upon which the rule is founded. With regard to the Sheriff-substitute's first ground of judgment, that there was no jurisdiction

No. 166. because the original firm of Wormser Harris & Company had been dissolved, I am clearly of opinion that it is not well founded.

Allan v.
Wormser
Harris & Co.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The respondents, who are domiciled in England, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the appellant. It was founded on a contract into which the respondents and appellant had entered. On 31st July 1893 it was finally decided by an interlocutor under which the appellant was decerned to pay the sum concluded for as restricted by minute, and was found liable in expenses.

On 27th September 1893 the Sheriff decerned for the expenses, and on the 29th of the same month the appellant implemented the decrees by paying the sums due under them.

On 11th August 1893 the appellant raised the present action in the same Court and on the same contract. Defences were lodged on 22d September. A plea was stated against the jurisdiction of the Court which did not and could not in ordinary course come under the consideration of the Sheriff until a date later than 29th September, when, as I have said, the decree of 31st July 1893 was implemented. The Sheriff sustained it, and we have now to consider whether his judgment is right.

The sole ground of jurisdiction is reconvention. The appellant contends that jurisdiction exists, because his action is brought on the same contract as that on which he was sued, and because at the time when his summons was served the action at the instance of the respondents was still in dependence inasmuch as the judgment of the Sheriff had not been extracted. There is no doubt that there would have been jurisdiction if the appellant's action had been brought before the other was decided. The question is whether the final decision excludes jurisdiction ex reconventionis.

It is not necessary to inquire whether reconvention is a source of jurisdiction. Assuming that it is, which seems to be the most favourable view for the appellant, it is settled by Thomson v. Whitehead, 24 D. 331, that the jurisdiction is not universal. There is some uncertainty as to the matters which may be embraced within the actio reconventionis. But it is, I think, clear that reconvention is an equitable right, and I give it its broadest meaning when I say that it holds its place in our jurisprudence on the equity that a foreigner who is appealing to a Scottish Court must submit to the jurisdiction of that Court in such actions as his adversary may raise which are necessary to enable the Court to do justice between the parties. It is a remedy given in extension of a jurisdiction which is in the course of being exercised, in order that the admissible claims of the defender may be before the Court at the same time as the claims of the pursuer. I say "admissible," because the jurisdiction is not universal; it is limited to claims which, having a relation to those of the pursuer in the original action, may be usefully tried along with them. I say "at the same time," both because it is common ground that the actio reconventionis cannot be brought after the actio conventionis has ceased to be in dependence, and because the very purpose of the jurisdiction is to enable the Court to consider the claims of the litigants in relation to each other. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that it is a condition of jurisdiction ex reconventionis that the second action must be brought while the first is in dependence for judgment.

When the Sheriff pronounced the decree of 31st July, his functions as a Judge were at an end. Nothing remained for him to do except to decern for the expenses which he had found to be due, and this was a mere matter of course. An action cannot be in dependence for judgment after final judgment has been given. It may be in dependence in another sense. For instance, it is in dependence before extract in the sense that an appeal may be taken if an appeal is otherwise competent. But the function of the Judge is ended, not by the extract, but by his own decree.

Allan v.

Wormser

Harris & Co.

In the older process of the Court of Session the judgments of the Court were considered to be the warrants of the decrees rather than the decrees themselves. Bankton (iv. 36, 1) says,—“Even the judgments which are the warrants of decrees are only interlocutors till the decrees are extracted by the clerk, for till then they are in the power of the Judges and may be altered by them.” When such a power existed an action necessarily remained in dependence in the fullest sense until the final decree was extracted. But it has long ceased, and it is the rule that a Judge cannot alter his judgment after it has been pronounced. It follows, I think, that though an action may until extract be in dependence for certain purposes, it cannot after final decree be in dependence for judgment.

I am not speaking of the power to correct de recenti errors which have occurred in the framing of the judgment. I assume that such a power exists in the Sheriff Court as it does in the Court of Session. But it exists only to the effect of enabling the Judge to express in accurate form the judgment which he has already pronounced. His powers as a Judge are at an end, though he is entitled to see that his judgment is correctly recorded.

It was argued that the Sheriff on being informed of the appellant's action might have prohibited the extract of his decree, and that inasmuch as he possessed this power, the respondents were subject to his jurisdiction in that action. I do not think that any such power exists. The decree belongs to the party who holds it, and it is his absolute right to enforce it in ordinary form. The Sheriff cannot review or alter his decree by staying execution, and by consequence he cannot stay execution in order to any such purpose. But were it otherwise, I do not think that the case of the appellant is advanced. It is not pretended that the Sheriff was bound to use the power, and I do not see how his jurisdiction can depend on the manner in which he exercises a discretion. Nor do I think that the appellant's action would furnish even a stateable reason for prohibiting the extract of the decree. A claim is no answer to a decree, and cannot be a ground for staying execution. If the parties before us had both been resident in Lanarkshire, a motion on the part of the appellant to stay execution ought, in my opinion, to have been at once refused. It could not fare better, because it was made to preserve or create a jurisdiction which would not otherwise exist.

To hold that the actio reconventionis may proceed when the actio conventionis is not in dependence for judgment is to act on a principle after the reason of it has ceased to exist. For the Judge after final decree is in the same position as if the first action had never been brought. It seems to be a strange anomaly that there should be jurisdiction before extract, and no jurisdiction after extract, when the powers of the Judge are the same in either case. They are non-existent. I can see no reason for the want of jurisdiction after extract, except that the first action is not in dependence for judgment, and the same reason applies with equal force when final judgment has been pronounced.

I may appeal to the authority of Voet, who seems to me to explain accurately the reason as well as the limits of the rule, and I am led to do so all the more because in the case of Thomson v. Whitehead he was thought to carry the doctrine of reconvention to its utmost length. He uses a very significant equivalent for reconventio (vol. i. 78) in calling it "mutua petitio" a phrase which implies that each petition is before the Court for judgment. In his view reconvention is admitted on this ground—"Aequum enim visum fuit, ut iudicem tanquam idoneum agnoscat unusquisque tanquam reus, quem tanquam actor etiamnum agnoscit . . . in tantum, ut et tanquam actor repellendus sit, qui causam reconventionis excipere tanquam reus recusat, neque reus ultra procedere teneatur in causa conventionis, si reconventus nolit ad mutuum respondere petitionem." No language could express more clearly that the actio reconventionis is admitted as an answer to an existing actio conventionis, and existing in the sense that it is before the Court for judgment. He makes his meaning even more clear in a subsequent passage, when he says (vol. i. 80),—"Post litem conventionis, jam judiciali sententia terminatam reconventionem frustra fieri, inter omnes fere convenit neque enim ullo tempore mutuae petitiones dici possunt, quarum una jam finem habuit, antequam alterius initium esset." I cannot imagine any words more directly applicable to the case before us. He is not dealing with technicalities. He is discussing a point of general law, and he gives it as the almost universal opinion of jurists that a final judgment in the actio conventionis excludes the actio reconventionis. The reason is obvious. After such a judgment the two actions cannot be "mutual" actions, or in other words they cannot be described as existing for judgment.

The point which we have to decide was not directly raised in Thomson v. Whitehead. The Court had only to determine whether a certain claim could be comprehended within the actio reconventionis. But they could not do so without entering more or less upon the considerations on which this question turns, and in holding that the jurisdiction was of a limited nature they went far to solve it. The late Lord President said that the rule will only apply "when the two claims—the conventio and the reconventio—may be tried simultaneously, and terminated by a single sentence or by two sentences contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous." These words are to my mind very clear, nor do I see how they fail in definition. They limit the jurisdiction to the case where the two actions can be tried together, or in other words, to the case where both are at the same time in dependence for judgment. The power of pronouncing sentence is mentioned as a corollary to the fact on which the jurisdiction depends; and though the Judge must have the capacity of pronouncing contemporaneous sentences it is not necessary that they shall be absolutely contemporaneous. The period which may intervene between them can have no bearing on the question of jurisdiction.

I see nothing to the contrary in the opinions of the other Judges, and much in confirmation. Most, if not all, seem to recognise that reconvention is an equitable remedy in aid or extension of a jurisdiction which is being exercised, and therefore that the two actions must be in dependence for judgment at the same time. Lords Cowan and Benholme cite with approval a passage from Vinnius which I think it worth while to quote at length—Vinn., lib. 4, tit. 6, ed. 1761, p. 859,—"Illud obiter adjicio, posse eum, qui per se competens non est, ex accidenti competentem fieri, idque vel propter iudicium jam coeptum vel propter prorogationem jurisdictionis. Coepti iudicii hæc vis est, tum ut actorem mutuae petitioni seu reconventioni, ut nunc in foro loquimur, obnoxium reddat, hoc est, ut mutuas rei actiones ibi excipere cogatur, ubi ipse litem movit, tametsi prius ibi conveniri non potuisset, tum ut litigatores retineat in judicio conjuncto." Lords Neaves, Mackenzie, and Jerviswoode shew that the action of reconvention is intended to enable the Court to deal effectually with all the questions which are raised in legitimate connection with the action of convention—as for example, to reduce a deed on which the foreigner founds, or to consider pleas of compensation or of retention which are raised on the part of the original defender. Their view seems to be that the purpose of the action of reconvention is to complete an existing process, to the effect of enabling the Court to settle the claims on both sides.

Harris & Co.

If the two actions must relate to the same subject-matter it seems to be the natural consequence that the judgments in both must be contemporaneous, or nearly contemporaneous. There may not be the same necessity if the action of reconvention has a wider range. But in either case there must exist the capacity of pronouncing a contemporaneous judgment. It may be said that if the first judgment is pronounced in the action of convention the jurisdiction in the other action must cease. It is not so. The existence of the first action is necessary to give jurisdiction in the other. But after the defender in the second action has pleaded on the merits, the contract of litiscontestation is complete, from which he cannot withdraw.

It is urged that the circumstance that the decree is not extracted satisfies the technicality, and that the jurisdiction may therefore be sustained. I do not understand the argument. It seems to me that the essential facts on which an equity depends must exist in truth, and that none of them can be represented or satisfied by a technicality. If it be a condition that the first action must exist for judgment at the time when the second is brought, that condition cannot be satisfied after judgment has been pronounced. We cannot give an equitable remedy when the conditions of it do not exist in truth and substance.

I am aware that the decision of Lord Rutherford in Baillie v. Hume, 15 D. 267, is against me, and I need hardly say that I have an unfeigned respect for any decision of that Judge. But no reasons were assigned for the judgment, and there was a strong inducement to entertain the action from the fact that it was laid on the wrongous use of diligence in the action on which the foreigner had sued. It raised a pure and somewhat technical question of Scots law, and the defender may not have been very reluctant that it should be decided in a Scotch Court. Considerations of that kind, however, can do no more than indicate a reason why the defender should have acquiesced in the judgment, which remains an important authority against me. But availing myself of the light which has been thrown on the subject by the case of Thomson, I can come to no other conclusion than that which I have expressed.

There is another matter which deserves to be considered. Before the case was or could be heard on the plea of jurisdiction the final decree in the first action had been implemented. In accordance with our practice, all the pleas—whether preliminary or peremptory—were stated in the defences. But there could be no litiscontestation until the plea to the jurisdiction was decided. For there can be no litiscontestation before a Judge who has no jurisdiction. The question is, whether the Sheriff was entitled to sustain his jurisdiction after the decree had been implemented, or in other words whether in determining the question of jurisdiction he was to have regard to the state of facts at the date when the summons was served, or at the time when his decision was asked. I am here assuming that in the former view the jurisdiction would be sustained.
